WHITNEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 4,231.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 12, 1905.)

New Trial—Denial of Motion—Setting Aside Order—Inadvertence.

Where defendant's motion for a new trial was brought up, in the absence of defendant's attorney, without argument or opportunity upon the part of defendant to be heard, it was proper for the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing relief against proceedings taken against a party by mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, to set aside an order denying the motion, made on the sole ground that defendant had neglected to prosecute the same, and, without any consideration of the merits, to restore the cause to the calendar for a hearing upon the merits.

In Bank.

Petition by Arthur L. Whitney, as assignee in the matter of M. A. McKinnon, an insolvent debtor, for writ of mandate against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Denied.

Samuel Rosenheim, for petitioner. Herbert Choynski, for defendant Gallick.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an application for a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to direct the clerk of said court to issue execution on a judgment in favor of the petitioner. It appears from the petition herein that on the 2d of November, 1901, the plaintiff, as assignee in the matter of M. A. McKinnon, obtained a judgment against one M. Gallick, as defendant in said action, for the sum of $1,200 and costs; that no part of said judgment has been paid; that after notice of decision and judgment in said action the defendant, on December 16, 1901, gave notice of intention to move for a new trial. Thereafter a bill of exceptions on said motion for a new trial was proposed by said defendant, and was settled and allowed by the judge of said superior court, Hon. J. M. Seawell, who tried said cause, and was filed in said action December 9, 1902. Thereafter, on December 15, 1903, said bill of exceptions was amended, and on February 12, 1904, the following order was entered in the minutes of said court in said action: "In this cause the defendant's motion for a new trial came on this day regularly to be heard, S. Rosenheim, Esq., appearing as counsel for plaintiff, and no one appearing for the defendant. Thereupon, on motion of counsel for the plaintiff, it is ordered that the said motion be, and is hereby, submitted to the court for consideration and decision." On February 16th an order was entered in said cause by said court denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. It is alleged in said petition that on the next day, to wit, the 17th day of February, 1904, without notice to the attorney for the plaintiff, and in his absence, the court, upon the ex parte application of counsel for the said defendant, M. Gallick, made and caused to be entered upon its minutes the following order, to wit: "In this cause it is ordered by the court that the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, made and entered on the 16th day of February, 1904, be, and the same is hereby, vacated and set aside, and said motion for a new trial be restored to the law and motion calendar of this court for argument." And thereafter, on the 15th day of March, 1904, the court made and entered the following order in said cause: "In this cause the defendant's motion for a new trial herein having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now, the court having fully considered the same, and being fully advised in the premises, it is ordered that said motion be, and the same is hereby, granted." It further appears from the petition herein that upon the 17th day of September, 1904, plaintiff in said action filed a notice of motion, together with affidavits annexed thereto, and served the same on the attorney for the defendant; that on the 23d day of September, 1904, he would move the said superior court for an order directing the clerk thereof to issue execution in said action upon the judgment therein recorded on November 2, 1901, setting forth the grounds of said motion, which were in the main similar to the grounds of the application to this court for a peremptory writ of mandate. Upon being served with said notice of motion and affidavits in support thereof, the defendant's attorney in said action, being the same as in the present proceeding in this court, filed his affidavit in reply thereto, which affidavit, among other things, states that in pursuance of a stipulation between the attorneys for the respective parties the motion for new trial was continued in the superior court from time to time, and that said attorneys agreed that the motion should be taken up for argument only upon notice by one to the other, and no such notice was ever given prior to the 17th day of February, 1904, and notwithstanding said stipulation the said attorney for the plaintiff did appear in said court on the 12th day of February, 1904, in the absence of the attorney for said defendant, and did ask the said court to take up the motion for new trial, and stated to said court that the defendant's attorney had abandoned the said motion, and no argument was ever had thereon, but that the clerk of the court inadvertently and improvidently marked the said motion for new trial submitted upon the calendar of said court, and said court thereupon inadvertently and improvidently was made to appear to have denied the said defendant's motion for new trial, when in truth and in fact the same had never been submitted to said court for decision; that upon said court's attention being called to the said proceedings the said minute orders were set aside; that thereupon said plaintiff's attorney was notified that said order denying said motion for new trial, so inadvertently and improvidently made, had been set aside, and that said motion for new trial had been placed upon the calendar of said court for argument and consideration; that pursuant to said last-named notice the said attorney for the plaintiff regularly and duly appeared in said court, and then and there argued against the said motion for a new trial, and that no objection was made to the said consideration of said motion for new trial on said last-named day, but, on the contrary, the said attorney for plaintiff participated fully therein, without objection or protest to the argument, presentation, or consideration of the same; and that after the order of said court had been made granting defendant's motion for a new trial the plaintiff in said action served and filed his notice of appeal from said order granting said motion for new trial, and the said appeal is now pending in the Supreme Court. In the reply affidavit on the part of the plaintiff in said action upon said application for mandamus in the superior court it is denied that there was an understanding between the attorneys of the respective parties that the motion for new trial should not be submitted except upon notice. It is not denied, however, that the plaintiff's attorney appeared at the hearing of the motion for new trial, as stated in the foregoing affidavit; nor is it denied that the plaintiff took an appeal from the order granting the new trial in said action to this court which is now pending. The order of the trial court, setting aside the previous minute order denying defendant's motion in said action for new trial, which said order is copied in the petition herein, is as follows: "It appearing to the court that at the time when the order was made herein on the 16th day of February, 1904, denying defendant's motion for a new trial, said defendant had not made any motion for a new trial, and said motion having been denied solely for the reason that defendant had neglected to prosecute the same, and without any consideration of the merits thereof or of the record, and defendant's attorney having requested the court to set aside said order denying a new trial and to grant to defendant an opportunity to be heard by the court on said motion, it is ordered that the order made and entered on the 16th day of February, 1904, denying defendant's motion for a new trial, be, and the same is hereby, vacated, and set aside, and that the said motion for a new trial be restored to the law and motion calendar of this court for argument." After a hearing in the superior court upon said application for an order directing the clerk to issue an execution the following order was made, dated February 1, 1905 (after the title of the court and the cause): "In this cause the motion of the plaintiff for an order directing the clerk to issue execution herein having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now the court having fully considered the same and being fully advised herein, it is ordered that said motion be, and the same is hereby, denied."

The contention of the petitioner that the judgment in the action of the petitioner against M. Gallick, rendered in the superior court in November, 1901, is still in force, under the circumstances herein, cannot be sustained. The motion for new trial in that case was by the defendant. He was the moving party. It was brought up, as appears, in the absence of the defendant's attorney, without any argument, or opportunity upon the part of the defendant to be heard, and under the circumstances it was right and proper for the court to do as it did—set aside the order denying the motion for a new trial, and thereupon give the moving party an opportunity to present the motion. In Morris v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 331, it is said: "If a motion for a new trial is decided by the court before it has been submitted, the order denying or granting the new trial should be set aside as improvidently made, if application is made therefor." In Stewart v. Taylor, 68 Cal. 5, 8 Pac. 605, it is said: "There is no doubt that the court in which an irregular order is made and entered may, where the irregularity is apparent, on suggestion, motion, or ex mero motu, set it aside at any time before an appeal is taken from it." In 2 Hayne on New Trial (section 199) the author says: "Where an appealable order was improvidently or inadvertently made, the aggrieved party may move the court below to set it aside, and may appeal from the order denying his motion. Thus, where a motion for a new trial was granted without any submission of the motion, and before the record upon the motion was completed, it was held to be proper practice for the aggrieved party to move upon affidavits to have the order granting the new trial set aside; and the order denying such motion was reversed. [Referring in note to case of Morris v. De Celis, supra.] The fact that the order was made irregularly takes it out of the general rule." See, also, Spelling's New Trial & App. Prac. vol. 1, § 379. The late case of Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 Pac. 11, one of the cases relied upon by the petitioner, after stating the general rule that an order granting or refusing a new trial regularly made and entered cannot be set aside by the trial court, states that, if the orders "have been entered prematurely or by inadvertence, they may be set aside on a proper showing. (Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 170, 4 Pac. 1173, and cases cited); and if the order as entered is not the order as made, the minutes may be corrected so as to make them speak the truth" (citing other cases). In the case referred to, the court held that it clearly appeared from the terms and recitals in the order that it was not a correction of an erroneous entry in the minutes. The order here in question appearing to deny the motion of defendant for a new trial was evidently made through the mistake or inadvertence or excusable neglect of the defendant—the moving party—and upon his application it was within the power of the court to grant the relief it did by setting aside the order so improvidently entered, and placing the case on the calendar for hearing upon its merits. Code Civ. Proc. § 473. The petitioner here—the plaintiff in the case in question—seems to have recognized this as the proper proceeding on the part of the court by appearing at the hearing of the motion for new trial and taking part therein, and by taking an appeal to this court from the order granting a new trial. For the foregoing reasons the petitioner is not entitled to the writ prayed for.

The writ is denied.

BELL v. WYMAN et al. (L. A. 1,301.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—TITLE BY DEVISE—EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY —STATUTE — WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY.

In an action to quiet title, evidence examined, and held sufficient to show that defendant, a married woman, acquired title by devise during coverture, so that, under the direct provisions of Civ. Code, § 162, it became her separate property.

Beatty, C. J., and Henshaw and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; W. S. Day, Judge.

Rehearing denied September 8, 1905.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. Charles H. Armstrong and James W. Taggart, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action is brought to quiet title to a one-fourth interest in a tract of land consisting of some 305 acres, situated in Santa Barbara county. Plaintiff claims title to this one-fourth interest as successor to William Wyman through several conveyances. The claim of plaintiff is that the tract of land was the community property of said Wyman and his wife. The said wife, and defendant herein, Annie Wyman, claims the tract as her separate property. The defendant William Wyman filed a disclaimer in the case. The defendants Wineman and the Bank of Santa Maria hold mortgages executed by Annie Wyman on the property. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the court, on motion of the defendants, granted a nonsuit and dismissed the case because of failure of plaintiff's proof. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment which followed, and his contention is that the evidence introduced by him showed that the property was acquired by Mrs. Wyman under such circumstances as to make it community property. To this we cannot agree. The evidence on this subject consisted of 26 letters written by Mrs. Wyman from Santa Barbara county to her husband in the state of Washington, together with the recitals of a will hereinafter referred to. These letters show that Mrs. Wyman left her husband on a piece of government land in Washington, and came to Santa Barbara, where they had formerly lived, and where her father, mother, and other relatives were then living; that for some months after she came to Santa Barbara county from time to time she sent her husband small sums of money out of her earnings. Some seven months after she arrived at Santa Barbara county she opened a restaurant, and had as one of her boarders, a bachelor, some 95 years of age, named David Brown, usually known as "Uncle Davie." This old man was a cripple, and so nearly helpless that, in addition to $15 for his board, he paid Mrs. Wyman $20 a month to take care of him. From the beginning of her services to Uncle Davie, Mrs. Wyman's purpose was to "get around him," as she expresses it, and by condoning his fits of ill humor and being pleasant to him finally succeed in inducing him to make a will in her favor devising all his property to her. The restaurant business did not pay, and with the assistance of Uncle Davie, Mrs. Wyman, after some four or five months, paid the debts that had accumulated and quit the business. Thereafter Mrs. Wyman continued with Uncle Davie, and the latter came to have a high regard for her, and promised her that if she would stay with him to the end he would see that she did not want for anything when he was gone. How long Uncle Davie continued to pay Mrs. Wyman the $20 a month for "nursing" him, as he called it, the evidence does not disclose. Mrs. Wyman continued with Uncle Davie to the time of his death, some two years after she quit the restaurant business. From the first Wyman was very much averse to his wife remaining with Uncle Davie, and kept writing her to come to him in Washington. She informed him fully as to her relations with Uncle Davie, and of her hopes in regard to finally securing his property. In August, 1896, Uncle Davie made his will, devising and bequeathing most of his property, including the land here in question, to Mrs. Wyman. The correspondence between Mr. Wyman and his wife seems to have ceased with a letter written by her, dated January 15, 1897. Brown's death occurred on May 27, 1898. The letters of Mrs. Wyman written after the will was made indicate that her husband had become reconciled to the situation, and was making no further objections to his wife remaining with Brown. The services required of Mrs. Wyman in caring for Brown seem to have been of a very exacting nature. She was required to dress and undress him, to unfasten and fasten his clothes before and after his going to the closet, to attend and treat his sore eye, etc. Added to this Brown was fretful and fault-finding, all of which Mrs. Wyman bore with patience. Some two or three months after Brown's death Mrs. Wyman commenced a suit in Santa Barbara against her husband for a divorce, and it was in the employment of counsel and to defray expenses of a defense to that suit that Wyman parted with the alleged title to the one-quarter interest in the real estate involved in this action.

The will of Brown contains the following clause: "The said gift, bequest and devise to the said Annie E. Wyman of the large part of my estate is made without her knowledge, not as a payment for her care of me but is made as my desire that she shall have it in preference to others, I having no near relatives, and as the highest mark of esteem that I can show her for the faithful care and attention she has given me in my old age." On the death of Brown his will was duly probated, and the 305 acres of land involved was duly distributed to Mrs. Wyman by decree of the probate court.

Appellant contends that there was a contract between Mrs. Wyman and Brown, and that the will was made in pursuance of the contract and in payment for services rendered, and that this contract might have been specifically enforced. No such construction can reasonably be placed on the evidence before us. Mrs. Wyman expressly declares in one of her letters, in reply to her husband's demand that she "have Uncle Davie to sign an agreement just what he will do" for her, and send it to him in Washington, that: "I will not ask anything of the kind of him. I am here, and I know him better than to do anything of that sort." The intention of Mrs. Wyman was to procure a devise of this property to herself by last will, and not otherwise. It was also the intention of Brown, as clearly indicated in the language of the will above quoted, that Mrs. Wyman should have the property "not as a payment for her care of me," but as a mark of his esteem, and because he had "no near relatives"; and it was his desire that she should "have it in preference to others." No strained construction of the law should be allowed to defeat the intention of the parties so clearly shown. Property acquired by the wife after marriage "by gift, bequest, devise or descent * * * is her separate property." Civ. Code, § 162. Community property is property acquired after marriage by either spouse in some manner other than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent. Civ. Code, § 164. There was not any evidence even tending to show a contract in any way relating to the land in question. All the interest and title that Mrs. Wyman has in the property rests on the devise by will. The property was therefore not community property, but the separate property of Mrs. Wyman, and Wyman never had any interest in it to convey to any one. The nonsuit was properly granted.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

SHAW and ANGELLOTTI, JJ. Upon further consideration of this case upon rehearing, we adhere to the views expressed in the opinion heretofore rendered in department 2. For the reasons therein given, the judgment is affirmed.

VAN DYKE, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, not so much from what is said in the department opinion, as from the fact that the title to the real estate in question became vested in Mrs. Wyman by the devise, and the Constitution in direct terms declares that in such case it is the separate property of the devisee.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance upon the views expressed in the opinion delivered in department. I also think that the judgment is right upon the further ground that the land in controversy is the separate property of the defendant Mrs. Wyman, because she acquired it by "devise," and under the state Constitution all property acquired by devise is separate property, no matter what motive may have moved the testator to make the devise.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. It is the settled doctrine of this court that a man may bind himself by a contract, written or oral, to make a particular disposition of his property by will, and that such contract may be specifically enforced in favor of the promisee. Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 Pac. 1008. In this case the plaintiff, claiming that David Brown made such a promise, and fulfilled it by devising the land in Santa Barbara to Mrs. Wyman, undertook to maintain the legal proposition that property passing by such a devise to a husband or wife becomes community property alienable by the husband, and this for the reason that the Constitution (section 8, art. 20) and the statute (Civ. Code, §§ 162, 163), which declare that all property acquired by either spouse during coverture by gift, bequest, or devise is his or her separate property, ought not to be construed as embracing property passing under the form of bequest or devise when such provision was obligatory upon the testator, and made in requital of the personal services of the devisee or legatee. In support of this proposition he relied upon the principle underlying the distinction between separate and community property in the civil law, the source from which our law was taken, viz., that property earned by the services of either spouse should belong to the community, while property acquired gratuitously by either should belong exclusively to the donee. Upon this principle he contended that the word "devise," being generally defined as a gift of real property by will, and dispositions by will being with rare exceptions entirely voluntary, was used in that restricted sense in the Constitution and in the Code, and should be so construed as to exclude a devise which has been earned by the personal services of wife or husband—services subtracted from the community, and therefore a devise which merely pays a debt due to the community. To this argument upon the principal question of law involved in the appeal from the judgment of nonsuit it is not too much to say that the brief of respondents contains no answer. No notice of it was taken in the opinion of the department, because there the judgment of the superior court was sustained upon the ground that there was "no evidence even tending to show a contract in any way relating to the land in question." That decision was set aside and a rehearing granted because it was considered by those concurring in the order that there was evidence directly tending to prove the disputed fact, and because in view of such evidence it became necessary to decide the question of law. It is a somewhat singular outcome of the order for a rehearing that the case is finally disposed of by the court in bank without a decision of either of the two questions involved in its determination. Two justices are satisfied to adhere to the views of the department—that there was a total failure of evidence as to the existence of a contract; one places his affirmance upon the sole ground that a devise, whether voluntary or obligatory—whether a gift or the payment of a debt due for the personal services of a husband or wife—constitutes the land the separate property of the devisee; and one places his conclusion on both grounds. The case is thus disposed of, but nothing is decided. I have stated the substance of the argument against the literal construction given to the word "devise" by Justice VAN DYKE, but I have by no means stated the argument in its fullness and force. If there is an answer to it, I think it merits an answer, and certainly it is not answered by simply saying a devise is a devise. When the question arose whether a street or suburban railroad chartered by local authority was a railroad within the meaning of those clauses of the Constitution relating to the fixing of rates and the mode of assessment for the purpose of taxation, it was not thought a sufficient answer to say a railroad is a railroad. On the contrary, it was held that, although railroads in a general sense, street railroads and suburban railroads chartered by cities or counties are not the railroads contemplated by those provisions of the Constitution. And so in a great number and variety of instances this court and other courts have placed a narrower or more liberal construction upon constitutional and statutory provisions than their literal terms would justify, and this upon considerations in no wise different from those urged by the appellant against the literal construction of the provision in question here. Allowing any weight to the principle of discrimination plainly evident in the terms of the Constitution and consistently enforced by the commentators upon this feature of the civil law, it would certainly be permissible to hold that a devise made in fulfillment of a contract for the personal services of a married woman in nursing and caring for an infirm and helpless old man during the last years of his life is not the devise contemplated by a clause of the Constitution—where it is coupled with other modes of transfer, always gratuitous in the case of gift and descent—and, with rare exceptions, equally gratuitous in cases of bequest or devise. According to the rule "noscitur a sociis" only gratuitous bequests and devises are meant.

But it is not with this question of construction that I am so particularly concerned. It is not decided, and may never call for a decision. I take sharper issue with the adhesion of Justices SHAW, ANGELLOTTI, and McFARLAND to what was held in department, viz., that there was no evidence "even tending to show a contract in any way relating to the land in question." There was, in my opinion, not only some substantial evidence tending to prove such a contract, but there was evidence very direct and very convincing to that effect. The opinion delivered in department gives the general features of the case, but entirely fails to state the most important and direct evidence bearing upon this point. It quotes from the will a declaration to the effect that it is made without the knowledge of Mrs. Wyman, and not as a payment of her services, but merely because of the testator's desire that she should have the property in preference to his distant relatives. It does not notice the statements contained in Mrs. Wyman's letter commenced on the 12th of August and finished on the 14th, in which she explains that the visit of herself and Uncle Davie to Santa Maria for the purpose of having his will drawn and executed is being postponed from day to day on account of his illness, and in which she says: "He is going to make his will tomorrow he has bin talking to me a long time this morning telling me what to do and how to get along and what he wants done with his things his mules I have to keep as long as they live on this ranch they are down on John Rices place now on pasture he said Again this morning that he was going to leave me everything he had in the world." This is especially significant. The will was made on the 18th of August, and contains a clause providing for the mules. This not only shows the falsity of the declaration that the devise of everything to her was without her knowledge; it shows that she was fully informed as to the details of the provisions of the will in other respects; and this false declaration is coupled with a statement of his motive in making the will equally opposed to Mrs. Wyman's repeated statements in her letters to her husband to the effect that he had promised to give her everything, the evident design being to defeat any claim on the part of the husband, from whom she sought a divorce as soon as the property was distributed to her. Another item of conflicting evidence not entitled to be considered on a motion for a nonsuit, but to which an undue significance is accorded in the department opinion, is the refusal of Mrs. Wyman to ask for a promise in writing. Her whole letter, from which a few lines are quoted, and the whole correspondence show that the reason why she refused to ask for a written promise was because she was afraid of alarming Uncle Davie's suspicions by asking for a writing, and thought it more prudent to trust to his fulfillment of his repeated oral promises—a point in which her judgment was vindicated by the result. Another significant passage from a letter of May 23d is the following in reference to this particular land: "uncle Davie is going to build A new house and dig an artision well and fix up thing down their and we are going to go down their to live that is the way he is talking now he sais he wants to fix up A good home for me when he is gon so I will not have to work out any more he is going to have everything fine now I tell you; if he lives long eough to fix it up for me and he sais if he dont live to fix it up he wants me to carrie out his plans so he can see me working at it when he is in the spirit life and I tell him all rite I will do it." Writing July 16th she says: "you know that he told me just yesterday that when we get down their in our own house and get in the fall rent which will come in November then he is going to fix up his business and he is going to will me everything he has in the world." In the same letter she tells of the burning of a former will and proceeds: "now he will make one to me some of these days be fore long he told me so yesterday and wyman my Dear if can get that then you nor me will not have to work so hard any more nor we will not have to be apart we can live where we please we will have an income that will support us and more to." Again, referring to this land, she says: "uncle Davie says he will Be Redy to die when we get down their in the new house get the well dug and the duck pond full of watter get me all fixed to live then he will want to die and get out of my way." But it is not to these or any number of isolated expressions gathered from her letters that attention should be confined, persuasive as they are as to the fact that Uncle Davie had promised to leave her all his property generally, and this ranch in particular, in consideration of her services. The whole tenor of the correspondence, and the circumstances, including the making of the will, all tend to show that there was a contract, based upon a sufficient consideration, that such a will should be made. The order granting a nonsuit cannot be sustained upon the ground that there was no evidence of a contract relating to this land, and there is greater reason to suppose it was in fact based upon Justice VAN DYKE'S construction of the Constitution and Code in their definition of separate property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Alfred Leigh Glassell against Andrew Glassell and another, executors of the estate of Andrew Glassell, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. The deceased, Andrew Glassell, was the father and the guardian of the person and estate of the plaintiff herein, and this action is brought for the recovery of money alleged to be due from deceased as such guardian. The case was tried without a jury, and the court made findings and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for a certain sum of money found to have been due by the deceased as such guardian to the plaintiff. From this judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The deceased was appointed and qualified as guardian of plaintiff in September, 1880, at which time plaintiff was a minor. He attained his majority on the 24th day of August, 1897. Deceased died testate on the 28th day of January, 1901, and this action was commenced on December 4, 1901, and appellants pleaded and contend that the action was barred by subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, not founded on an instrument in writing," is barred in two years. It appears that when plaintiff became of age the deceased did not render any account as guardian, but continued to manage the ward's property as before; and, although the strict relation of guardian and ward had ceased at the ward's majority, still a fiduciary relation continued, and in such a case the authorities are somewhat conflicting as to when an action against the former guardian will be barred. But in the case at bar we need not discuss this general subject, for, in our opinion, the will of the deceased settles the question against appellants' contention. The plaintiff was the son of the deceased, and he, together with eight brothers and sisters, all children of the deceased, became entitled to certain property as heirs of their maternal grandfather, Dr. H. H. Toland, and this was the property which went into the hands of the deceased as guardian; the deceased being also guardian for several of the other children who were minors. In his will the deceased refers to this property of his children, and says: "After the payment of my just debts—inclusive of balances due & payable to my children or any of them on account of moneys received by me for their use from property derived from their grandfather, Dr. H. H. Toland," etc.; and he states certain balances due some of them, and, among others, a certain money balance due the plaintiff herein. Afterwards, in a codicil, he refers to a note which he owed to one C. A. Ware, and says: "I hereby expressly request my executors to pay this and all other notes and obligations referred to in this will without reference to any law of limitations which I positively repudiate & waive." This language clearly refers to all his obligations, including those to plaintiff and the other wards. It is not within the rule that a mere acknowledgment of a debt made to a stranger, and not to the creditor, is not binding. Such an acknowledgment is generally made without reference to the statute of limitations, and without intent to make a binding contract. In the case at bar the testator, having referred to various obligations, and expressly stated his obligation as guardian to respondent, the acknowledgment and waiver were clearly to and for the direct benefit of respondent; and in our opinion the testator clearly had the right to make such waiver. Indeed, the clause of the will of the testator, waiving and repudiating the statute of limitations and expressly directing his executors to pay all obligations notwithstanding such statute, is a part of his testamentary disposition of his property, which he had the right to make, and which his executors should enforce. He certainly could have directly bequeathed to respondent whatever balance there might be in his favor on a fair and correct squaring of the account, without reference to time or limitations; and that is substantially what he did. He expressed on the face of his will his intent that all his actual obligations, including that to respondent, should be paid without reference to the law of limitations; and there is no good reason why that testamentary intent should not be carried out by his executors as well as any other part of the will. It is contended by appellants that in 1897, after respondent's majority, there was a final settlement between him and the deceased of all matters growing out of the guardianship. There is, no doubt, some plausibility in this contention; but in the evidence as to the alleged settlement there was clearly a material conflict, and therefore we cannot disturb the findings of the trial court that there was not such a settlement.

The court below allowed interest on the amounts found due at 7 per cent. per annum, compounded annually, and appellants contend that the court erred in allowing compound interest. There is no fraud charged or found against the deceased touching his conduct as guardian. The court found, however, upon sufficient evidence, "that upon the receipt of said sums of money by the said deceased he immediately converted the same to his own use, depositing such and all of said sums to his own account in his own name in the bank where he kept his individual account, and that the said sums of money were intermingled with the funds of the said deceased, and all of said sums of money were used by the said Andrew Glassell, deceased, in his own business, mingled with his own funds in various investments"; that "said deceased never filed an inventory or appraisement, and never rendered any account in either of such guardianships, and never kept any account upon his books from which a proper accounting could be rendered to the said court"; and that "the said deceased, as guardian, never obtained any order from the court authorizing him to use any of the funds of the said plaintiff in the manner hereinbefore referred to, or in any manner whatever." Under these circumstances we cannot say that the allowance of compound interest was erroneous. Estate of Stott, 52 Cal. 403; In re Eschrich, 85 Cal. 101, 24 Pac. 634; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 44 Pac. 182; In re Clary, 112 Cal. 292, 44 Pac. 569. And for the above reasons, and others given by the court below, it was not erroneous to refuse compensation to the guardian.

It is objected that the court did not find on the question of the laches of respondent. In answer to this point it is sufficient to say, first, that this issue was not made by the pleadings, and, in the second place, there was no evidence upon which the court could have found such laches.

The foregoing are all the points which call for special notice. The correctness of the settlement of the account by the court is sustained by the evidence, and is, indeed, not very seriously contested by appellants.

It is proper to state, in justice to the memory of the deceased, Andrew Glassell, that he never intended to wrong respondent, or any of his wards. He was an able and conscientious business man, and no doubt used the funds of his wards to their advantage. He accumulated a large fortune, in comparison with which the property held by him as guardian of his ward's estate was small; and he left nearly all of this fortune to his children—the respondent herein receiving of this fortune about $100,000. The adverse criticism by appellants that under these circumstances respondent should not have brought this action against his father's estate, merely raises questions of sentiment and good taste. It does not affect the legal merits of the action.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte BERRY. (Cr. 1,229.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—REASONABLENESS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of showing an ordinance unreasonable is on the one attacking it on that ground.

2. COURTS—JUDICIAL NOTICE—AUTOMOBILES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, enacting that the court will take judicial notice of the true signification of all English words and phrases, the courts have common and current knowledge relating to automobiles.

3. COUNTY ORDINANCE—REASONABLENESS—AUTOMOBILE REGULATIONS.

A county ordinance prohibiting the running of automobiles on country roads between sunset and sunrise is not unreasonable.

In Bank. Application by Thomas C. Berry for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his release from custody on a charge of violating an ordinance. Writ discharged.

McFARLAND, J. There was an ordinance of the board of supervisors of the county of Marin, Cal., which, after prohibiting the use of automobiles on certain parts of some of the public roads of that county and regulating their use in other respects, provides as follows: "Sec. 8. No person shall run an automobile on any of the said unprohibited highways of Marin county between the hours of sunset of any day and of sunrise on the day following;" and a violation of the section is made punishable by a fine or imprisonment. The above-named Thomas C. Berry was convicted of a violation of said section 8, and judgment was rendered against him sentencing him to imprisonment. He appealed to the superior court of said county, and the judgment was there affirmed. Thereupon this present application is made on his behalf for a writ of habeas corpus, and his discharge is asked upon the ground that said section 8 of the ordinance is invalid and void for certain assigned reasons.

There is nothing in any of the positions taken by petitioner which requires special notice, except the position that the provision of the ordinance here in question is void because unreasonable; and, in our opinion, that position is not tenable. When the validity of an ordinance is attacked on the ground that it is unreasonable, the burden of showing its unreasonableness is upon the person attacking it. In Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. Ed. 527, where an ordinance was attacked for reasons similar to those asserted in the case at bar, the court said: "A municipal ordinance must be very clearly obnoxious to such objections as those made, or some one of them, before it will be declared invalid by the courts. Every intendment is to be indulged in favor of its validity, and all doubts resolved in a way to uphold the lawmaking power; and a contrary conclusion will never be reached upon light consideration." In the case at bar there is nothing in the record to show anything about the alleged unreasonableness of the ordinance except the ordinance itself, and the burden is on the petitioner to maintain that, upon its face, the ordinance is unreasonable. There is nothing in the record which shows with any particularity what an automobile is, and, of course, a court could not declare unreasonable a regulation about something of which it has no knowledge. Therefore, in order to at all consider the question here involved, we must assume judicial knowledge of an automobile and its characteristics and the consequences of its use, under the statutory provision that courts take judicial notice "of the true significance of all English words and phrases." Section 1875, Code Civ. Proc. We may assume, therefore, to have what is common and current knowledge about an automobile. Its use as a vehicle for traveling is comparatively recent. It makes an unusual noise. It can be, and usually is, made to go on common roads at great velocity—at a speed many times greater than that of ordinary vehicles hauled by animals; and, beyond doubt, it is highly dangerous when used on country roads, putting to great hazard the safety and lives of the mass of the people who travel on such roads in vehicles drawn by horses. Fearful accidents to persons driving animals which are frightened into unmanageable terror by automobiles are of common occurrence. And while there are usually laws regulating and limiting the speed at which they may be driven, it is matter of common knowledge that these laws are frequently violated, and that it is exceedingly difficult for officers, even in the daytime, to stop them when going at forbidden speed, and arrest the drivers. And it is apparent that this would be much more difficult to do in the nighttime. Moreover, in the nighttime even those drivers of automobiles who might be considerate of the safety of others would not be able to see an approaching team in time to take the proper precautions. Considering these matters, and many others which might be suggested, we see nothing unreasonable in the regulation—and it is only a regulation—which forbids the use of automobiles on country roads in the nighttime. Of course, if the use of automobiles gradually becomes more common, there may come a time when an ordinance like the one here in question would be unreasonable. As country horses are frequently driven into cities and towns, many of them will gradually become accustomed to the sight of automobiles, and the danger of their use on country roads will grow less. But the supervisors who passed this ordinance were dealing with present conditions in Marin county, and we are not prepared to say judicially that under present conditions the ordinance is so unreasonable as to be void.

We do not think it necessary to discuss the question further, because a general law has recently been passed by the State Legislature which probably supersedes the ordinance here in question, and the decision of the case at bar will not be of much value as a precedent.

The person on whose behalf this writ was applied for is remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and the writ is discharged.

SPINKS v. CLARK et al. (L. A. 1,378.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1905.)

1. CONTRACT — RESCISSION — FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

A contract may not be rescinded on the ground of fraudulent representations unless the representations were believed and acted upon.

2. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY — RESCISSION — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to rescind an exchange of plaintiff's real estate for corporate stock, evidence considered, and held sufficient to show that the exchange was not brought about by plaintiff's having acted on any false representations of defendants.

3. SAME — FRAUD — AGENCY — DEALINGS BETWEEN PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Where defendants were authorized by plaintiff to sell real estate, and placed a sign, with their names thereon, on the property, and received one or two offers, which they submitted to plaintiff, and which were declined, and subsequently plaintiff, having investigated certain corporate stock, transferred the real estate to the agents in exchange for stock in the corporation belonging to them, there was no such relation of principal and agent as could affect the validity of the exchange.

4. HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—EXCLUSION.

Where, in an action to rescind an exchange of plaintiff's real estate for corporate stock belonging to defendants, plaintiff was not permitted to answer a question as to what effect it would have had upon him if defendants had told him that they were exchanging their own shares instead of those of any other person, any error in the ruling was not prejudicial, plaintiff immediately thereafter stating that defendants' representations that they were not disposing of their stock was one of the inducements which brought about the transaction.

5. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—RESCISSION—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to rescind an exchange of plaintiff's real estate for corporate stock, it was stipulated that the real estate exceeded the value of the stock by a certain sum, basing the value of the stock on the market value, and that plaintiff had suffered financial damage to such extent, there was no error in limiting plaintiff, in the introduction of evidence as to the value of stock, to the market value as fixed by sales on a neighboring market, and in not allowing plaintiff to prove the value of the property or assets, or to show that the quoted market value was greater than the intrinsic value of the stock.

6. WITNESSES—EXAMINATION—REPETITION OF QUESTIONS.

There was no error in not permitting a witness to answer questions which had been fully answered by him in testimony previously given.

7. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—RESCISSION—EVIDENCE.

In an action to rescind an exchange of real estate for oil stock, evidence as to the amounts expended in exploration for oil on the lands of the corporation prior to its formation was properly excluded.

8. EVIDENCE—OPINION OF WITNESS.

A question to a witness as to whether in his opinion there was any such stable, fixed, or steady market price for shares of stock in corporations in that neighborhood that the demand would have withstood the putting upon the market of shares to the amount of all those exchanged was incompetent as calling for an opinion.

9. APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

In an action to rescind an exchange of real estate for the stock of an oil company there was no prejudicial error in sustaining an objection to a question to a witness on direct examination as to whether the market quotations of such oil stocks would be a fair criterion upon which to value large blocks of stock or the total capitalization of oil companies, the witness immediately after testifying that he could not say whether the quotations of the stock of the company in question, by which the assets would figure a certain sum, would represent a fair valuation or not.

10. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—FRAUD—RESCISSION—EVIDENCE.

There was no error in sustaining an objection to a question to defendant as to whether he had any arrangement whatever with any of the other stockholders relative to the delivery of shares of stock, or the manipulation or management or sale of shares of stock, or the fixing of prices in the company upon the market.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Suit by M. E. Spinks against Wesley Clark and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Byron Waters and Waters & Wylie, for appellant. Geo. J. Denis, Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, and Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to rescind a contract whereby certain real property of the plaintiff was exchanged for certain oil stock of defendants Clark & Bryan in the Westlake Oil Company. The exchange was effected June 6, 1900. The action was commenced September 21, 1901. The cause of action stated in the original complaint was one for the rescission of the contract upon the ground of fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of Clark & Bryan. On the trial the complaint was amended by adding thereto certain allegations designed to show, in addition to the actual fraud theretofore alleged, a case of constructive fraud, said allegations tending to show that Clark & Bryan were from January 6, 1897, to the date of the transaction in question, the agents of plaintiff, under a contract of employment for the sale of said real property, and that by reason of such agency Clark & Bryan became possessed of information as to the estimation in which plaintiff held the property, and he reposed faith and confidence in them to the effect that with reference to any sale or negotiation of said property they would use their efforts to obtain the best obtainable price for him. Anna F. Leach was made a defendant because she had before the commencement of the action become the holder of the record title to the real property. The findings and judgment were in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is practically conceded that as to defendant Leach the judgment and order must be affirmed. The findings of the court, supported by testimony free from conflict, are to the effect that she purchased the real property for a valuable consideration, viz., $16,000, which was the full value thereof, without any notice whatever of any claim on the part of plaintiff, and without any notice of any prior dealings between plaintiff and Clark & Bryan with relation to said property.

Plaintiff contends that, although the real property may have found its way into the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, the contract of exchange may nevertheless be rescinded, and Clark & Bryan adjudged, in the event of such rescission, to deliver the money received for such property in lieu of the property itself. It will be assumed for the purposes of this decision that plaintiff's claim in this regard is well founded.

The findings of the court are attacked upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain them, and this attack presents the main questions for consideration on this appeal.

The alleged fraudulent misrepresentations may, for the purposes of the discussion, be divided into two classes, the first being representations of Clark & Bryan to the effect that they would not exchange any of their stock in said corporation for plaintiff's real property; that they were not disposing of any of their stock, and that the stock which it was proposed to exchange belonged to a stockholder resident in San Francisco; and the second being certain alleged representations as to the value of the stock, its dividend producing capacity, the freedom of the corporation from debt, and that the quoted value of the stock upon the stock board was based upon the intrinsic value of the property of the corporation and the merits of the business, and was not at all fictitious or inflated in any way.

To the extent stated above, the trial court found that the representations of the first class had been made. As to the second class, the court found that none of the alleged representations had been made, except a single one to the effect that the corporation had paid 2 per cent. dividends, and this representation the court found to be true. A careful examination of the record makes it clear that the findings as to the precise representations made are sufficiently supported by evidence. The evidence is also sufficient to support the finding that the representation made as to dividends was true.

This leaves us to consider only the effect upon the transaction of the representations of the first class, viz., those as to the indisposition of Clark & Bryan to part with their own stock, and the further representation, in aid thereof, to the effect that the stock to be transferred belonged to a San Francisco stockholder. The trial court found that no representation of any kind was made by defendants to plaintiff for the purpose of inducing him to make such exchange; that plaintiff did not act upon the faith of any representation made by defendants, and consented to such exchange and made his conveyance without regard to any such representation. It is clear that if this finding is sustained by sufficient testimony it is a complete answer to plaintiff's claim, so far as alleged actual fraud is concerned.

The well-settled rule in this regard, as stated by Mr. Pomeroy, is as follows, viz.: "Another element of a fraudulent misrepresentation, without which there can be no remedy, legal or equitable, is that it must be relied upon by the party to whom it is made, and must be an immediate cause of his conduct which alters his legal relations. Unless an untrue statement is believed and acted upon, it can occasion no legal injury. It is essential, therefore, that the party addressed should trust the representation, and be so thoroughly induced by it, that, judging from the ordinary experience of mankind, in the absence of it he would not, in all reasonable probability, have entered into the contract or other transaction." Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 890. See, also, Civ. Code, § 1568. The evidence was clearly sufficient to support the conclusion of the court that the representations under discussion did not operate to induce action on the part of plaintiff. A brief statement as to some of the evidence will make this plain.

Plaintiff purchased the real property in January, 1897, through Clark & Bryan, who were partners in the real estate business, and who, in that transaction, were acting for the vendor, a Mrs. Haley. He paid $12,000 therefor. The improvements on the property were only of nominal value, and the rents therefrom were very small in proportion to the investment, and this condition continued during the whole period of plaintiff's ownership. He apparently purchased purely for purposes of speculation, and, according to his testimony, at once told Clark & Bryan to put the property on the market for $15,000. No proposition of purchase or exchange that was satisfactory to him was ever made until the idea of exchanging the same for oil stock occurred to him. In the meantime oil in considerable quantities had been discovered in Los Angeles, and in January, 1900, the Westlake Oil Company was incorporated, both Clark & Bryan being among the original incorporators. Clark was the secretary. This company acquired the property in the supposed oil-bearing territory, and was successful in producing oil in paying quantities. Prior to June 1, 1901, three dividends of 2 per cent. each on the capital stock were paid. The stock was bought and sold on the market, and the property was apparently a valuable one, both in the eyes of the public and those interested in the corporation.

Plaintiff was very much disappointed in his real estate investment because of the failure of the property to appreciate in value, and desired some income producing property. He had also clearly become infected with the "oil fever." He personally commenced investigating as to the merits of Westlake oil stock. He visited the wells of the company many times, and talked to the superintendent in charge, and testified that, from his examination on the field, it looked like a good proposition. He knew that dividends were being paid. In his investigations, he did not seek any information from either Clark or Bryan, beyond asking casually on chance meetings how Westlake was getting on, and receiving the natural reply that it was getting on finely. Finally, and within a few days of the transaction in question, he had become so firmly impressed as to the merits of Westlake that he agreed to accept the offer of another stockholder, one Hughes, of 16,000 shares of the stock, for his real property. He had gone so far as to have his abstract of title continued for Hughes, and there was ample testimony to support the conclusion that he was fully convinced, solely by reason of his own investigation and observation, that the stock was a good investment. According to his statement, the Hughes transaction fell through only because his wife objected to signing the deed, being doubtful as to the advisability of the exchange. There was testimony that he at this time said to a friend: "I have been looking over this oil matter pretty thoroughly. I have spent a good deal of time at it, and I have come to the conclusion that Westlake Oil Stock is one of the best oil stocks in the market today. * * * I have been over the grounds. * * * I find a great deal of oil out there. I find that there is a great deal of land that is undeveloped in their territory, and that if the wells that they put down will prove as good as the wells they have down there is no failure in the company. I can't see where it could fail."

Under these circumstances, he went to the office of Clark & Bryan, and there saw Bryan. According to Bryan's testimony, plaintiff asked him, "What about Westlake?" and Bryan replied: "Westlake is a pretty good thing. There is only one point to be taken into consideration—if the wells continue to pump as they are now. As to that you are just as good a judge as I am." Plaintiff then asked him about trading stock for his land, and said he wanted 18,000 shares for it. Bryan testified: "I told him it was paying good dividends, and real estate was quiet, and that I didn't know whether we wanted to trade or not. Also that the stock was in Clark's exclusive control, and he would have to submit the proposition to him." According to defendants' testimony, beyond subsequently calling Spinks up on the telephone and telling him they would send Lee McConnell, a broker, to see him in the matter, this was the only personal interview of either of the defendants with plaintiff relative to the exchange of his property for stock, prior to the actual closing of the transaction on June 6th. According to defendants' evidence as to the interviews of June 6th, plaintiff came, after accepting the proposition, simply for the purpose of closing the matter up, giving his deed and accepting the stock, and no representation of any kind was made thereat, except such as may be implied from the requirement that the deed should be made to the San Francisco stockholder as grantee.

The actual negotiations for the exchange were had between plaintiff and Lee McConnell, the broker sent by Clark & Bryan to plaintiff, in pursuance of the interview between Bryan and plaintiff. The testimony of McConnell upon the subject of these negotiations is to the effect that McConnell approached plaintiff not as a confidential agent at all, but as a mere middleman. He asked him if he cared to entertain a trade of his lot for Westlake. Plaintiff replied that he would; that he had already partly agreed to make such a deed with Hughes, and his wife objected to signing the deed. McConnell told him he could offer him 16,000 shares, and plaintiff proposed to make the exchange for 18,000 shares. McConnell subsequently met him, and told him his proposition was accepted, and that the matter should be closed up at the office of Clark & Bryan, as it subsequently was. In his first interview with plaintiff it is true that he told him that he thought that the stock offered him belonged to a San Francisco stockholder, as he had been informed. He also was quite positive upon the proposition that he informed plaintiff that Clark & Bryan were both buying and selling stock.

Taking all this evidence and other evidence as to the circumstances and conduct of the parties in support thereof as true, as we must in view of the findings of the trial court, it is apparent that previous to any representation of any kind on the part of Clark or Bryan plaintiff had, as the result of his own investigations, determined to exchange his real property for stock in this company, regardless of the source from which it came; that he himself initiated the negotiations with Clark & Bryan before the Hughes proposition had been finally rejected, for the purpose of determining whether he could not obtain a better proposition from them than Hughes had made; that he then offered his land to them for 18,000 shares of their Westlake stock; that they had the right to assume, and did assume, from his conduct and declarations, that it was entirely immaterial to him whose stock was given him for his lot, theirs or another's, and adopted a somewhat elaborate method of representing that they were not disposing of their own stock in this deal, not with any design of influencing his conduct in the matter, but simply for the purpose stated in their letter of June 2, 1900, to the San Francisco stockholder, viz., to prevent the impression getting out that they were selling or trading their stock, and that such representation had not the slightest effect in the way of inducing plaintiff to consent to the carrying through of the precise deal he had himself proposed.

The finding of the court upon the issue raised by the amendment designed to show a case of constructive fraud is also attacked. From what has already been said as to the evidence, it is manifest that there was ample support therein for the conclusion that Clark & Bryan were not acting as the agents of or for plaintiff in this particular transaction; that neither plaintiff nor any one else thought that they were; that plaintiff was acting for himself upon his own judgment based upon his own investigations as to the relative merit of his real property and Westlake stock, and reposed no faith or confidence whatever in Clark & Bryan in the matter; and that he regarded McConnell not as his agent bound to obtain for him the best bargain he could, but at most as a mere middleman, coming from owners of stock with a proposition for exchange. The court was fully justified in finding, further, that Clark & Bryan had not, by reason of any transaction with plaintiff, become possessed of any information whatever as to the estimation in which he then held the real property, or his desire to dispose of the same, except as far as such information was given by his direct offer to them to exchange the same for 18,000 shares of their stock. Under these circumstances, the contention of plaintiff as to the effect of the prior alleged general agency of Clark & Bryan to sell or exchange this property would appear to be without force.

It cannot be reasonably claimed under the evidence that Clark & Bryan were ever agents of plaintiff to any greater extent than being orally authorized in January, 1897, to put his property on the market for $15,000, and in pursuance of such authorization placing and maintaining a "For Sale" sign, with their names thereon, on the property, and regarding the property as property concerning which they were authorized to receive and communicate to the owner offers of purchase, expecting to receive from him a compensation in the event of a sale, and concerning which they had submitted one or two offers which had been declined. It may be conceded, purely for the purposes of this decision, that as to any proposition submitted to plaintiff by Clark & Bryan, assuming to act under this authority, or under such circumstances as to warrant plaintiff in assuming that they were acting in his behalf, Clark & Bryan would be held to be the agents of plaintiff, and within the operation of the universally recognized equitable rule that forbids the uniting by the agent of his personal and his representative character in the same transaction.

But this concession, which is the utmost that plaintiff can reasonably claim, cannot avail him here. Clark & Bryan were not assuming to act for him in this matter, they had acquired no information as to the desire or opinion of plaintiff as to this matter by reason of their so-called agency, there was nothing in their prior dealings which created any relation of trust and confidence as to this property, and the trial court found upon sufficient evidence "that plaintiff did not in * * * any of the transactions set forth in the complaint relative to the disposition of said property * * * rely upon or believe that the said Clark & Bryan, or either of them, * * * were acting for him at all." In other words, whatever may be said as to any general agency on the part of Bryan & Clark in regard to this property, it was a thing entirely separate and apart from this transaction, which can in no way affect its validity.

The case of Burke v. Bours, 92 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 57, relied upon by plaintiff as being "the closest akin" of California cases to this case, was a case where the property of the principal was secretly purchased by the agent or subagent in the very transaction, as well as being a case where such agent was invested with some discretion as to the price by a nonresident principal. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of the decision in that case, or as to the soundness of the views expressed in the opinion, but we cannot see the application thereof to the case at bar.

Various other reasons are advanced by counsel for defendants in support of the findings and decision of the trial court, but, in view of our conclusions upon the propositions already discussed, it is unnecessary to consider them. From what has been said, it is apparent that it must be held here that the conclusion of the trial court that there was no actionable fraud, actual or constructive, on the part of defendants, cannot be disturbed.

Certain rulings of the trial court excluding offered evidence are complained of. The plaintiff was asked what effect it would have had upon him if Mr. Clark had told him at the time of the transaction that it was Clark & Bryan who were exchanging the 18,000 shares of Westlake stock for his lot, and an objection to the question on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and called for a conclusion of the witness, was sustained. If it be assumed that this ruling was erroneous, we have no doubt that the error must be held to have been without prejudice. The plaintiff was immediately after this ruling asked, "State what induced you to exchange your property for this stock?" and answered, "Relying upon Mr. Bryan and Mr. Clark—both told me in reference to the production of the Westlake Oil Company and the dividends that they were then paying; and furthermore upon the statement that they made to me that they were not selling or disposing of their stock, but, on the contrary, were acquiring more stock. I reasoned—naturally reasoned—that they were in a position to know the facts in the case and were acting upon them; consequently it would be thoroughly safe for me to do likewise." By this answer, plaintiff in terms, declared that the representation that Clark & Bryan were not disposing of their stock was one of the inducements which operated to bring about his consent to the transaction. This was substantially what was called for by the question to which the objection was sustained, and all that was essential, if believed by the court, to make out plaintiff's case so far as the matter of acting under the influence of the representation was concerned. If the trial court did not, in the light of the other evidence in the case, believe the statement made by the witness as to the causes operating upon his mind to produce his consent to the transaction—and the findings of the court make it plain that it did not—it is manifest that a further statement of the plaintiff to the effect that he would not have completed this contract in the absence of such a representation could not have changed the views of the court or affected the result.

Plaintiff further complains that by the rulings of the court he was limited in the introduction of evidence as to the value of the shares of stock of the Westlake Oil Company to the market value as fixed by quotation of sales of such stock in the Los Angeles market, and was not allowed to prove the value of the property or assets of the corporation, or to introduce evidence to show that the quoted market value was greater than the intrinsic value of the stock. It clearly appeared that there was a market value for the stock of this corporation, and it was stipulated by the parties that on June 6, 1900, the market value of the realty was at least $500 in excess of the market value of the 18,000 shares of stock, which excess of value, it was further stipulated, was an amount which would justify a finding that plaintiff suffered material injury by reason of such exchange, in case the court should find for plaintiff on the ground of fraud. This stipulation, regardless of other objections to the proposed evidence, renders the rulings of the court entirely immaterial on this appeal, so far as such evidence may have been pertinent upon the question as to damage sufficient to sustain an action for rescission on the ground of fraud. The court found that the alleged representations to the effect that the quoted value of the stock upon the stock board was based upon the intrinsic value of the property of the corporation, and that the 18,000 shares of stock were legitimately and actually worth $18,000, were never made. These findings made it unnecessary, of course, to determine whether such alleged representations would have been true or false, and so far as that question is concerned the exclusion of such evidence could not have prejudiced plaintiff.

It is urged, however, that the proposed evidence was in some way, not clearly specified, relevant to the issue of fraud. Assuming that evidence as to the actual value of the assets of the corporation, as distinguished from the selling price of the stock in the market, was admissible, as bearing upon the motive and intent of Clark & Bryan in this transaction, we find no prejudicial error in any of the five rulings pointed out by plaintiff's counsel. The question asked the witness Jones as to whether the accounts of the Westlake Oil Company which had been offered in evidence showed the amount of investment of money in the works of the company had been fully answered by him in testimony previously given.

The question as to what the books of the original lessees, who sublet to the corporation, showed as to the amounts that had been expended by them upon the property in their explorations for oil, was one the determination of which could not have affected the decision. The question before the court in this connection, looking at the matter according to the theory most favorable to plaintiff, was, at the most, as to the value of the assets of the corporation at and about the time of the transaction here involved, and evidence as to the amounts expended in exploration for oil upon the lands of the corporation prior to the formation of the corporation was so remote as to throw practically no light upon that question. It should be said in this connection that, as we understand the record before us, plaintiff was allowed to introduce in evidence all the books of the corporation.

The question asked the witness McCartney on direct examination as to whether in his opinion there was any such stable, fixed, or steady market price for shares of stock in oil companies in Los Angeles that the demand would have withstood the putting upon that market on June 6, 1900, of shares of the Westlake Oil Company to the amount of 18,000 shares, was clearly subject to the objection of incompetency. It called for the opinion of the witness upon matters that were not the subject of opinion testimony.

There was certainly no prejudicial error in sustaining the objection to the question asked the witness Woolacott, on direct examination, as to whether the market quotations of Los Angeles oil stocks "would be a fair criterion upon which to value large blocks of stock, or the total capitalization of oil companies." So far as the question was applicable to the particular stock in question the witness immediately after testified, "I could not say whether the quotations of the Westlake Oil Company's stock by which the aggregated assets of the company would figure $400,000 would represent a fair valuation of its assets or not."

We cannot say that the court erred in sustaining the objection to the question asked Clark on his direct examination by plaintiff as to whether he had "any arrangement whatever with any of the other stockholders relative to the delivery of shares of stock, or the manipulation or management or sale of shares of stock, or the fixing of prices of shares of stock in that company, upon the market, prices upon the market of stock in that company." The question was very general and indefinite, and the precise object thereof not clearly apparent. The mere fact that Clark may have had some arrangement with some one or more stockholders relative to the method by which their stock should be placed on the market, or the prices at which the same should be sold, would not necessarily show a condition of affairs material to any issue in the case. Much would depend on the character of the arrangement and the acts of the parties thereunder. If plaintiff had in mind any particular kind of arrangement or action of Clark in this regard, which would have thrown light upon the questions involved, he should have asked specifically regarding the same, or at least should have stated to the trial court what he expected to show. The question not being such as to itself indicate the materiality or relevancy of the evidence sought to be elicited thereby, and plaintiff having failed to acquaint the court below with the precise object thereof, the court was justified in sustaining an objection thereto.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Objections—Complaint—Sufficiency.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, gives a lien for materials used in the construction of any well, and a complaint alleged that a lien was claimed for materials furnished a certain "oil development" company to be used in the construction and drilling of a well. Held that, in the absence of any objection to the complaint in the trial court, the allegations brought the case within the statute; a contention that the complaint showed that the only materials furnished were machinery for the drilling and construction of an oil well, and that the only provisions of the lien law applicable were those relating to liens on mining claims under which law no lien is given for materials, being untenable.

2. Mechanics' Liens — Enforcement — Complaint — Allegations — Time of Filing Lien.

An allegation of a complaint in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien to the effect that the liens were filed for record within 30 days after the completion of the work was sufficient.

3. Pleading—Verification.

Though Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requires the claim of lien in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien to be verified, it is not necessary that the complaint be verified.

4. Mechanics' Liens—Claim—Verification by Agent.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that the claim of a mechanic's lien may be verified by any person who is possessed of sufficient knowledge on the subject to make the verification, one who declares in the verification that he is the "agent and manager" of the claimant may properly make the verification, section 446 relating to the verification of pleadings by the parties not being applicable to mechanic's lien cases.

5. Same—Verification—Sufficiency.

The fact that the verification of a claim of mechanic's lien stated that the verification was made by the agent of the "plaintiff" did not render it insufficient, it manifestly meaning that the affiant was the agent of the claimant.

6. Same — Complaint—Allegations—Lienable Interests.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, declares that if the person who caused any well to be constructed owned less than a fee-simple estate in the land then only his interest therein is subject to a mechanic's lien. Held, that where a complaint in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien for the furnishing of materials to be used in the construction of a well alleged that one of defendants was the owner of the well and its appurtenances, and the owner of an interest in the land, the complaint showed a lienable interest, though the action was dismissed as to the landowner.

7. Appeal—Objections—Complaint—Sufficiency.

Where a complaint in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien for materials furnished to be used in the construction of a well alleged that one of defendants was the owner and holder of an interest in the land, and owner of the well and of the appliances pertaining thereto, an objection that the complaint did not sufficiently indicate the nature and extent of the interest was without merit, when made for the first time on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Parke & Lacy Company against the Inter Nos Oil & Development Company and another to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendants Inter Nos Oil & Development Company and James A. Wilson from a judgment against them based on their default, they having failed to appear in the action after having been regularly served with process. The action was one to foreclose certain mechanics' liens of plaintiff and its assignors upon a "well" and certain lands alleged to be necessary for "the convenient use, occupation, and operation thereof." It was alleged both in the complaint and in the notices of lien that the "Occidental Oil Company," a corporation, a defendant herein, was "the owner and reputed owner of the land and premises," and that the defendant Inter Nos Oil & Development Company was "the owner and holder of an interest in said land, and the owner of the well herein mentioned thereon, and of all the machinery, casing, tools, implements, and appliances and structures connected therewith or appertaining thereto." It was alleged that defendant Wilson claimed some right or title therein, but that the same was subject and subordinate to plaintiff's claim of lien. The alleged liens were for "materials furnished" the Inter Nos Oil & Development Company, to be used "in the construction and drilling" of said well, and which were actually used in the "drilling, construction, and operation" of said well. The action was dismissed as to the defendant Occidental Oil Company, and judgment was thereupon entered, by default, against appellants, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, adjudging the amounts found due to be a lien upon such well and its appurtenances, and upon the interest and estate of the defendant Inter Nos Oil & Development Company in the land upon which the same was situated, the same being 40 acres of land in section 9, T. 32 S., R. 23 E., M. D. B. & M.

1. It is contended that the complaint shows that the only materials furnished were machinery for the drilling and construction of an oil well, and that the only provisions of the lien law applicable to the case are therefore those relating to liens on mining claims, and that under those provisions no lien is given for materials.

The assumption that the complaint shows that the well in question was an oil well, or a well constructed in exploring for oil, is not warranted. From the corporate name of the appellant corporation it may be surmised that such was the case, but there is no allegation compelling such a conclusion. The allegations in regard to it refer to it simply as a "well," and it is entirely consistent with everything stated in the complaint that it was constructed simply for the purpose of obtaining water, and is only a well for water.

It is, in terms, provided in section 1183, Code Civ. Proc., that any person "performing labor or furnishing materials to be used in the construction of any * * * well, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done or materials furnished." The allegations of the complaint bring the case within this provision, and we are not called upon to decide whether this provision or the one referring to mining claims would be applicable to an oil well, it not appearing that this was an oil well. There is, however, much force in the argument that any and all wells, for whatever purpose constructed, fall within the provision already quoted, and that when the word "well" was inserted therein by amendment in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 33, c. 35), and in section 1185, Code Civ. Proc., at the same time (St. 1899, p. 24, c. 23), it was contemplated thereby to include oil wells. The complaint does not show that the materials furnished consisted of "machinery for the drilling and construction" of the well. The allegations are consistent with the theory that the "materials" alleged to be furnished were furnished to become and did become parts of the completed well. It may be that the complaint is uncertain in regard to both of the matters here discussed, but it must be remembered that we are dealing with a complaint to which no objection was urged in the lower court. In such a case mere defects in the manner of stating facts relied on cannot be considered, and "in aid of the judgment the complaint must now receive as favorable an interpretation as its general scope will warrant." Fudickar v. East Riverside Irrigation Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 34, 41 Pac. 1024, 1025.

2. It is suggested that the complaint does not state a cause of action in that it does not show that the liens were filed for record within the statutory time. The allegation as to this, which is the same as to each of the liens, is "that on, to wit, the 3d day of May, 1902, within 30 days after the completion of the said well, * * * plaintiff filed for record" etc. This must here be held sufficient. Wood v. Oakland Transit Co., 107 Cal. 500, 502, 40 Pac. 806, 807. The allegation must also be held to refer to the actual completion.

3. It is urged that the verification of the complaint and those of the recorded claims of lien which are attached as exhibits to the complaint were insufficient. There is no law requiring the complaint in an action of this character to be verified. The statute requires that the claim of lien "must be verified by the oath of himself or of some other person." Code Civ. Proc. § 1187. The claim of plaintiff is verified by one who declares in the verification that he is "the agent and manager in Kern county of the claimant," that of assignor R. H. Herron Co. by one who declares that he is the agent and manager of such claimant, and that of assignor National Supply Company by one who declares that he is the agent and manager of the "plaintiff." The contention appears to be that these declarations do not show that the persons were authorized by law to verify the claims, and that as to the National Supply Company the statement that the party is the agent of the "plaintiff" refers to the plaintiff in this action, and not to the lien claimant whose claim was verified.

These are the only objections made to the verifications, and they are without merit. Under the only statute applicable (section 1187, Code Civ. Proc.) the claim of lien may be verified by any person who is possessed of sufficient knowledge upon the subject to make the verification, and the particular relation that he bears to the claimant is immaterial. Section 446, Code Civ. Proc., relied on by appellants, is applicable solely to pleadings in actions or proceedings, and a claim of lien is not such a pleading. Some of the cases cited by appellants upon this question relate to pleadings, and others were decided in accord with express statutory requirements.

The statement in the verification of the claim of the National Supply Company, that the person verifying is the agent of the "plaintiff," manifestly means that he is the agent of such claimant. There was then no action, and technically no "plaintiff." The further objection that the notary public failed to sufficiently set forth in his subscription of the verification of the claim of lien of plaintiff the name of the county in which he was authorized to act is without foundation in fact.

4. Upon the oral argument the appellants for the first time made the objection that the action having been dismissed as to the Occidental Oil Company, alleged to be the owner and reputed owner of the land upon which the well was constructed, no lienable interest in the appellant Inter Nos Oil & Development Company is shown by the complaint. The allegations of the complaint as to the ownership of such appellant have already been noticed, viz., that it was the owner of the well and its appurtenances, and that it was "the owner and holder of an interest" in the land. As to the well and its appurtenances, the allegations of the complaint are undoubtedly sufficient, and fully support the judgment. Any interest owned by such appellant in the land was also, under the provisions of section 1185, Code Civ. Proc., subject to the liens, and the lien was adjudged only upon such interest as the appellant had.

As against the objection that the complaint does not sufficiently indicate the nature and extent of the interest of such appellant in the land, made for the first time on appeal, the complaint is certainly sufficient to support the judgment. We do not decide the question as to whether it would have been sufficient in the face of a special demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

147 Cal. 479

VINSON et al. v. LOS ANGELES PAC. R. CO. (L. A. 1,365.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—DISCRETIONARY RULINGS—RELIEF FROM DEFAULT.

Whether or not the circumstances of a particular case are such that a mistake or inadvertence of a party should be excused is a question for the court to which application for relief against a default is made, and the Supreme Court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the lower court unless a clear abuse of discretion is apparent, especially where the discretion is exercised in favor of granting such relief.

2. DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL—PREPARATION OF STATEMENT—RELIEF FROM DEFAULT.

Defendant's motion for a new trial was submitted May 23d and denied July 21st. The order of denial appeared in a daily newspaper, which contained court news, and to which defendant's attorneys subscribed, but which the attorney having the matter in charge failed to read on the day the order appeared therein, as he was busily engaged in other matters. Neither of defendant's attorneys had actual notice that the order had been made until August 1st, and on the next day notice of motion for an order relieving defendant from its default in failing to prepare and serve its statement and for extension of time to so do was given, and on August 4th the motion was heard and granted. Held, that the inadvertence or neglect of defendant's attorneys was excusable, and it was not an abuse of discretion to grant the motion.

3. SAME.

Where defendant failed to prepare and serve a statement within 10 days after the denial of its motion for new trial, it was competent for the court to relieve defendant from its default if excusable; and the granting of such relief was not premature, although no "order" had been made against defendant in the matter.

4. SAME — ORDERS—FINALITY—RECONSIDERATION.

The court on August 4th entered an order relieving defendant from its default in failing to file its statement within 10 days after the denial of motion for new trial. On December 13th the engrossed statement was presented, and the court refused to settle the same for the ostensible reason that it was not served within the time prescribed by law, but the theory of the court's action was that the former order might be held premature. Thereupon defendant gave notice of a motion for relief on the ground of inadvertence and excusable neglect, and on December 15th the court granted the motion and settled the statement. Held that, conceding that the order of December 15th was beyond the power of the court, as it had finally disposed of the matter on the 13th, yet the order of the 13th was objectionable for the same reason in that the matter was settled by the order of August 4th, and the latter order would be regarded as finally relieving defendant from its default.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT—SUPERIORS IN SERVICE—SCOPE OF AUTHORITY.

An order of a railroad that a roadmaster should be in charge of all work in connection with handling gravel, and that trainmen on gravel trains should obey his orders, did not render a motorman on a gravel train subject to the orders of the roadmaster in moving and managing the train, where it was thoroughly understood by both the roadmaster and the motorman that the order gave the former authority over the train only in the matter of construction and repair, as to where it was to be taken, etc., and the motorman was the sole responsible party in operating the train and taking precautions against collisions with other trains.

6. SAME—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—AVAILABILITY TO SERVANT.

Negligence on the part of a railroad in allowing two trains to make a trip without orders from some one knowing where all trains were, and leaving it to the motorman of one train to determine how the two trains should pass each other, the road having but a single track, was not available to support a recovery for injuries to the motorman, whose special duty it was to know the position of the other train, and to avoid collision with it.

7. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A motorman of a work train, whose duty it was to look out for another train, was guilty of contributory negligence in case of a collision with the other train, if he failed to look at the bulletin board on which the movements of the other train were posted, or, having looked, failed to remember the location of such train.

8. SAME.

The motorman of a work train, who knew, or should have known, of the proximity of another train approaching his train in an opposite direction, and who nevertheless ran his train into and through a fog so dense that he could not see more than 200 feet, without taking the precaution of ringing his gong or complying with the instructions of the railroad to send a flagman ahead of his train, in consequence of which the trains collided, was guilty of contributory negligence in law.

9. NONSUIT—WHEN GRANTED.

In an action for the death of a servant, where the evidence shows that the servant was guilty of contributory negligence in law, a nonsuit should be granted.

Action by Jennie Vinson and others against the Los Angeles Pacific Railroad Company.

See 74 Pac. 757.

John D. Pope and Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for appellant. Waters & Wylie and William Wylie, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action brought by the widow and minor children of Elmer Vinson, deceased, for damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of his death, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. The action was tried by a jury, which gave a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $5,000, and from the judgment entered thereon defendant has appealed.

A motion for a new trial was made upon the minutes of the court, and denied. No appeal was taken from such order. It is contended that the statement settled after the denial of the motion for a new trial should not be considered on this appeal for the reason that the defendant did not serve its proposed statement upon plaintiffs' attorneys within 10 days after the entry of the order denying the motion for a new trial. Upon the showing made by defendant's attorneys to the judge of the trial court defendant was finally relieved from the effect of its default, and the statement settled. It is claimed by plaintiffs that the showing made was not sufficient to authorize the trial judge to relieve defendant from such default, and their objections, the evidence in relation to the matter, and the proceedings of the judge thereon have been properly preserved and set out in the statement, so that the rulings of the court thereon are before us for review.

The motion for a new trial was submitted to the trial court on May 23, 1902, and taken under advisement. The order denying the same was made and entered on July 21, 1902. One of defendant's attorneys was absent from Los Angeles from July 20th to July 30th, and neither of defendant's attorneys had actual notice that such order had been made until August 1, 1902—11 days after the making thereof. On the next day, August 2, 1902, counsel for defendant gave notice of a motion to be made on August 4, 1902, for an order relieving defendant from its default in failing to prepare and serve its statement, and for an extension of time to so do. The ground of the motion was inadvertence and excusable neglect on the part of said attorneys, the affidavit of the attorney who had the matter specially in charge being to the effect that he was very much occupied with other matters at and about the time the order was made, and that he had inadvertently failed to notice that the order had been made. Concededly, no service of notice of the making of the order was required by the law, and it was the duty of the attorneys of the moving party to ascertain as to the entry of any such order. See Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 Pac. 831.

It appeared that there was a daily newspaper in Los Angeles known as the Los Angeles Daily Journal, which reported each day the proceedings of the superior court of Los Angeles county for the preceding day, and that many of the attorneys of Los Angeles, including defendant's attorneys, were subscribers of this paper, and used the same for the purpose of ascertaining as to such proceedings. In this paper, on July 22, 1902, was published in the appropriate place a statement as follows, viz.: "3775, Vinson vs. L. A. & Pacific Ry. Co. Motion for new trial denied." The attorney of defendant who had this matter in charge testified that, although he ordinarily took note of matters published in such paper relating to cases in which he was interested, he was so very much occupied with professional engagements that by inadvertence he had failed to read the publication of July 22, 1902. We cannot say that the court abused the discretion confided to it in granting defendant relief from its default in this matter. Whether or not the circumstances of a particular case are such that the mistake or inadvertence should be excused is a question the determination of which must, of necessity, be left largely to the court to which application is made; and it is well settled that this court will not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of that tribunal, except in a case where a clear abuse of discretion is apparent. Particularly is this so where the discretion is exercised in favor of the granting of the relief sought, as such action tends to bring about a conclusion on the merits, which is always to be desired. O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105. It has been said by this court that where the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate in such a matter it is better, as a general rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application. Watson v. S. F. & Humboldt Bay R. Co., 41 Cal. 17. The inadvertence or neglect here was one that well might occur to a reasonably careful man, there is no pretense of bad faith, and that application for relief was made so promptly after the expiration of the 10 days that no appreciable injury could have been caused to plaintiffs by the delay.

On August 4, 1902, after hearing the parties, the trial court granted defendant's application for relief, and also made an order granting defendant 20 days' further time within which to prepare and serve its statement. Subsequently, at the time fixed for settling the statement, plaintiffs objected to the settlement thereof upon various grounds, including the objection that the statement had not been served within the time allowed by law. The court overruled the objection, heard the proposed amendments, and gave directions for the engrossment of the statement. On December 13, 1902, the engrossed statement was presented, and the court refused "to settle said statement for the reason that said statement was not prepared and served within the time prescribed by law." Thereupon notice was given of a motion for relief from said order on the ground of inadvertence and excusable neglect upon the showing theretofore made. On December 15, 1902, over the objections of plaintiffs, the court granted the motion and settled the statement. The particular objection made to the granting of this relief was that the court had, by refusing to settle the statement on December 13, 1902, finally decided the matter, and was without power, especially in the absence of a further showing, to vacate its order. If there be any force in this contention of plaintiffs, it is equally applicable to the order of December 13, 1902, refusing to settle the statement upon the ground therein stated, for by its order of August 4, 1902, the court had determined the same, showing sufficient to excuse the delay in the service of the statement, and had relieved defendant from its default in regard thereto. The theory of the trial court in refusing to settle the statement on December 13th appears from the record to have been that it might be held that its prior order granting relief was premature, and that no such order could be made in advance of some order made against defendant in the matter, and that this order was made for the very purpose of allowing defendant to make its application for relief. We know of no reason why the order of August 4th should be held to have been prematurely made. The default of defendant had then occurred, and the effect thereof was to render any further proceedings in the matter of the settlement ineffectual, in the absence of an order relieving from such default. It was within the power of the court to relieve defendant therefrom within the time prescribed by statute, and this it did by its order of August 4th. We do not hold that a court would not have the power, under any circumstances, to reconsider its determination not to settle a statement, for it is not necessary to consider that question here; but we simply hold that, if the objection of plaintiffs is well taken, it is equally applicable to the order of December 13th, relied on by them as the basis of their objection, and the order of August 4th relieving defendant from its default must stand as the final order in regard thereto.

Coming to the merits of the appeal, at the conclusion of plaintiffs' case, defendant made a motion for a nonsuit upon the ground, among others, that it affirmatively appeared from the evidence introduced by plaintiffs that, if the death of deceased had been caused by any negligence, it was the negligence of the deceased himself. The answer of defendant, besides containing a denial of any negligence on its part, affirmatively alleged negligence on the part of deceased contributing directly and proximately to his death. The court denied the motion, and defendant excepted to the ruling, and has assigned such ruling as error.

We are unable to avoid the conclusion that the motion should have been granted upon the ground that plaintiffs' evidence showed contributory negligence on the part of deceased. Deceased was killed in a collision on defendant's railroad on the morning of October 11, 1901. The collision was between two trains operated by electric power, known as the "work train" and the "lemon train" and occurred at about 6:53 a. m. at a point about 4,000 feet east of Sherman station, Los Angeles county. To the east of Sherman, and about 16,800 feet therefrom, on defendant's road, is Colegrove. Between these two places defendant's road is a single-track railroad, with several turnouts or switches. About 2,000 feet east of the point of collision was a turnout leading to a gravel pit, and it was to this place that the work train was proceeding on its way from Sherman at the time of the collision. The lemon train was on its way from Colegrove to Santa Monica by way of Sherman. The deceased was motorman on the work train. Both of these trains had their headquarters at Sherman, at which place there was a train dispatcher, who went on duty about 7 a. m. The lemon train was a special train that was sent from time to time, as directed by the trainmaster, from Sherman, east to Colegrove, where there was a lemon exchange, for the purpose of carrying lemons west from Colegrove through Sherman to Santa Monica. Whenever this train was to be operated, an order to that effect was placed on the bulletin board at Sherman, stating the time of departure therefor, and on the morning of the accident the order that had been posted was as follows, viz.: "Lemon train, 6 a. m. Car 72 to Exchange." The conductors and motormen of defendant were required by the rules of the company to consult the bulletin boards daily before taking trains. It had been the practice for months for the lemon train to leave at the time stated in the order, proceed directly to the lemon exchange at Colegrove, which took some 15 or 18 minutes, obtain its load of lemons, and, without any orders as to its movements except the general order to avoid all regularly scheduled passenger cars, to go back to Sherman on its way to Santa Monica, reaching Sherman generally somewhere between 6:45 and 7 a. m. The posted order to the effect that it should leave Colegrove at a certain hour meant that, having arrived at Colegrove, it should return to Sherman in this way. This practice was known to all the employés engaged in and about the operation of the work and lemon trains. Deceased had been employed in that connection for nearly a year, and was an experienced motorman. He must be held to have known from the notice on the bulletin board on October 11, 1901, that the lemon train had gone out at 6 a. m., that it would return in the usual way, and also that it had not returned at the time he started with the work train. The work train was one used for carrying men to their work in and about the roadbed and for carrying gravel. It necessarily ran to different places, as circumstances required, and as specially directed. It was frequently used in the morning to carry defendant's workmen from Sherman to the gravel pit, and on the morning of the collision was being so used. It was the practice to start this train in time to get the men to the place where they were to work by 7 o'clock a. m., without any special order as to the precise time of leaving Sherman, and it was the duty of the employé in charge thereof to keep out of the way of all regular and bulletined trains. This the evidence shows was thoroughly understood by deceased.

On the morning of the accident, the work train was late in leaving Sherman, and did not leave earlier than 6:44 a. m., the usual time being somewhere about 6:15 a. m. The deceased was undoubtedly in charge of such train, and responsible for its movements. Some reliance is placed by plaintiffs upon the fact that the roadmaster, T. V. Reuter, was with the train, accompanying his men to the place of work; that an order had been made nearly a year before to the effect that he should thereafter "be in charge of all work in connection with handling gravel," and that "trainmen on gravel trains and other employés will obey his orders," and that on this morning he told deceased, just before they started, "We are ready. Pull out." It is claimed that this shows that deceased in moving and managing the train was acting directly under Reuter's orders. It is clear from the evidence, however, that it was thoroughly understood by both deceased and Reuter that this order gave Reuter only such authority over the work train as a roadmaster would naturally have in the matter of construction and repair, such as giving directions as to where it should be taken and what work it should do, and that the sole responsible party so far as its operations and the precautions against collision with other trains were concerned was the deceased. The case of McKune v. Cal. S. R. Co., 66 Cal. 302, 5 Pac. 482, relied on by plaintiffs, was one where a train was ordered to move by a train dispatcher, whose business it was to direct the movement of trains. At the time of leaving it was clear at Sherman, but further up the road was a dense fog. On coming to this fog, deceased proceeded with his train at the rate of about four miles an hour, without taking any precautions against accident. It appeared that deceased had been specially warned and instructed that whenever the fog was so thick that he could not see far enough ahead he must send out a man to flag until he was in a safe place. This he did not do, nor did he ring his gong. He was proceeding upgrade, when the lemon train came in sight, coming downgrade, and from 150 to 200 feet distant. Both motormen reversed their cars and applied their brakes, but it was apparently too late to avoid a collision.

There is nothing in the record which would justify the inference that there was anything in the equipment or condition of either train, or in the operation of the lemon train by those in charge thereof, that would constitute negligence on the part of defendant, or the employés in charge of the lemon train, in any degree contributing to the collision. The only basis for a claim of such negligence on the part of defendant is that it allowed these two trains to make this trip without having a train dispatcher on duty, allowed the lemon train to start on its return trip from Colegrove without orders from some one knowing where all trains were, and left it to the motorman of the work train to select as to how the two trains should pass one another on a single-track road. If it be assumed that this practice was at all negligent on the part of defendant as regards other employés than the deceased, we do not see how it can avail plaintiffs, in face of the fact that it was the special duty of the deceased, the motorman of the work train, in view of the posted orders as to the lemon train, to know of its whereabouts, and to avoid coming into collision with it. If he were negligent in the performance of this duty, and such negligence contributed directly to his injury, it is, of course, immaterial here whether the defendant was negligent in any of the respects above mentioned. Whatever negligence there was apart from this, was the negligence of the deceased. The lemon train was moving according to the bulletined order, and was on time. Those in charge thereof had no reason to expect to meet the work train on the main track, for they not only had no knowledge as to its probable location, but also had the right to assume that those in charge thereof knew as to the movements of the lemon train, and were bound to leave the lemon train a clear track. The deceased, in charge of the work train, knew that he was likely to meet the lemon train at any moment. If he did not know this, it was solely because he had failed to look at the bulletin board before leaving Sherman, or, having looked, had failed to remember; in either of which contingencies he was clearly guilty of negligence, for it was his duty to advise himself, both for his own protection and that of his train, as to the presence upon the track over which he was to go of any bulletined trains, and to move his own train with reference thereto. He alone was the responsible party in this connection, and if he failed to obtain or keep in mind the information placed before him for his guidance, and such failure contributed directly to the accident and his death, there could be no escape from the conclusion that he was guilty of contributory negligence. It must therefore be assumed that he knew that the lemon train was probably approaching him on the same track, on a downgrade, and that he also knew that the motorman thereof was in ignorance as to the fact that the work train was anywhere in the neighborhood. With this knowledge he chose to assume the risk, and carried his train into and through a fog so dense that he could not see at most more than 200 feet, without taking any precaution either by ringing the gong on his car or by complying with the instructions to send a man to flag the approaching train. Had the train been stopped when the dense fog was reached, and a flagman been sent out, there can be no question that the collision would have been averted. The situation was clearly such as to require the deceased to take every possible precaution against a collision with the train that he must be held to have known was approaching him on the same track, the operatives of which train, he further must be held to have known, were ignorant of his own whereabouts, and were relying upon him to keep out of their way. It cannot be doubted that it is negligence for an engineer or motorman, charged as he is with the duty of caring for the safety of his train, to operate it with entire disregard of a known danger, or of a danger of which he must have known if he had used the care required of him in the discharge of the duty confided to him. When, in the face of such a danger, he proceeds without observing practicable instructions given him by his employer, designed to guard against the same, the observance of which would clearly have the effect to avoid the danger, there can be no difference of opinion in the minds of reasonable men as to the character of his conduct. It is negligence per se, and, if such negligence directly contributes to his own death, as it unfortunately did in this case, it must be held to be a complete defense to any action for damages brought by his heirs or legal representatives against the employer on account of his death. In this case the undisputed facts shown by plaintiffs' witnesses were such as to make the question of the negligence of the deceased one of law for the court. But one inference could be drawn therefrom by reasonable men, viz., that the deceased was himself guilty of negligence contributing directly to the collision and his consequent death. Under these circumstances the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

If the evidence subsequently introduced by defendant be considered, it shows that plaintiffs' case was made no stronger thereby. That evidence but emphasized the facts shown by plaintiffs' case, namely, that deceased was in sole charge of the work train, and responsible for its safety, and that he had full knowledge of the practice as to the lemon train, and also showed that he had many times within a few weeks of the accident acted as motorman on the lemon train. In view of our conclusion as to the question discussed, it is unnecessary to consider the contention of defendant to the effect that the court erred in the matter of instructions to the jury.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

In re MOREY'S ESTATE.

MOREY et al. v. WELLS et al. (L. A. 1,721.)

1. TRIAL—NONSUIT—PROPRIETY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, authorizing the dismissal of an action or rendition of judgment of nonsuit when plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury, the refusal of the court to submit the evidence to the jury, if equivalent to a nonsuit, is justified where plaintiffs' evidence will not warrant a verdict in their favor on the issues presented, and it would be the court's duty to set aside any verdict rendered for them.

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDINGS.

Irregularity in the action of the court in making special findings after granting a nonsuit is harmless where the nonsuit was properly granted.

3. SAME—NONSUIT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, declaring that no judgment shall be reversed for error unless a different result would have been probable if the error had not occurred, irregularity in withdrawing a case from the jury, and thus practically nonsuiting plaintiffs, is not fatal to the judgment on appeal, where, under the evidence, a verdict for plaintiffs could not have been sustained, and there was no indication that any additional evidence could be produced in their favor.

4. WILLS — UNDUE INFLUENCE — PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary to the advantage of the former are presumed to be entered into by the latter under undue influence, evidence that the residuary legatee in a will, who drew the same, had been for a long time the attorney for testator, and that testator, when he made the will, was old, feeble, and suffering intensely from disease, if taken alone, raises a technical implication or presumption of undue influence against the residuary legatee, or at least requires the proponents of the will to show the actual circumstances occurring at the time of its execution and prior thereto, determinative of the presence or absence of undue influence.

5. SAME—REBUTTAL OF PRESUMPTION.

The presumption of undue influence in the execution of a will by an old and feeble man in favor of his attorney who drew the same, is overcome by positive evidence of the persons present at the time of the execution, to the effect that such influence was not exerted, and by the express affirmance of the will by testator shortly before his death and three months after the execution of the will when free from any possibility of influence, and by other circumstances surrounding and leading up to the execution of the will showing the absence of such influence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. N. Conklin, Judge.

Application by William Morey and others to revoke the probate of the last will and testament of David Morey, deceased; K. C. Wells and Charles E. Truesdell, executors. From an order denying a new trial, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Ely & Campbell and Henry W. Nisbet, for appellants. Otis, Gregg & Surr, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from an order denying a new trial. The proceeding is an application by the petitioner to revoke the probate of the last will and testament of David Morey, deceased. It is alleged in the petition that David Morey died in the county of San Diego, state of California, on June 21, 1902, being at the time a resident of the county of San Bernardino, in said state; that such proceedings were had in said superior court of San Bernardino county that a document dated the 31st day of March, 1902, was admitted to probate as the last will and testament of David Morey by said court on the 12th day of July, 1902, and that K. C. Wells and Charles E. Truesdell, who were named in said document as executors, were appointed as such by said court, and immediately entered upon their duties; that petitioners William Morey, Israel Morey, and Abraham Morey are brothers of said decedent; that petitioner Catharine Wollam is a sister of said decedent; that petitioner M. D. Felkner is the only child and heir at law of Esther Felkner, deceased, the sister of said decedent; that petitioners John S. Rose, Lilian F. Jaqua, Anna V. Hoot, and Mary R. Hoover are the only surviving children, and are heirs at law of Elizabeth Rose, deceased, sister of said decedent; and that Louisa Rose is the only surviving child and heir at law of Alvin Rose, deceased, a son of Elizabeth Rose, deceased; and that all said petitioners are heirs at law of said decedent, and are interested in said estate. It is further alleged that said document is not the last will and testament of said decedent, and that said decedent died intestate, and that at the time said document purports to have been executed by said decedent he was not of sound mind; that the document, if executed at all by decedent, was procured to be executed by the undue influence of Charles E. Truesdell; that said Truesdell was an attorney and counselor at law, and was at the time said document purports to have been executed, and for a long time previous thereto had been, the attorney and counselor of said decedent, and had sustained towards said decedent relations of trust and confidence; that said document was drawn by said Truesdell, as attorney of said decedent, in the course of his professional employment, and, if executed, was so executed in the law office of said Truesdell, and under his supervision, and at his instance and request; that said Truesdell is named in said document as one of the executors thereof, and as one of the residuary legatees; that the appointment of said Truesdell as executor, and his constitution as one of the residuary legatees. were procured through the exercise by said Truesdell over said deceased of undue influence arising from the relationship of trust and confidence with said decedent as his attorney and counselor. It is also alleged that said document, if executed by decedent, was procured to be executed by the menace, duress, and undue influence of K. C. Wells, who at the time was the president and chief executive officer of the Union Bank of Redlands, which bank at that time, and for a long time previous thereto, had been the holder and owner of a mortgage on all the property of said decedent, to secure his payment of a large sum of money, and the said Wells was and has been for a long time the agent of said decedent, and managing his business and monetary affairs, and had governed and controlled all his actions in business and monetary matters; that said Wells was present at the time said document was drawn and at the time it purports to have been executed, and suggested and dictated its various provisions, and procured the pretended execution thereof by the exercise of undue influence over decedent; that said Wells is named in said document as one of the executors and one of the residuary legatees of said decedent, and is claiming a portion of the estate thereunder; and that his appointment as executor and constitution as one of the residuary legatees were procured through the exercise by said Wells over decedent of menace, duress, and undue influence, arising from the relationship of trust and confidence with said decedent. It is further alleged that said decedent was deeply attached to his wife, Sarah J. Morey, in her lifetime, and allowed her to manage and control all of the property belonging to him or them, and said Sarah J. Morey was allowed by said decedent to take the title to all real estate belonging to them, or either of them, in her own name; that said Sarah J. Morey was a person of strong will power, and that her control over said decedent in her lifetime was absolute, and extended to control of his property and affairs; that said decedent was in the habit of following her directions in regard to the disposition of his property and affairs, and depended upon her advice and directions in that behalf; that said Sarah J. Morey died on the 7th day of August, 1901, leaving said David Morey surviving her; that by her last will and testament she bequeathed and devised all of her property of every kind and character to said David Morey; that a few days before her death, to wit, on the 4th day of August, 1901, said Sarah J. Morey, being then aware of her approaching death, caused to be prepared written directions to said David Morey and to certain of her friends as to what she wished them to do with said property, and signed her name thereto, or caused it to be signed by some one in her presence; that by said paper, after requesting that various articles of personal property be given to certain of her friends, she directed that the sum of $2,000 be given to one Mrs. Painter, $2,000 to one Morey Cole, and $4,000 to one Ada Hoskins, and that any money not so disposed of or used by said David Morey should be given to some children's hospital for the purpose of endowing one or more beds, to be known as the "Sarah Morey Endowment," and, if there was money sufficient to endow more than one bed, one Mrs. Moore, with the help of K. C. Wells, should decide how it should be endowed, and that said K. C. Wells should decide where it should be endowed; that it was the earnest desire and intention of said David Morey, so far as he was mentally capable of forming any intention, to carry out the wishes of his wife relating to the disposition of said property, as expressed in said paper; that said K. C. Wells obtained possession of said paper, and by the use of undue influence over said decedent, he, with said Truesdell, procured the execution by said decedent of said document purporting to be his last will and testament, wherein, instead of carrying out the wishes and directions of said Sarah J. Morey, he was induced to attempt to bequeath to Ada Hoskins the sum of $1,000 only, and to attempt to bequeath the sum of $3,000 to the First Congregational Church of Redlands, a religious organization not authorized by law to take by will, and to leave only the sum of $1,000 for the purpose of endowing a bed in some hospital to be selected by them, and to make said Wells and Truesdell his residuary legatees, they well knowing that the attempted bequests to said church and hospital were and are void, and that, if said document were allowed to stand as the last will and testament of said decedent, said bequests would revert to them as residuary legatees. It is also alleged that the bequest to Wells and Truesdell was intended to be received by them in trust for charitable uses, and that they are now claiming the said bequest as their own right, with the intention of appropriating the same to their own use. The foregoing are the material allegations of the petition for the revocation of the proof of said will.

By the answer filed on the part of the respondents the material allegations of the contestants were put in issue. This is the second trial of the case. On the first trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the contestants, which was set aside, and a new trial granted. On the case coming on again for trial on April 12, 1904, a jury was demanded on the part of contestants, and was impaneled and sworn to try the cause. After the testimony had been offered by the respective parties, the contestants moved the court to submit certain special issues to the jury. Respondents thereupon objected to the submission of said issues or any issues, on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant the court, or which would authorize a jury in finding a verdict or any special issues in favor of the contestants. The court, after having heard argument on the motion and objections thereto, sustained the objections, and declined to submit any issues to the jury, on the ground that no evidence authorizing the submission of said issue had been offered or introduced upon the trial. Thereupon the court prepared and signed certain findings of fact ordering and adjudging that the order of the court made and entered the 12th day of July, 1902, admitting to probate the document dated the 31st of March, 1902, as the last will and testament of David Morey, deceased, stand and is affirmed as such. Thereafter contestants moved the court upon a statement of the case for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial this appeal is taken, as heretofore stated.

In the statement on motion for new trial quite a number of exceptions are noted to the rulings of the court during the progress of the trial, and specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the court. The main points, however, presented and urged on the part of contestants and appellants on the appeal are practically reduced to two, to wit, that the decedent at the time of executing the will in question was of unsound mind, and that the will was procured and executed under the undue influence of the executors Truesdell and Wells. In this connection it is further contended that in refusing to submit the special issues to the jury and in discharging the jury without a verdict the court practically granted a nonsuit, which it was not authorized to do in this case, for the reason, as contended, that the evidence produced on behalf of the plaintiffs established a case sufficient to have the issue submitted to a jury. Conceding that the action of the court in refusing to submit the evidence to the jury was the equivalent of a nonsuit, still, if the evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs would not have justified a verdict in their favor on the issues presented, the court was justified in the action taken, for under such circumstances it would have been the duty of the court to set aside the verdict, as was done on the first trial. An action may be dismissed or a judgment of nonsuit entered upon motion of the defendant when upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 581. Upon an examination of the evidence we are satisfied that it fails to prove a sufficient case to justify a verdict or findings in favor of the contestants. It will be seen that in the petition of the contestants it is stated that David Morey desired to follow out his wife's wishes as expressed in the memorandum left by her just prior to her death, which memorandum is attached to the petition as an exhibit; but this memorandum or statement, if it had been followed literally by the decedent in his will, would not have benefited the contestants. It shows that Mrs. Morey never desired that any of the eastern relatives who constitute the contestants should ever receive a particle of the estate. A few days prior to the execution of the so-called memorandum, to wit, August 1st, Mrs. Morey had executed the will in which she bequeathed and devised all her property, real and personal, to her husband as and for his absolute estate, and appointed him the executor of the said will, which said will was filed for probate August 10, 1901. The will of Mr. Morey under contest departs in some respects from the memorandum left by Mrs. Morey, but in her memorandum she says: "I want my husband, Mr. Morey, first in all respects and plans, pleased, satisfied and always comfortably restful." But it would not benefit the contestants if the deceased whose will is being contested had literally and in every respect complied with the memorandum; and the evidence shows that subsequent to the death of his wife circumstances occurred which, to Mr. Morey at least, seemed to justify him in departing somewhat from the memorandum left by her, and the fact that he did so depart from the suggestions contained in her memorandum would seem to indicate that he exercised his own judgment in making the will under contest. The witnesses on behalf of the contestants in reference to the question of unsoundness of mind and undue influence are practically reduced to three in number—Miss Gertrude Hayes and Mr. and Mrs. Moore. The main reason assigned by these witnesses in their testimony that he was of unsound mind is that he was a great sufferer from eczema, and also at one time he had an abscess in one of his ears; but it is not an unusual thing—in fact it is rather the opposite—that one may be a great sufferer from some physical ailment and still be of sound mind, and in possession of his mental faculties, and able to transact business. Miss Gertrude Hayes, although of the opinion that he was of unsound mind, was at the same time negotiating with the deceased, Morey, for a large and valuable piece of property. It is not fair to suppose that one would be transacting business with a person of unsound mind or incapable of transacting the business in question. Mr. Moore thinks that his unsoundness of mind was the result of his ill health. His testimony shows that he had some feeling against the executors Wells and Truesdell. He said, however, he had no feeling against Truesdell, but he was very much hurt that Mr. Wells should be guilty of what he calls a breach of trust—that is, in not carrying out the suggestions of Mrs. Morey—but he says: "I endeavored to induce him to make a will, and I thought that that was the right thing to do to have the property go as it ought to go." Further: "I also knew that Mrs. Moore was mentioned conditionally as one of the persons whom Mrs. Morey wanted to be benefited by the property, and, knowing that fact, I urged Mr. Morey to make this will, which would make Mrs. Moore a beneficiary in accordance with that memorandum." The will was made in such a way that Mrs. Moore was not made a beneficiary under it. The testimony of Mrs. Moore is somewhat similar to that of her husband. It was to the effect that he was not of sound mind, yet she assisted him in disposing of a great portion of the property that had been left in the home by Mrs. Morey in accordance with the requests of Mrs. Morey, and it can hardly be presumed that at that time she supposed she was dealing with a man of unsound mind or one incapable of managing his property. Decedent was, it appears, deeply attached to his wife, and allowed her to take all the property belonging to them in her name and manage and control the same up to the time of her death; but by her last will, as already shown, it was all transferred to him. They had no children. A few days after the death of Mrs. Morey, which occurred August 7, 1901, Mr. Morey accompanied Mr. Wells, one of the respondents, to the summer house of the latter at Terminal Island, near San Pedro, in Los Angeles county, where he was expected to remain a week or two, if he so desired. There, on the 11th day of August, 1901, he caused to be prepared a will, which was executed and attested by Mr. and Mrs. Holmes. Morey put this will in his pocket, and carried it away with him the next day, when he left Terminal Island. This will and the one in contest were the same in form and effect, with the exception that the first will left $4,000 to Miss Ada Hoskins and $1,000 to the Congregational Church of Redlands and nothing to Mrs. Creighton. The second will—the one under consideration—cut down Miss Hoskins' bequest to $1,000 and added $2,000 to the bequest to the Congregational church, and left $1,000 to Mrs. Margaret Creighton; the aggregate amount of his specific bequests remaining the same in both wills, and in each Wells and Truesdell were named as executors and residuary legatees. The parties, however, affected by the changes in the second will are not among the contestants. About the middle of June following the execution of the last will Morey went to San Diego, where, on the 21st of that month, he committed suicide, caused, as he states, by his physical sufferings from eczema. He left a note addressed to Mr. Wells, with an envelope containing the keys, and says in the note: "You will find a letter addressed to you and Truesdell in a drawer of the secretary of my room at Dr. Creighton's.

It will tell you what to do with my effects in the room. Please carry out my wish in my last will. Destroy the first will. I leave many dear friends whom I love and respect. We hope to meet on the other side of the dark river. Goodbye to all." From the time of the execution of the will he had it in his possession, and had the opportunity of destroying it if it had been obtained from him by any undue influence, or if the same did not fully and fairly contain his last wish and will. Yet here we have some three months after the execution of the last will in the foregoing letter what would seem to be a most solemn ratification of the same. His estate was appraised at the sum of a little over $21,000, and the specific bequests aggregate some $10,000. Add to this the claims against the estate aggregating about $5,000, and it would leave only about $5,000 to be divided between the residuary legatees. These legatees, as shown by the evidence, were the old esteemed friends of both Mr. and Mrs. Morey. There is nothing in the evidence tending to show that it was the wish of Morey, the deceased, that any portion of the small estate should go to his eastern relatives, none of whom he had seen for over 40 years, excepting one brother who some years ago visited him in California.

The right to dispose of property in contemplation of death is as old as the right to acquire and possess property, and the laws of all civilized countries recognize and protect this right. It seems, however, to be the impression among many that if the property is not disposed of as the surviving relatives, near or remote, may think it should have been disposed of, the decedent must have been incompetent to transact business, or was acting at the time under undue influence of some kind. But as said in Re Carriger's Estate, 104 Cal. 84, 37 Pac. 786: "To set aside a will * * * is a serious matter, and a verdict having that effect should be closely scrutinized by the trial judge. The upsetting of wills is a growing evil." It is also said in Re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 33, 30 Pac. 106: "But the right to dispose of one's property by will is most solemnly assured by law, and is a most valuable incident to ownership, and does not depend upon its judicious use. The beneficiaries of a will are as much entitled to protection as any other property owners, and courts abdicate their functions when they permit the prejudices of a jury to set aside a will merely upon suspicion, or because it does not conform to their ideas of what was just or proper." And in Re Wilson's Estate, 117 Cal. 270, 49 Pac. 174, it is said: "The history of this species of litigation shows that quite a number of people have come to think that the right to dispose of property by will has but little significance, and may be legally disregarded whenever the testator has not disposed of his property in the manner which suits the views of the jury." If the issues here had been submitted to the jury under the evidence in the case, and a verdict or special finding should have been rendered in favor of the contestants, it would have been the duty of the court to set the same aside. That being so, the court was justified in refusing to submit the case to a jury. As said by this court in the Estate of Tibbett, 137 Cal. 128, 69 Pac. 980: "Where, however, there is really no substantial evidence to support a verdict, or the jury were evidently actuated by motives which they had no right to consider—as is so frequently the case in contests of wills—there this court will hold that, as a matter of law, the verdict is unwarranted, even though there be some slight pretense of evidence to support it."

It may be conceded that in withdrawing the case from the jury the court practically granted a nonsuit, as claimed by the contestants, and that the court was not justified thereafter in making special findings; but this irregularity or error is harmless, and cannot prejudice the appellant. The case is before us in substantially the same aspect as if, at the close of the evidence on both sides, the court had directed the jury to bring in a verdict against the contestants. There is, however, no material difference between the rule governing this court in the consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence where the court below has directed a verdict from that prevailing where a nonsuit is granted on motion made after the evidence for both parties has been given. Ir Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 605, 37 Pac. 637 which is the only California case on the subject, the court says: "To justify the court in directing a verdict it is not necessary that there should be no conflict in the evidence; but where the evidence is such that it is clearly insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party against whom the direction is given the instruction is proper, unless the circumstances indicate that upon another trial the evidence may be materially different, in which case the facts should be submitted to the jury in order that a new trial may be had. But in either case the decision of the court below will be sustained, unless the appellate court can clearly see that its conclusion is wrong upon the facts." There are many decisions referring, for the most part, to some particular instruction which assumes the existence of some fact in issue, where it is said that it is error to do so if there is conflicting evidence as to the fact assumed. But with regard to the granting of a motion for nonsuit made at the close of the evidence for plaintiff and defendant, the rule seems to be well established that the trial court has discretion, and that it is not error to grant the motion where, upon all the evidence, it is clear that, if a jury should bring in a verdict against the defendant, it would be the duty of the court to set it aside and order a new trial. Geary v. Simmons, 39 Cal. 224; Vanderford v. Foster, 65 Cal. 49, 2 Pac. 736; Fagundes v. C. P. R. Co., 79 Cal. 100, 21 Pac. 437, 3 L. R. A. 824; Fox v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 234, 30 Pac. 384; Toulouse v. Pare, 103 Cal. 251, 37 Pac. 146. The above rule, of course, does not mean that in every case where the trial court might properly grant a new trial for insufficiency of evidence for plaintiff it should grant a motion for nonsuit, if made after both parties rest their case, but only that it should do so in very clear cases, which is practically the rule which controls in directing a verdict. Courts are not instituted to enable parties who have neither a wrong to redress nor a right to enforce to persist in a groundless suit resting on the chances which arise from prejudice which sometimes influences juries. Where, after a case is all in, the court can see that no other evidence favorable to one of the parties is likely to be discovered or produced, and that upon all the evidence given a verdict in his favor would be altogether unjustifiable, and, if rendered, must be set aside on motion, and that the continuance of the litigation will probably produce no other result than injury to the party who is in the right, it is its duty to end the case by directing a proper verdict. Granting that the course pursued in this case was irregular, it does not follow that it is fatal to the judgment, even on appeal. The Code expressly declares that no judgment shall be reversed for error unless a different result would have been probable if the error had not occurred. Code Civ. Proc. § 475. In the case at bar it does not appear that a different result would have been probable. There was no indication that any additional evidence at all material could ever be produced in favor of the contestants.

It is claimed that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence regarding the issue of undue influence. There was evidence that Truesdell, one of the residuary legatees who would receive a part of the estate by the provision in his favor, drew the will, and had been for a long time before the attorney for the testator, and that the testator, when he made the will, was old, feeble, and suffering intensely from disease—circumstances which, under the rule given in Underhill on Wills, vol. 1, p. 209, Civ. Code, § 2235, Estate of Wickes, 139 Cal. 202, 72 Pac. 902, and Estate of McDevitt, 95 Cal. 33, 30 Pac. 101, would, if taken alone, raise the technical implication or presumption that the will was procured by the undue influence of Truesdell, or would at least require the proponents to show what did actually occur at the time of its execution and prior thereto, so that the presence or absence of undue influence by him could be determined. This presumption, it is claimed, is evidence, and creates a conflict, upon which it was necessary to allow the jury to decide. But all the other circumstances surrounding and leading up to the execution of the will were fully disclosed by the evidence, without conflict, and they showed that there was no undue influence. In addition to this, there is the positive evidence of the persons present, and of others who could reasonably be supposed to have any knowledge of the case, to the effect that such influence was not exerted; and the expressed affirmance of the will by the testator himself shortly before his death, as already shown, at a time when the persons charged with the exercise of the undue influence did not have an opportunity to exercise it, completely remove the imputation of undue influence, and show that the provisions of the will in favor of the residuary legatees were conceived by the testator himself, without influence or suggestion from others. This is so satisfactorily proven that a verdict for the contestants, if it had been rendered, should have been unhesitatingly set aside by the court.

There is, indeed, no real conflict in the evidence. The facts on which the asserted presumption of undue influence rests are not denied or contradicted, but are practically admitted. The other evidence given to refute the presumption consisted of additional facts, which also were not seriously disputed or contradicted, and they furnished the explanation necessary to destroy the implication of undue influence. There was, therefore, nothing upon which a verdict setting aside the will could justly be supported, and the method of proceeding, though irregular, did not cause any injustice, but ended in the judgment that should have been given. The will had previously, as shown, been admitted to probate, and, unless set aside by successful contest, would stand as the last will of the decedent. The appellants in this case upon their own evidence failed to sustain the contest, and the result to them is the same whether a nonsuit was granted or whether special findings were made by the court adverse to their contention.

We see no errors in the rulings of the court during the progress of the trial which would justify reversing the order of the court denying a new trial. The contestants now have had two trials, and it is fair to presume they have produced all the testimony they are capable of producing in support of their contention, and a new trial therefore would be entirely useless, even if there were sufficient grounds shown for granting the same.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

RYER v. RIO LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO.

(S. F. 4,230.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Settlement of Statement—Objections—Incorporation in Statement.

The rule that an objection that a proposed statement has not been presented to the judge in time must be urged when the statement is presented for settlement, and, if overruled, must be incorporated, with the matter in support thereof, in the statement, in order to be available to defeat a motion for new trial or on appeal, only applies to objections urged at the time the proposed statement comes up for settlement, and has no application to objections or motions made subsequent to the order settling the statement, and which are urged at the time the statement, as ordered settled and engrossed, is presented for certification.

2. SAME — TIME OF SETTLEMENT — ENGROSSMENT.

When matter of settlement of the statement or bill of exceptions is taken up by the judge, and it is determined by him what shall be included therein, the statement or bill is then actually settled, although the judge may direct it to be engrossed, and does not finally certify it as correct and allowed until the engrossment is made, and the only duty devolving on the court, and the only right upon which the parties can insist, at the time of the engrossment, is that the engrossed statement or bill shall embody all that the court, at the time of the actual settlement, ordered to be incorporated therein.

3. SAME—ACCURACY OF ENGROSSMENT—DETERMINATION OF JUDGE—FINALITY.

Whether a bill of exceptions or statement is correctly engrossed as settled is a matter for the determination of the judge of the lower court, and his determination thereof is final.

4. SAME—OBJECTIONS TO ENGROSSMENT.

An objection that the engrossed statement was not served on an attorney before presentation to the judge, while it may justify the court in refusing to certify the statement until examined by such attorney, does not justify an absolute refusal to certify the statement as engrossed.

5. SAME—SPECIAL BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MOTIONS TO DENY NEW TRIAL.

Where a motion for the denial of a new trial on the ground of laches in prosecuting the motion therefor and of unreasonable delay in presenting the engrossed statement for certification is made after the actual settlement of the statement but before certification, and is denied, the party appealing from the order of denial is not entitled to have his motion, and the matters upon which it is based, incorporated in the statement on motion for a new trial, but must support his appeal by a separate bill of exceptions.

6. NEW TRIAL—MOTION FOR DENIAL—DISPOSITION.

While the usual practice in moving the denial or dismissal of a motion for a new trial on the ground of laches is to make the motion when the application for new trial comes up for disposition, yet such motion need not be postponed until that time, but may be made at any time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by F. F. Ryer against the Rio Land & Improvement Company. Application by defendant to be allowed to prove certain exceptions, and have them incorporated in a bill of exceptions. Dismissed.

Platt & Bayne, for petitioner. R. H. Countryman, for respondent and substituted plaintiff.

LORIGAN, J. This is an application to this court, made by the defendant, to be allowed to prove certain exceptions, and have them incorporated in a bill of exceptions. The motion is presented here under the following state of facts: The cause was pending in the superior court of Solano county, and judgment awarded to defendant. Plaintiff gave notice of intention to move for a new trial, and in due time a proposed statement to be used on such motion, and amendments thereto, were presented to the judge for settlement, who, on the 20th of July, 1904, settled the same, and directed the statement as settled to be engrossed by the attorney for the plaintiff by September 1, 1904. Repeated orders were thereafter made by the superior judge, extending the time for engrossment until February 4, 1905, when the attorney for plaintiff delivered to said judge for certification as corrected what purported to be the engrossed statement. Before such certification was made, however, by the judge, defendant, upon notice, moved to set aside the various orders extending the time for engrossing the statement, on the ground that the superior judge had no authority to grant them; to refuse the certification of such engrossed statement on the ground that it was not a true and correct engrossment of the statement as settled by the judge, in this: that it omitted to embrace certain matters which the court had ordered inserted; to refuse such certification on the further ground that such engrossed statement had not been served on the attorney for defendant prior to presenting it for certification, as had been ordered by the court; and to dismiss all proceedings in the mattter of the presentation and certification of such statement and in said action relative to and for the purpose of obtaining a new trial on the ground that plaintiff had not used due diligence, and had been guilty of undue and unreasonable delay and gross laches in presenting such statement for certification, and in the prosecution of his motion for a new trial. The matter coming on regularly to be heard upon the various grounds urged by defendant, the objection made to the certification was overruled, and the notice to dismiss denied, to which defendant excepted. Defendant then moved that the judge of said superior court incorporate and insert in said statement presented for certification the various objections and motions made by it, together with the matter presented on the hearing thereof, which the judge refused to do, but certified the engrossed statement as presented. The motion here is to have said objections, motion, and exceptions which the judge refused to incorporate in such engrossed and certified statement settled and authenticated by this court, and made part of the record in the proceedings on motion for a new trial.

We do not think it was the duty of the court below to incorporate the objections of defendant, or its motion, or the matters pertaining thereto, in the statement presented as engrossed and ready for certification, or that it is entitled to any relief under its motion here. We are referred to no rule of practice or decision of this court sanctioning such course. While the rule is well settled that an objection that a proposed statement has not been presented to the judge in time must be urged when the statement is presented for settlement, and, if the objection is overruled, the party must have his objection in the matter in support of it incorporated in his statement, so as to avail himself of it as a reason why the motion for new trial, when it comes up for hearing in the lower court, should be denied, or in order to present the objection in this court on appeal from the order granting or refusing the motion for a new trial (Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 146; Henry v. Merguire, 106 Cal. 145, 39 Pac. 599; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 676, 69 Pac. 497), this only applies to objections urged at the time the proposed statement comes up for settlement. It has no application to objections or motions made subsequent to the order settling the statement, and which are urged at the time the statement, as ordered settled and engrossed, is presented for certification. It is true, as insisted by counsel, that in Houghton v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 355, 60 Pac. 973, this court said "that the bill of exceptions is not, however, really settled until it has been certified as correct, and this cannot be done until it has been engrossed, if engrossment is necessary." But this language was used in answer to a contention made by counsel in that case that the particular bill there in question should have been engrossed before it was settled. The language used was in reply to this contention. It was not meant thereby that until actual certification by the judge no settlement of the bill of exceptions or statement has been made, and that, therefore, it is open, so as to have inserted in it any objection or motion which a party may make. On the contrary, when the matter of the settlement of a statement or a bill of exceptions is taken up by the judge, and it is determined by him what shall be included in it, it is then actually settled, notwithstanding he may direct it to be engrossed, and does not finally certify it as correct and allowed until the engrossment is made. After so being ordered settled, when it is engrossed and presented for certification, the only duty devolving upon the court, and the only right which the parties can insist on, is that the engrossed statement or bill of exceptions shall embody all that the court at the time of the actual settlement ordered should be incorporated in it. Whether it is so correctly engrossed as settled is a matter for the determination of the judge, and his determination upon the point is final. It cannot be insisted that the statement on motion for a new trial which is presented for certification, and which is found by the court to be correctly engrossed as ordered settled, shall be made by incorporating in its objections and motions which are independent of, collateral to, and subsequent to its settlement, to serve the purpose of a bill of exceptions upon which to review the action of the court in overruling such objections and motions. In the matter at bar, aside from the objection urged by the defendant that the statement was not engrossed as originally settled by the judge, the determination of which matter against defendant is final and conclusive, and the further objection that the engrossed statement was not served on the attorney for defendant before presentation to the judge—a matter which, while it might justify the court in refusing to certify the statement until counsel might examine it (as the court in this instance did), yet would not justify an absolute refusal to certify—the other objections urged were, in effect, and the motion in the case actually was, that the motion for a new trial be denied on the ground of unreasonable delay in presenting the engrossed statement for certification, and gross laches in prosecuting the motion for a new trial. The denial of this motion was a special order made after final judgment, from which the defendant had the right to appeal, and which should be supported by its own bill of exceptions, and the matters pertaining to it were not entitled to be incorporated in the statement on motion for a new trial. While the usual practice in moving the denial or dismissal of a motion for a new trial upon the ground of laches in prosecuting it is to make the motion when the application for a new trial comes up for disposition, yet a party who desires to avail himself of such a motion is not required to wait until that time. In fact it may be inadvisable to do so, and he can make his motion at any time he feels justified in doing it. When, however, the motion to deny a new trial on the ground of laches in prosecuting it is made, as in the matter at bar, after the actual settlement of the statement, but before certification, and is denied, the party intending to prosecute an appeal from such an order of denial is not entitled to have his motion, and the matters upon which it is based, incorporated in the statement itself. His appeal must be supported by its own bill of exceptions.

The motion to have the bill of exceptions settled as prayed for is denied, and the application is dismissed.

CAVE et al. v. TYLER et al. (L. A. 1,402.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW OF FACTS—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

The Supreme Court cannot interfere with a decision of the trial court based on conflicting evidence.

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — UNDERGROUND STREAMS—CLASSIFICATION.

Evidence that the waters of a creek or a portion thereof sank into the ground and ran or seeped under the ground through a cienega and emerged again into the creek below, not as mere percolating water, but as an underground stream, is sufficient to sustain a finding that the waters of the cienega constituted a part of the flowing waters of the creek.

Action by Ben W. Cave and others against Katie Harvey, as administratrix of Hannah S. Skinner, deceased, impleaded with George W. Tyler and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant administratrix appeals. Affirmed.

T. R. Archer, for appellant. Otis, Gregg & Surr, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendants to quiet title to the waters of Mill creek, in San Bernardino county, and to restrain the defendants from diverting any portion of the waters thereof to the injury of the plaintiffs. One of the defendants—Hannah S. Skinner—appeared separately, and answered, claiming a right to the water of Mountain Home creek, a tributary of Mill creek, as riparian owner thereon, and also a right by appropriation of the water derived from a cienega or marsh on her land. This cienega was situated in a side canyon known as "Snow Creek Canyon," leading into Mountain Home creek, in which there was a small stream known as "Snow Creek" flowing into Mountain Home creek. Plaintiffs claim that the water of the cienega seeped into the stream and became a part of the waters of Mill creek, to which they were entitled. The judgment was to the effect that the plaintiffs were the owners of the right to all the waters of Mill creek, including those of Mountain Home creek and Snow creek and the cienega, to the extent of 2,500 inches continuous flow under a 4-inch pressure, excepting a quantity flowing from the cienega equivalent to 2 inches flow under a 4-inch pressure. From this judgment this appeal is taken by Katie Harvey, as administratrix of the estate of Hannah S. Skinner, now deceased.

The appellant's contention is that the findings of the court to the effect that the plaintiffs are the owners of all the water of Mill creek to the extent of 2,500 inches, except the 2 inches allowed to the defendants, and the finding that the waters of the cienega constitute a part of the flowing waters of the stream known as Snow creek, are not sustained by the evidence. Mrs. Skinner's land is riparian to Mountain Home creek and also to Snow creek, and is situated some five miles above the point of diversion of the plaintiffs in Mill creek. The right of the plaintiffs is founded solely upon appropriation and prescription. Mrs. Skinner derived title to her land under a grant from the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871. By the provisions of the act of July 26, 1866, this grant is subject to all water rights which had vested and accrued prior to the grant. The court found that the rights of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had accrued prior to that time, and upon this finding the decree is based that the plaintiffs' rights by appropriation and diversion exercised below the lands of the appellant are paramount to her riparian rights. The law upon this subject is not disputed. The sole question to be determined by the court below was whether or not the present right of the plaintiffs had accrued and vested prior to March 3, 1871, and then included all the water to the extent of 2,500 inches. It would serve no useful purpose to enter into a discussion of the evidence for and against this finding. There was evidence to the effect that for many years prior to 1871, and continuously during the irrigating season of every year, the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had appropriated, diverted, and used, under a claim of right so to do, all of the water naturally flowing in Mill creek at their point of diversion, and, furthermore, that such use, and claim of right to the use, of all the water, had continued down to the time the action was begun. The only interruption of this use was that caused by the development of the two inches of water from the cienega which the court adjudged belonged to the appellant. There was evidence, and the court found, that the appellant had used 15 inches of the waters of Mountain Home creek for the irrigation of her land; but the court further found, upon sufficient evidence, that this use began after 1871, was not acquiesced in by the plaintiffs, but was interrupted, and was not of such a character as to give the appellant a right by prescription to take from the plaintiffs the water which they had appropriated prior to the grant. Under this evidence, therefore, the court was fully justified in finding that the plaintiffs had title to all the water except said two inches. It is true there was evidence to the contrary, from which a contrary conclusion might, perhaps, have been reached; but the conflict was a matter solely for the consideration of the trial court, and with its conclusion we cannot interfere. It is proper to say, however, that we think the finding of the court is in accordance with the weight of the testimony.

With respect to the waters of the cienega, there was evidence to the effect that the waters of Snow creek, or a portion thereof, sank at some point above the cienega and ran or seeped under the ground through the cienega, and emerged into the creek again below, and that it was not mere percolating water, but constituted what has been defined by this court as an underground stream. This is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court upon that point.

ROBERTS et al. v. HALL et al. (L. A. 1,325.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1905.)

1. Trespass—Interference with Water Mains—Pleading—Sufficiency.

A complaint alleging ownership in plaintiffs of a block of land abutting on a certain street; that the property was supplied with water for domestic use by means of an iron pipe, belonging to plaintiffs, laid beneath the surface of the street, and connected with the city water supply; that defendants willfully and maliciously plowed up the street and dug up and carried away all the pipe, and threatened to disconnect and carry away all pipe that might be placed therein by plaintiffs and to plow up the street as they should see fit—sufficiently stated a cause of action as against a general demurrer, and was not subject to objections based on grounds of unintelligibility, uncertainty, and ambiguity.

2. Judgment—Conformity to Conclusions of Law.

A judgment given by the court becomes itself the real conclusion of law, superseding any conclusions of law embraced in the court's decision; and so long as the judgment is sufficiently supported by the findings it is immaterial that it is not warranted by the conclusions of law stated in the decision.

3. Same—Conformity to Findings.

A complaint alleged that plaintiffs were the owners of land abutting on a certain street, and supplied it with water for domestic use by means of iron pipe belonging to the plaintiffs, laid beneath the surface of the street, and connected with the city water supply; that defendants willfully and maliciously plowed up the street, and carried away the pipe, and threatened to carry away all pipe that might be placed therein by plaintiffs, and dig up the street as they should see fit. The court found that a certain plaintiff (naming him) was the owner of the block of land in question, and that the connecting water pipe was appurtenant to the land; and also found generally in favor of such plaintiff upon the other allegations of the complaint, except as to the amount of the damage which it specifically fixed. Held, that a judgment in favor of the designated plaintiff against defendants for the damage found, and enjoining defendants from plowing and digging up the street and from interfering with plaintiff in laying water pipes connected with the city water mains, or from taking up or interfering with any pipes so placed, was supported by the findings.

4. Same—Rendition for Single Plaintiff.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 578, a judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs.

5. Appeal—Errors Reviewable—Preservation in Record.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 661, providing that where a motion for new trial is made on the minutes, the judgment roll and a statement to be subsequently prepared, with a copy of the order, shall constitute the record on appeal, the notice of intention to move for new trial upon the minutes, not contained in any statement or bill of exceptions, constitutes no part of the record on appeal from an order denying the motion, but the only specifications of error which may be considered are those contained in a statement prepared and settled subsequent to the order denying a new trial.

6. Trespass—Findings of Ownership—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In an action for the digging up of a water pipe laid in the street on which plaintiff's premises abutted, and connecting such premises with the city water system, evidence that the water pipe laid in the street was used solely in connection with and was appurtenant to land formerly owned by plaintiff's father and mother, which had been subsequently conveyed by the father and mother to plaintiff, who was the owner in fee thereof, authorized a finding that plaintiff was the owner of the pipe.

7. Same.

In an action for the digging up of a water pipe laid in the street on which plaintiff's premises abutted, and connecting such premises with the city water system, evidence that one defendant, who was the wife of her codefendant, was claimed by defendants to be the owner of the street in which the pipe was laid; that her codefendant had charge of the same, and had full authority from her to do anything he deemed necessary to protect her alleged interest therein; and that he did the acts complained of as such agent—was sufficient to warrant a finding that defendant wife did the acts complained of and authorized the doing thereof, although she did not personally participate in such acts, or expressly direct the commission thereof by her husband, or have knowledge thereof until after their commission.

8. Appeal—Absence of Findings—Effect.

A judgment will not be reversed or a new trial granted for want of a finding upon an issue presented by allegations showing an affirmative defense, or by way of cross-complaint, where there is no evidence in the record in relation to such issue, even where the record does not show the evidence given on the trial, and more especially where it does contain all the material evidence, and thus affirmatively discloses the absence of evidence in support of the issue.

Action by John Roberts and others against M. Hall and another. From a judgment for the plaintiff named and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. R. Andrews and H. A. Jerauld, for appellants. Wm. Humphreys and H. S. Utley, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment given in favor of plaintiff John Roberts and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was one for damages and an injunction. It was alleged in the complaint that the plaintiffs were the owners of a block of land (block 551 of the pueblo lands) in the city of San Diego, abutting on a street known as "Witherby Street," which street was the only convenient mode of access and egress to and from said property; that this property was supplied with water for domestic use and irrigation by means of about 400 feet of iron pipe laid about 16 inches beneath the surface of said street, and connected with the San Diego city water supply, which pipe and a meter attached thereto were the property of plaintiffs; that defendants willfully and maliciously plowed up said street in front of plaintiffs' property, and dug up and carried away all of said pipe and the meter, all to the great damage of plaintiffs, and threaten to disconnect, take up, and carry away all pipe and meters that may be placed therein by plaintiff, and also to dig up and plow said street as they see fit, which will greatly impede plaintiffs' right of ingress and egress. The trial court found that plaintiff John Roberts was the owner of the block of land mentioned, and that the connecting water pipe was appurtenant to said land. It also found generally in favor of said plaintiff upon the other allegations of the complaint, except as to the amount of damage, which it fixed at $44.50, and gave judgment in favor of said John Roberts against both defendants for $44.50, and enjoining said defendants from plowing and digging up said street, and from in any manner interfering with him in laying or maintaining water pipes therein connected with the city water main for the purpose of supplying said land with water, or from taking up or interfering with any pipes so placed for such purpose.

The complaint sufficiently stated a cause of action as against a general demurrer, and we see no force in the particular objections as to unintelligibility, uncertainty, and ambiguity made by the demurrer on those grounds. We see no reason why the findings of fact do not fully support the judgment given by the court in favor of John Roberts. Defendants' point in this connection appears to be that the "conclusions of law" as stated in the decision of the court do not warrant all the provisions of the judgment as to the terms of the injunction awarded. We think those provisions are all within the general scope of the stated conclusions of law; but, were it otherwise, the point would not be good. When judgment is given by the court, it is itself the real conclusion of law, and supersedes any conclusion of law embraced in the decision. The question, then, is as to whether it is sufficiently supported by the findings of fact (Spelling, New Trial and App. Practice, §§ 610, 611), and we think that there can be no question that it is so supported here.

We see no point in the objection that the judgment is in favor of plaintiff John Roberts only. Code Civ. Proc. § 578. According to the findings, he was the only plaintiff entitled to judgment.

Other objections are that the evidence is insufficient to sustain certain findings of the court. The only specifications of particulars in which the evidence is so insufficient, available to appellants, are those contained in the statement prepared and settled subsequent to the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, which was made and heard upon the minutes of the court. There is no other statement or bill of exceptions in the record, and the notice of intention to move for a new trial upon the minutes of the court, which is printed in the transcript, and apparently contains many such specifications, not being contained in any statement or bill of exceptions, constitutes no part of the record on appeal. Leonard v. Shaw, 114 Cal. 69, 45 Pac. 1012; Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 97, 100, 77 Pac. 762. In determining the question as to insufficiency of evidence we are therefore confined to the particulars specified in the statement, which are presumably the particulars presented to and argued before the trial court on the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 661; Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 484, 66 Pac. 734.

The finding that plaintiff John Roberts was the owner of the pipe removed by defendants is attacked, it being claimed that the evidence shows that the pipe was put in by his father, who, with his mother and coplaintiff, Emma Roberts, originally owned said block 551. The evidence showed that this pipe was used solely in connection with and as appurtenant to said land, and that the land had been subsequently conveyed by the father and mother to said John Roberts. The statement shows that such conveyance to John Roberts, dated June 19, 1901, was introduced in evidence, but a copy of the instrument is not set forth therein, so that we are not advised as to its terms. The trial court found that this pipe in place was appurtenant and belonged to said real property, and also that John Roberts is the owner in fee of said land, and these findings are not attacked. This statement sufficiently answers the objection made by defendants to this finding.

The finding of fact No. 5 is attacked in so far as it is found that the defendant Etta Hall did any of the alleged wrongful acts. The evidence showed that Etta Hall was the wife of her codefendant, M. Hall, and that she did not personally participate in any of the acts of her codefendant, or expressly direct the commission by him of the acts alleged, or have knowledge that Roberts' pipe had been taken up until some time thereafter. It did, however, appear from evidence that was admitted without objection, much of which was elicited by counsel for defendants, that defendants claimed that Etta Hall owned the land in which the pipe was laid, viz., Witherby street; that M. Hall had charge of the same for his wife, and had full authority from her to do anything and everything he deemed necessary to protect her alleged interest therein; and that he did the alleged acts as such agent, for the purpose of preventing what he considered an unwarranted use by others of what was claimed to be her property. We think this was a sufficient showing to support the finding complained of.

It is urged that finding No. 8 is unsupported by evidence, in that there is no evidence that defendant Etta Hall gave "authority to do the digging or the plowing of the street, and there is no evidence that she threatened to dig or carry away or convert the pipe to her own use." What has been said in regard to finding 5 is equally applicable to this objection.

It is urged in the brief of defendants that there is no evidence as to threats on the part of defendant M. Hall to interfere in the future with any pipes that may be placed in said street, or to continue to dig or to plow up said street. As to this there is no specification contained in the statement. The foregoing are all the particulars specified in the statement wherein the evidence is claimed to have been insufficient.

It is contended that the decision is against law, in that the court failed to find upon certain affirmative defenses alleged in the answer. In so far as these alleged affirmative defenses are not covered by the findings of the court, the answer to the objection is that it does not appear that any evidence was introduced in support thereof. It is well settled that a judgment will not be reversed, or a new trial granted, for want of a finding upon an issue proposed by allegations showing an affirmative defense, or made by way of cross-complaint, where there is no evidence in relation to such issue. Even where the record does not show the evidence given on the trial, it will not be presumed against the correctness of the judgment that any such evidence was given. Here, however, the statement purports to contain "a substantial statement of all the evidence material to the question raised on the motion for a new trial," and thus affirmatively discloses that there was no such evidence. Klokke v. Escailler, 124 Cal. 297, 300, 56 Pac. 1113; Stewart v. Hollingsworth, 129 Cal. 177, 180, 61 Pac. 936; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 5, 1905.)

1. Executors and Administrators—Conveyances—Contracts of Decedent—Statutory Provisions—Constitutionality.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1597–1602, which in substance provide that, when the vendor in a contract to convey land dies before conveyance, the court may authorize the executor or administrator to convey the land on presentation of a verified petition by the vendee, are within the power of the Legislature to enact.

2. Same—Claims Against Estate—Specific Performance—Enforcement.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1597–1602, which in substance provide that, when the vendor in a contract to convey land dies before conveyance, the court may authorize the executor or administrator to convey the land on presentation of a verified petition by the vendee, an executor or administrator has the same right as an outside party to file a petition for, and obtain, a conveyance of property which the decedent contracted during his lifetime to convey to him, and need not first resign his position as executor or administrator, in order to have his claim enforced against the estate.

3. Vendor and Purchaser—Contracts—Imperfect Description—Supplying Omissions.

Where a contract for the sale of land, described the property from the point of beginning "northerly along said easterly line of P. street 25 feet; thence easterly, and parallel with F. street, 118 feet, 9 inches; thence at right angles westerly, parallel to F. street, 113 feet, 2 inches, more or less, to the point of beginning"—thus obviously omitting the easterly boundary of the premises, the contract was enforceable by reading the description as if there were inserted therein, immediately preceding the phrase "thence at right angles westerly," etc., the phrase "thence at right angles southerly, and parallel to P. street, 25 feet."

4. Extrinsic Evidence — Contracts — Construction—Ambiguities of Description.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, providing that, for the construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and of the parties to it, may be shown, testimony that the vendee had occupied the premises in question for many years, and that they were inclosed with a fence and improved with buildings, and as to the dimensions of the premises so occupied and improved, is admissible on the issue of what premises were agreed to be conveyed by a contract of sale, which was imperfect in its description of the premises subject thereto.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Frederic Garnier, deceased. From a decree directing Alexandrine Sarraille, administratrix, to execute a conveyance of real estate which deceased had agreed to convey during his lifetime, Rosalie Garnier and others, heirs of the deceased, appeal. Affirmed.

Eugene Bianchi, Jr., and Jas. F. Tevlin, for appellants. Barna McKinne, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from the decree in the probate court directing the administratrix to execute a conveyance of real estate. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure on the question involved, prior to the amendment of the last session of the Legislature, are as follows:

"1597. When a person who is bound by contract in writing to convey any real estate dies before making the conveyance, and in all cases when such decedent, if living, might be compelled to make such conveyance, the court may make a decree authorizing and directing his executor or administrator to convey such real estate to the person entitled thereto.

"1598. On the presentation of a verified petition by any person claiming to be entitled to such conveyance from an executor or administrator, setting forth the facts upon which the claim is predicated, the court, or a judge thereof, must appoint a time and place for hearing the petition, and must order notice thereof to be published at least four successive weeks before such hearing, in such newspaper in this state as he may designate.

"1599. At the time and place appointed for the hearing, or at such other time to which the same may be postponed, upon satisfactory proof by affidavit or otherwise of the due publication of the notice, the court must proceed to a hearing, and all persons interested in the estate may appear and contest such petition, by filing their objections in writing, and the court may examine, on oath, the petitioner and all who may be produced before him for that purpose.

"1600. If after a full hearing upon the petition and objections, and examination of the facts and circumstances of the claim, the court is satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to a conveyance of the real estate described in the petition, a decree authorizing and directing the executor or administrator to execute a conveyance thereof to the petitioner must be made, entered on the minutes of the court and recorded.

"1601. The executor or administrator must execute the conveyance according to the directions of the decree, a certified copy of which must be recorded with the deed in the office of the recorder of the county where the lands lie, and is prima facie evidence of the correctness of the proceedings, and of the authority of the executor or administrator to make the conveyance.

"1602. If, upon hearing, as hereinbefore provided, the right of the petitioner to have a specific performance of the contract is found to be doubtful, the court must dismiss the petition without prejudice to the right of the petitioner, who may, at any time within six months thereafter, proceed by action to enforce a specific performance thereof."

The remaining sections of the chapter relate to recording the decree and conveyance and the effect thereof, etc. The amendments passed at the last session of the Legislature make these provisions of the Code apply also to the case of an agreement in writing to transfer personal property.

This special statutory remedy, conferring upon the probate court administering the estate jurisdiction to grant specific performance in cases where the right of petitioner in the premises is free from doubt (as in this case), would seem to be a wise provision. It evidently tends to save the expense and delay that would follow a separate action in equity for a specific performance. At any rate the remedy seems to be complete, and it is clearly within the power of the Legislature to prescribe such. In several of the states a summary special proceeding is allowed, by which a contract may be enforced without suit, as a step in the settlement of the deceased vendor's estate. In such case the statutory method may be followed, and the probate court having jurisdiction may authorize or order the administrator or executor of the decedent to make the conveyance which the vendor himself should have made had he been alive. Pomeroy on Specific Performance of Contracts, § 497 et seq. In this case the administratrix, Alexandrine Sarraille, a sister of the deceased, petitioned the probate court for an order directing her, as administratrix, to execute conveyance of the real estate described in the petition; the deceased in his lifetime having entered into an agreement in writing to convey the same to her. Upon the petition being filed, the court fixed a time and place for hearing the same, and ordered notice to be given by publication as directed by the Code. Publication was made, and at the time and place named in the order the appellants, Andrew Garnier, a brother, and Rosalie Garnier and Josephine Garcin, sisters, of the deceased, through their attorneys, made written objections to the petition, upon the ground, among others, that petitioner was disqualified and not allowed in law to assert her personal rights against herself as administratrix; that the estate of deceased was not represented, except by petitioner, whose interests were adverse to the estate. These objections were renewed by appellants when the matter came on for hearing, and were overruled by the court. After hearing of proofs offered on the part of petitioner, contestants offering no evidence, the court ordered the executrix to execute and deliver a deed of grant, bargain, and sale of the real estate in question.

An executor or administrator of an estate has the same right under the provisions of the Code to present a petition for conveyance of real estate (and, since the late amendment, also for a transfer of personal property) as any other party. In case of a money demand in favor of the executor or administrator, the claim is not allowed by the executor or administrator, but is presented to the judge for allowance, and, if allowed, becomes a charge against the estate, in the same manner as the claim of an outside party. In case the judge disallows the claim on a money demand, it is provided in the Code, under the settlement of estates, that the creditor may bring an action against the estate, and the summons is to be served upon the judge, who may appoint an attorney, at the expense of the estate, to defend the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 1510. By analogy in this case the judge might have appointed an attorney to represent the estate, and probably would have done so, if the heirs in question, being the only heirs of the deceased, excepting the administratrix, had not themselves appeared and contested the claim. However that may be, an executor or administrator under the law has the same right as an outside party, whether his claim be a money demand, or for the performance of a written contract to transfer property, and the law does not require that he should first resign his position as executor or administrator, in order to have his claim allowed or enforced against the estate. Thus the law is written, and it is not for the courts to say that some other course than that provided in the statute should have been pursued in this case. The judge of the probate court is the guardian of the estate, and the executor or administrator simply acts under his order and direction.

Appellants also raise the objection that the description of the land in the written contract is so defective that the contract should not be enforced. The real estate mentioned in the written agreement is as follows: "All the certain lot or parcel of land situate in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Palmer street, distance northerly seventy-nine (79) feet from the northeasterly corner of Palmer and Fairmount streets; thence northerly, along said easterly line of Palmer street, twenty-five (25) feet; thence easterly, and parallel with Fairmount street, one hundred and eighteen feet, nine inches ($118\ ^9/_{12}$); thence at right angles westerly, parallel to Fairmount street, one hundred and thirteen feet, two inches ($113\ ^2/_{12}$), more or less, to the point of beginning—being part of lot No. 2, in block 19, of the Fairmount tract, as recorded in a map in the recorder's office for the city and county of San Francisco." The first corner of the lot attempted to be described is the southwest corner; thence northerly, along the east line of Palmer street, 25 feet, which would be the northwest corner, with a frontage on the east line of Palmer street of 25 feet. The line then runs easterly, at right angles with Palmer street, and parallel with Fairmount street, 118 feet, 9 inches, which would be the northeast corner; and the description then reads, "thence at right angles westerly, parallel to Fairmount street, 113 feet, 2 inches, more or less, to the point of beginning," which is impossible. It would simply be returning on the same line to Palmer street, and necessarily could not reach the point of beginning by running parallel with Fairmount street. It clearly shows that the easterly line is omitted. It should read, after reaching the northeast corner, "thence at right angles southerly, and parallel to Palmer street, 25 feet; thence at right angles westerly, and parallel with Fairmount street, 113 feet, 2 inches, more or less, to the point of beginning." The original agreement, as admitted in evidence, shows it was drawn by the decedent himself. The court very properly admitted testimony to show that the petitioner had occupied the premises in question, which are described as commencing at a point on the easterly line of Palmer street, and fronting on Palmer street 25 feet, and running easterly, parallel with Fairmount street, 118 feet, 9 inches, and that the premises were inclosed with a fence and improved with buildings, and had been for 18 years prior to the date of the agreement, and that the rear of the lot was 25 feet, the same as the front, and that a barn stood on the rear of the lot, and that the barn was 25 feet in length and occupied the whole width of the lot; that the petitioner had lived on the premises with her family since March, 1885, and that these were the same premises mentioned in the agreement. "For the proper construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and of the parties to it, may also be shown, so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret." OPHIR SILVER MIN. CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,229.)

1. Venue—Local and Transitory Actions.

An action to recover only the value of ore or timber severed from land is transitory, and may be maintained wherever the trespasser can be served with summons, although plaintiff therein may be compelled to allege and prove ownership of the land from which the timber is cut, or the ore extracted; but, where the whole or any part of the damages claimed is for injury to the freehold, the action is local, and must, if the land is located in this state, be tried, by the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 392, in the county where the land is situated, or, if the land is located in another state, it must be tried in the courts of that state.

2. Same—Injunction of Trespasses.

An action in which the complaint alleges that defendants unlawfully, forcibly, and without the consent of plaintiffs entered upon a mining claim belonging to plaintiffs, and extracted and removed from the premises, and converted to their own use, large quantities of mineral deposits and precious metals; that they threaten and intend to continue to prosecute the business of mining such premises for their own use and benefit, and, unless restrained by the court, will continue to intrude and trespass upon the premises, and extract ores and mineral deposits therefrom to the great and irreparable injury of plaintiffs—and praying for an injunction restraining defendants from intruding or trespassing upon the premises, or from mining or extracting ores or deposits therefrom, for an accounting from defendants of the amount and value of the ore removed and converted by them, and for judgment for the amount found to be due, is based on defendants' trespasses on plaintiffs' premises, is local in character, and is not within the jurisdiction of the courts of a state other than that in which the premises are situated.

3. Mines and Mining—Title to Ore—Presumptions.

The title to everything within the surface lines of a mining claim to the center of the earth is prima facie in the patentee, if a patented claim, or, if unpatented, in any qualified locator in actual possession, and engaged in mining the same, and such person's claim of ownership of any body of ore within his lines, as against the owner of another surface claim, must, when asserted, be presumed to be a claim in good faith.

4. SAME — CONVERSION OF ORE — RECOVERY— FORM OF ACTION.

There can be no recovery, in a personal or transitory action, such as trover, of ore in specie, or of its value, when it has been taken from land in possession of defendant under claim and color of title asserted in good faith.

5. PROHIBITION—REMEDY BY APPEAL — ADEQUACY.

An appeal is not such an adequate remedy as to preclude the issuance of a writ of prohibition in a case of the erroneous retention of jurisdiction by the lower court, over a local action involving lands in another state, where many of the expenses of the action, such as for the transportation of witnesses, etc., from the state where the land is located, are not recoverable as legal costs.

In Bank. Petition for writ of prohibition by the Ophir Silver Mining Company and others against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and Thomas F. Graham, as judge thereof. Granted.

W. E. F. Deal, for petitioners. Baggett, Jones & Sheridan, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding, in which the petitioners pray for the issuance of a writ of prohibition to the superior court, and the judge thereof, commanding and directing them to desist and refrain from further proceeding in an action in which petitioners are made defendants. In response to our alternative writ, the respondents have filed an answer and demurrer to the petition. The answer raises no issue, except as to the adequacy of petitioners' remedy by appeal—a question of minor importance. The question of jurisdiction arises upon the demurrer. The petitioners are a California corporation and its directors, and their petition sets out a copy of the complaint against them, which was filed in the superior court, and copies of their several demurrers thereto, based upon the ground that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action. It is alleged that these demurrers were argued, submitted to the court, and by the court overruled. From this statement it will be seen that the question to be determined is whether the complaint, which the petitioners are required to answer and defend in the superior court of San Francisco, sets forth a cause of action over which that court has no jurisdiction.

It is therein alleged that the plaintiff, the Golden Gate Mill & Mining Company, and the defendants, the Ophir Silver Mining Company and the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, are California corporations having their offices and principal places of business in San Francisco; that ever since the year 1880 the plaintiff has been, and now is, the owner of and possessed of and entitled to the possession of a certain patented mining claim, situated in Storey county, Nev., consisting of surface ground with definite boundaries, and including a vein or lode bearing gold, silver, etc., having its top or apex within the limits of the surface lines, but in its downward course departing "easterly from the perpendicular," but remaining between vertical planes conforming to the end lines of the patented claim. The remaining allegations and the prayer of the complaint are as follows:

"That on or about the 1st day of August, 1903, the said defendants, Ophir Silver Mining Company, Charles H. Fish, Charles Hirshfeld, A. W. Havens, A. F. Coffin, Nat T. Messer, H. Zadig, John W. Twiggs, John Doe, Richard Roe, and Jane Foe, and their agents, servants, and employés, unlawfully, forcibly, and willfully, against the will and without the consent of plaintiff, entered into and upon the said ground and premises hereinabove described, and commenced, and then and thereafter, for the purpose of mining the said ground and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and extracting the ores therefrom, cut, made, and excavated certain drifts, tunnels, winzes, stopes, and openings into, under, and upon the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and the said ground and premises, and ever since the said last-mentioned date have intruded and trespassed upon the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and have dug up, extracted, taken out of, mined, and removed from the said ground and premises, and from the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and converted to their own use, large quantities of the mineral deposits, earth, rock and ores bearing gold and silver and other precious metals, of the value, as plaintiff is informed and believes, of $400,000 and upwards. That the said defendants threaten and intend to continue to prosecute, for their own use and benefit, the business of mining in, under, and upon the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and the excavating, digging, and removal of earth, rock, and ores bearing gold, silver, and other precious metals therefrom, and the sale and conversion of the same to their own use and benefit, and will so continue unless restrained and enjoined by this honorable court. That a large quantity of the said earth, rock, and ores so taken from the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, by the said defendants, has been sold and disposed of by them, and the proceeds thereof converted to their own use and benefit, and that a large part of the said proceeds so converted by them has been wasted and dissipated and expended in the payment of dividends upon the capital stock of the defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company, but that a large portion thereof, to wit, $95,000 or thereabouts, has been brought into this state by the said defendants and deposited with the defendant, the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, at the said city and county of San Francisco, California, to the use and benefit of the said defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company, and the said sum so deposited has been retained by and is now deposited with the defendant the Nevada National Bank of San Fracisco, to the use and benefit of the defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company, and that the said defendant, the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, threatens and intends, and unless restrained by this honorable court will pay out and disburse the said sum upon the checks and orders of the defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company, and the said defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company threatens to and intends to, and unless restrained by this honorable court will, issue and draw checks and orders upon the defendant the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, directing it to pay out and disburse to the use of the said defendant mining company all of the said sum so deposited with it, whereby the said sum will be wholly lost to the plaintiff to the great and irreparable injury of the plaintiff. That the said defendants, Ophir Silver Mining Company, Charles H. Fish, Charles Hirshfeld, A. W. Havens, A. F. Coffin, Nat T. Messer, H. Zadig, John W. Twiggs, John Doe, Richard Roe, and Jane Foe, threaten to and intend to, and unless restrained by this honorable court will, continue to intrude and trespass upon the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and intend to and will make further cuts, drifts, tunnels, winzes, stopes, openings, and excavations therein, for the purpose of mining the same and extracting the ores therefrom, and intend to and will continue to dig up, take out, mine, extract, and remove from the same and convert to their own use the rock and ores bearing gold and silver and other precious metals and other mineral deposits therein, of the value of $500,000 and upwards, and will thereby take from the same the entire mineral value thereof, before it will be possible to obtain a trial of this action, to the great and irreparable injury of the plaintiff. That unless the said defendants, their agents, servants, and employés, are restrained and enjoined from intruding and trespassing upon the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, and making and extending cuts, drifts, tunnels, winzes, stopes, openings, and excavations therein, and from digging up, extracting, mining, removing, and carrying away from the same the said mineral deposits, rock, earth, and ores bearing gold and silver and other precious metals, the value and substance of the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit will be destroyed and thereby the plaintiff will suffer great and irreparable injury. That plaintiff has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law against the said defendants, and can have relief only in a court of equity, where matters of this nature are properly cognizable and relievable.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays for an injunction pendente lite restraining the defendant Ophir Silver Mining Company from drawing or issuing its checks or orders upon the defendant the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco, requiring it to pay out any of the said moneys deposited with it out of the said proceeds, or from removing any of the said moneys so deposited, and restraining the defendant the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco from paying or honoring any of the said checks or orders, or from permitting the removal of any of the said funds, and that on the final hearing that the said injunction be made perpetual; for an injunction pendente lite restraining the defendants from intruding or trespassing upon the said ground and premises, and the said vein, lode, ledge, and deposit, or from mining, extracting, or removing therefrom any of the ores, rock, earth, or deposits bearing gold, silver, and other precious metals, or from converting the same to their own use, and that on the final hearing that the said injunction be made perpetual; for an accounting from the said defendants of the amount and value of the ores removed and converted by them, and that plaintiff have judgment against the defendants other than the Nevada National Bank of San Francisco for the sum of $400,000, or the amount and value of the said ores so removed by the said defendants; for a judgment requiring the defendant Nevada National Bank of San Francisco to pay to plaintiff the amount of the said moneys so deposited with it by the defendant mining company, out of the proceeds of the said ores so removed; and for general relief to which plaintiff may properly be entitled."

The contention on the part of the petitioner is that the issues tendered by this complaint determine the character of the action, and show conclusively that it is purely and simply an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, that it is therefore local, and that the jurisdiction belongs exclusively to the courts of Nevada, where the mine is situated. Respondents contend that it is purely and simply an action for the recovery of the value of personal property, trespass de bonis asportatis, or trover, that it is therefore transitory, and that the jurisdiction belongs to any court whose process will reach the persons of the trespassers. There is no doubt that the owner of land, if he chooses to waive all claim for damages to the freehold, may maintain a personal action for the value of timber or ores removed from the land by a naked trespasser, and the mere fact that in such action he may be compelled to allege, and, if denied, to prove, ownership of the land from which the timber is cut or the ore extracted, does not make the action local. There is as little doubt that, where the whole or any part of the damages claimed is for injury to the freehold, the action is local and not transitory. The basis of this distinction is stated by Chief Justice

Marshall in the course of his opinion in Livingston v. Jefferson, 1 Brock. 209, Fed. Cas. No. 8,411: "Actions are deemed transitory where the transactions upon which they are founded might have taken place anywhere, but are local when their cause is in its nature essentially local." As land can be injured only where it is situated, damages for such injuries can only be recovered where it is situated; but since timber or ores, when severed from the land by the act of a trespasser, remain the personal property of the owner, and are capable of being converted by any person anywhere, an action to recover only the value of the ore or timber after severance is transitory, and may be maintained wherever the trespasser can be served with summons. The validity of this distinction has been doubted, but the great authority of Lord Mansfield was exerted in vain to set it aside in England, and it has been enforced, not only there, but in most of the United States. In this state the rule is statutory that an action for injuries to real property must be tried in the county where the land is situated, except in those cases where a change of the place of trial may be ordered for special reasons. Code Civ. Proc. § 392. So that if an action were commenced in this state for a trespass upon land situated within this state, consisting in the cutting and removal of timber, or the digging and carrying away of ores, and any part of the damages claimed was for injury to the freehold, as distinct from the value of the timber or ores after severance, the jurisdiction of the action would belong to the superior court of the county in which the land was situated. We could not, therefore, without disregarding the law which we have made for ourselves, as well as the long course of decisions in England and the United States, hold that an action for damages to realty situated in the state of Nevada can be maintained in the courts of California. It is, however, not to be questioned that for a trespass to the person or to personal property, as for the breach of a contract, wherever committed, an action may be maintained in our courts; the venue depending in most instances upon the residence of the defendant.

The apparently conflicting decisions in cases arising out of trespasses of the character alleged in this complaint all recognize this distinction, and, if they present any real conflict, it arises solely from the varying constructions placed upon the pleadings in the several cases cited by counsel in determining what the gravamen of the action was —injury to the realty or value of the timber, earth, sand, or ore removed from the land. In Ellenwood v. Marietta Chair Co., 158 U. S. 105, 15 Sup. Ct. 771, 39 L. Ed. 913, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the circuit court of Ohio had no jurisdiction of an action for damages for cutting timber from lands in West Virginia, and this upon the theory that the principal ground of the action was the trespass to the land, the alleged value of the timber being a mere incident. Upon this ground it was distinguished in the later case of Stone v. United States, 167 U. S. 178, 17 Sup. Ct. 778, 42 L. Ed. 127, where it was held that an action could be maintained in the courts of the state of Washington for the value of timber cut by a trespasser from public lands in Idaho, and this upon the theory that the gravamen of the action was the conversion of the timber after its severance from the land. In American U. Telegraph Co. v. Middleton, 80 N. Y. 408, it was held that the courts of New York had no jurisdiction of an action for damages for cutting down telegraph poles in New Jersey. While in the case of Hoy v. Smith, 49 Barb. 360, the plaintiffs recovered in a New York court the value of ores extracted from a mine situated in Colorado. On the authority of the latter case a judgment for the value of earth removed by a trespasser was sustained in Radway v. Duffy, 79 App. Div. 116, 80 N. Y. Supp. 334, and the former case distinguished on the ground that no asportation of the telegraph poles was alleged; the action being wholly or principally for injury to the land of which the poles while standing were a part. In McGonigle v. Atchison, 33 Kan. 726, 7 Pac. 550, the jurisdiction of a Kansas court was sustained in an action to recover the value of sand dug from land situated in Missouri, because the plaintiff, while alleging the trespass upon the land, asked damages only for the value of the sand —the personal property—and waived all the wrongs and injuries to the real estate and to his possession thereof. The case of Dodge v. Colby, 108 N. Y. 445, 15 N. E. 703, involved a claim for damages to the freehold, and also for the value of the timber and turpentine removed from lands in Georgia. It was held that the allegation of value of the timber and turpentine was merely incidental and that the courts of New York had no jurisdiction. The report of the case does not show the form of the allegations, and does not aid us in construing the complaint in question here.

It would be a waste of time to pursue this analysis of the cases further. There is no real conflict upon the point of law, and the only difficulty is in determining what construction must be placed upon this complaint, the principal allegations of which I have preferred to set out in full, rather than to attempt a statement of their legal effect. It is plain that the pleader did not frame his complaint upon the present theory of the respondents; i. e., upon the theory that he was commencing a simple action at law to recover the value of ores severed from the mine by mere trespassers. Many of his allegations, and all of his prayer for relief, show that he was proceeding upon a very different theory, viz., that an action at law would afford him no adequate relief, and that it was necessary to invoke the powers of a court of equity, not only to compel an accounting, but to enjoin and restrain these petitioners from mining upon the ground of which in one part of his complaint he claims to be in possession, but which by his more specific allegations he shows to be in the possession of petitioners, who are systematically and continuously mining and appropriating the ores therein contained. Those parts of the complaint and of the prayer which look to an injunction against the Nevada Bank may be disregarded in the present discussion; that corporation not being a party to this proceeding and the questions as to the right to such an injunction not being in any event jurisdictional. But the allegations of continuing trespasses of the petitioners and their threat to continue the same, and the prayer for an injunction to restrain future trespasses pendente lite and perpetually, are more material. With respect to territorial jurisdiction there can be no difference between a suit in equity to restrain future trespasses upon real property and an action at law for past trespasses upon the same. If one is local the other is necessarily local, and for the reason which forms the basis of the distinction between local and transitory actions—for the reason, that is to say, that the injury to be redressed in one case, or prevented in the other, can only take place where the land or mine is situated. Besides, the right to an injunction in cases of this character does not merely involve incidentally the question of title to the mine, but essentially depends upon it. We are cited to no case in which the right of the courts of one state to enjoin threatened trespasses upon lands situate in another state or country has been upheld, and we are satisfied that as to so much of the relief sought against these petitioners the superior court is wholly without jurisdiction.

But the respondent contends that disregarding those parts of the prayer of his complaint to which we have referred, and the allegations to which they respond, and considering only his prayer for a judgment for the alleged value of the ores, his complaint, under our liberal rules of pleading, and for the purpose of sustaining the jurisdiction, may and should be treated as a complaint in an action of trover for conversion of the ores, and the superior court allowed to proceed upon that theory. It would, perhaps, be within our discretion in a proper case to frame an order and a writ in conformity with this suggestion; but we hardly think a simple action of trover for the value of personal property ought to be tried upon this complaint and any responsive answer. So long as the complaint contains allegations of threatened future injuries to the realty, and prays an injunction against future trespasses, the case is on a par with those cases in which a part of the damages claimed was for injury to the freehold. The complaint certainly requires amendment before the petitioners are compelled to answer, so that it may present the issues of which the superior court has jurisdiction plainly and by themselves; and it would seem to be as simple a mode as any of reaching the desired result to prohibit any further proceedings in the pending action, except to dismiss it without prejudice.

There are other considerations affecting this request of the respondents for a qualified denial of the writ. It is at least a probable inference from the allegations of the complaint which the petitioners have been required to answer that the actual case upon which the action is based is this: That the petitioners are mining in depth outside of the surface lines of the claim described in the complaint, either upon public land or within the surface lines of patented ground belonging to them or to third persons, and that the only claim of title on the part of the plaintiff is that they are extracting ore from the extralateral dip of the vein or lode which has its top or apex within the lines of its surface claim. All the allegations of the complaint are consistent with this construction, and upon any other construction the allegation as to the easterly dip of the lode included within the surface lines of plaintiff's patent is superfluous and meaningless. If this is the case, it will not support a personal and transitory action. There can be no recovery of wood or ore or hay in specie, or of its value, in an action of trover, when it has been taken from land in possession of the defendant under claim and color of title asserted in good faith. Halleck v. Mixer, 16 Cal. 574; Kimball v. Lohmas, 31 Cal. 157; Page v. Fowler, 28 Cal. 610; s. c., 37 Cal. 107, 109. The title to everything within the surface lines of a mining claim to the center of the earth is prima facie in the patentee, if a patented claim, or, if unpatented, in any qualified locator in actual possession and engaged in mining thereon; and his claim of ownership of any body of ore within his lines as against the owner of another surface claim must, when asserted, be presumed to be a claim in good faith. In such a case, the question of title is not incidental, but fundamental, and it cannot be litigated in a personal and transitory action.

Considerations more substantial than technical rules of procedure sustain this conclusion. The trial of the questions necessarily arising in such a case would call for the testimony, not only of scientific experts, but of many practical experts (miners), who had examined the ground and been through all the tunnels, drifts, etc., by means of which the alleged identity of the croppings in one claim and the ore found in the other could be supported or disproved. A somewhat extensive and varied experience in the trial of such issues in the mining litigation of Nevada convinces me that the practical inconvenience in the way of delay and expense in trying the title to Nevada mines in the state of California would be intolerable to the litigants and equally so to the courts; and the same doctrine which would compel a Nevada miner to litigate the title to his mine in the courts of California would compel the owner of a California mine to defend his title in the courts of Maine or Florida. For the reason, therefore, that the complaint under consideration does plainly count upon threatened injury to the freehold as a ground of relief (by injunction), which the court has no power to grant, and because disregarding the allegation of threatened injury to the freehold, the more reasonable construction of the remaining allegations presents a case involving the determination of a disputed title, we think the writ of prohibition should be made absolute. If there are grounds for a personal action, the plaintiff can dismiss the present action without prejudice, and in a new complaint present its case in a form corresponding to the construction which we are asked to give to the present complaint.

The attempted denial in the answer of the great and unnecessary costs and expenses to which the petitioners would be subjected by a trial in California of the issues tendered in the complaint is wholly insufficient. That they would have a remedy by appeal is, of course, true, but this remedy would be wholly inadequate, for the reason that much the greater part of the expenses (of transporting witnesses, etc.) could not be recovered as legal costs. This fact distinguishes the case from Lindley v. Superior Court, 141 Cal. 220, 74 Pac. 765.

Let the peremptory writ of prohibition issue as prayed.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 10, 1905.)

1. Officers—Misconduct — Removal — Procedure.

Pen. Code, § 758, provides that an accusation against any municipal officer for "willful or corrupt misconduct in office" may be presented by the grand jury. Section 772 provides for the summary removal of public officers on an accusation verified by the oath of any person alleging that the officer has "neglected or refused to perform the official duties pertaining to his office." Section 335 declares every public officer who refuses or neglects to inform against and prosecute persons whom he has reasonable cause to believe offenders of the chapter on gambling guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that a public officer who fails to prosecute gamblers of whom he has knowledge is guilty of "willful misconduct," within the meaning of section 758, and may be accused by the grand jury thereunder.

2. Municipal Officers—Removal—Authority.

Const. art. 4, § 18, provides for the impeachment of certain state officers, and further provides that all other state officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe. Pen. Code, § 15, defines a crime, and declares that it is punished, inter alia, by removal from office. Section 333 makes it a misdemeanor for a public officer to neglect to prosecute violations of the gambling law. Sections 758 and 772 provide for the removal of public officers for misconduct in office and for neglect to perform official duties by proceedings in the superior court. Const. art. 11, § 8, declares that a freeholders' charter shall supersede inconsistent legislation. A municipal freeholders' charter embodied an incomplete scheme for the removal of certain municipal officers by the board of trustees, but nowhere conferred exclusive jurisdiction in the premises on such board. It provided generally that any official defalcation or neglect of duty should be laid by the mayor before the board of trustees, city attorney, or district attorney. Held, that the board of trustees did not have exclusive jurisdiction to remove a police officer who failed to prosecute gambling offenders, nor was its jurisdiction inconsistent with that conferred by the general law on the superior court, but the jurisdiction of the court was in its nature judicial, while that of the trustees was rather administrative, and the jurisdictions were concurrent, and the remedies obtainable through the exercise of either were cumulative.

3. Same—Removal Under General Laws—Interference with Municipal Charter.

Pen. Code, §§ 758, 772, which confer on the superior court jurisdiction to remove municipal officers for official misconduct and neglect, do not subordinate and control a provision of a freeholders' charter, providing for the removal of such officers by the municipal board of trustees, which they leave in full operation, prescribing merely a concurrent remedy, and are not, as so construed, displaced as to the municipality by Const. art. 11, § 6, declaring that municipal charters shall be controlled by general laws "except in municipal affairs."

In Bank. Application by M. Coffey for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed against the superior court of Sacramento county, E. C. Hart, judge, and others. On demurrer to the petition. Sustained.

Rehearing denied September 5, 1905.

Devlin & Devlin and James B. Devine, for petitioner. A. M. Seymour, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. On August 24, 1904, the grand jury of the county of Sacramento presented and filed in the superior court of that county an accusation against M. Coffey, chief of police of the city of Sacramento, the petitioner herein. The accusation, after alleging the official character of the petitioner, that the city of Sacramento is a municipal corporation governed by a freeholders' charter, and that petitioner at all the times mentioned therein was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting chief of police of the city of Sacramento, charges that on the 22d, 23d, and 24th days of August, 1904, certain prohibited and illicit gaming, consisting of faro, roulette, klondyke, and other illegal banking and percentage games, was conducted in the city of Sacramento, specifying the several places in said city in which said illegal gaming was being conducted; that on all of said dates the said chief of police had knowledge of the fact that said illicit gambling was so being conducted in said places in an open, notorious, public, and flagrant, manner; and that, notwithstanding he had knowledge of this fact, said M. Coffey, as chief of police of said city, "willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and intentionally failed, refused, and neglected, and does now willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and intentionally fail, refuse, and neglect, to inform against, and diligently, or otherwise, prosecute the persons who he knew and who he had cause to believe were so dealing, playing, carrying on, opening, causing to be opened, and conducted the said illegal games; and the said M. Coffey also failed, refused, and neglected to prosecute said persons and to suppress said illegal games." It is further charged in the accusation that persons owning the buildings in which said illegal games were being carried on rented said houses and premises for the purpose of permitting such illegal games to be conducted, and that said chief of police had knowledge of that fact, but, notwithstanding such knowledge, he willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, and intentionally refused, failed, and neglected to inform against, or diligently, or otherwise, prosecute the said persons who are alleged to be the owners or renters of the buildings so used. It prays that said M. Coffey be cited to appear, and upon the due hearing of said accusation that he be removed from his office as chief of police of the city of Sacramento. The petitioner, in due course, appeared, and objected by demurrer to the legal sufficiency of the accusation and the jurisdiction of the superior court to try it, and asked that it be dismissed. The demurrer was overruled, and the petitioner pleaded not guilty. The superior court being about to proceed with the trial of the accusation, upon the application of the petitioner an alternative writ of prohibition was issued out of this court directing the respondents to show cause why they should not refrain from further proceedings under the accusation. The matter is now before us upon a demurrer to the petition for the writ of prohibition.

In order to clearly understand one of the points made by petitioner under his application for this writ, it is necessary to refer to certain sections of the Penal Code, found in the chapter thereof providing for the removal of civil officers otherwise than by impeachment. Section 758 of that Code provides that "an accusation in writing against any district, county, township, or municipal officer, for wilful or corrupt misconduct in office, may be presented by the grand jury of the county for or in which the officer accused is elected or appointed." Subsequent sections prescribe the procedure upon the trial of the accused, and, if convicted, declare that the court shall pronounce judgment removing him from office. Section 772, following, provides for summary proceedings for the removal of public officers "when an accusation in writing, verified by the oath of any person, is presented to a superior court, alleging that any officer within the jurisdiction of the court has refused or neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office." It will be observed from a comparison of these sections that the section first referred to provides for the initiation of proceedings for the removal of a public officer by the grand jury "for wilful or corrupt misconduct in office" on the part of such officer; the latter section for the initiation of proceedings having in view the same end, by a private individual, when the public officer "has refused or neglected" to perform official duties. This difference in the terms of the section affords the basis for the claim of petitioner that the accusation in question does not charge him with "willful or corrupt misconduct in office," but simply with neglect or refusal to perform the duties pertaining to his office, and that hence the superior court has no jurisdiction to proceed with the trial, as the proceeding should have been instituted by a private individual under section 772 of the Penal Code, instead of section 758 thereof; that the grand jury could only accuse petitioner of "willful or corrupt misconduct in office" under section 758; and that the facts alleged in the accusation do not support such a charge.

We cannot agree with petitioner's view of the effect of the charges made, or with his view of the application of the code sections to them. It is of no consequence in the consideration of the question here involved to determine for what derelictions of duty proceedings under section 772 must be had; whether that section applies only to those cases where the official dereliction is the result simply of incompetency in the officer, or springs from carelessness or inattention to his official duties. The question here is, do the charges embraced in the accusation show "willful misconduct" under section 758? This latter section provides for two classes of misconduct for which a public officer may be removed under accusation by the grand jury—willful misconduct or corrupt misconduct. The phrase "misconduct in office" is broad enough to include any willful malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance in office. State v. Slover, 113 Mo. 208, 20 S. W. 788. In Mechem on Public Officers (section 457) it is stated that: "Misconduct in office does not necessarily imply corruption or criminal intention. The official doing of a wrongful act, or official neglect to do an act which ought to have been done, will constitute the offense, although there was no corrupt or malicious motive." After defining "misconduct," Webster declares it to be synonymous with "misbehavior," "misdemeanor," "delinquency," and "offense." In the chapter on gambling in the Penal Code which prohibits and makes penal the conducting of such games as are charged to have been conducted in the city of Sacramento with the knowledge of petitioner, it is provided by section 335 of that Code that "every * * * police officer must inform against and diligently prosecute persons whom they have reasonable cause to believe offenders against the provisions of this chapter, and every such officer refusing or neglecting to do so is guilty of a misdemeanor." The accusation in question here charges that the unlawful gaming specified was being conducted in the city of Sacramento; that the petitioner knew of it, and refused and failed to prosecute the offenders. This failure and refusal to do so, if true, was, under the circumstances, a misdemeanor on the part of petitioner—a crime of which, in his official capacity, he was guilty, and which of itself constituted a willful misconduct in office. It was not a mere neglect of duty. It was a failure to discharge his duty with knowledge of the facts calling for official action; a failure which was willful, and which evidenced a fixed purpose not to do what actual knowledge and the requirements of the law declare he shall do. Taking, then, into consideration the general definition as to what constitutes misconduct in office, coupled with the section of the statute making it a misdemeanor for a police officer to refuse or neglect to inform against or prosecute for such illicit gambling, of the existence of which it is charged the petitioner had knowledge, we entertain no doubt that the accusation sufficiently charged willful misconduct in office on the part of petitioner of such a character as, it is contemplated by the provisions of section 758 of the Penal Code, the grand jury may accuse him of before the superior court, and that the objection of the petitioner that the charges in the accusation did not bring him within the terms of that section, so as to authorize initiation of a prosecution against him by the grand jury, is untenable.

It is insisted, however, by the petitioner, that the superior court has no jurisdiction to try him. In that regard it is contended that by the freeholders' charter of the city of Sacramento the board of trustees of the said city is constituted a tribunal for the trial of city officers charged with misconduct in office or neglect of duty, and that this jurisdiction is exclusive; that the provisions of the Penal Code were superseded by the charter provisions under section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution, as being laws inconsistent with such charter. We perceive no merit in this claim. It is true that the charter of the city of Sacramento deals with the matter of removal of city officers. Under its provisions the mayor shall report any dereliction, neglect, or nonperformance of duty of an officer to the board of trustees, who may proceed to try him under the accusation, and remove him from office if they find the charges true. A trustee may be removed only for malfeasance in office. As to the mayor himself, there is no provision for his trial or removal should he be guilty of misconduct. The provisions of the charter seem to apply only to some officers, and the scheme for the removal of delinquent officials is to that extent incomplete. It is further generally provided that any official defalcation, willful neglect of duty, or official misconduct of an officer which the mayor may discover, or which is reported to him, shall be laid by him before the board of trustees, city attorney, or district attorney, "in order that the public interests may be protected, and the person in default be proceeded against according to law." There is nowhere in the charter any provision which in terms confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the board of trustees to proceed against and remove municipal officers, nor is there apparent in any of the charter provisions an intention that its provisions should supersede the provisions of the general law as found in the sections of the Penal Code relative to the removal of delinquent officials from office. In fact, taking into consideration that provision of the charter itself which requires the mayor to report official delinquencies to the board of trustees, or the city attorney, or the district attorney, in order that the public interests may be protected, and the delinquent official proceeded against according to law, it is apparent that no exclusive jurisdiction was intended to be conferred on the board of trustees, but only a jurisdiction which, as far as the charter provided causes for removal and proceedings to remove, should be concurrent with the jurisdiction of the superior court under the general law. By directing that a report of the dereliction of city officials might be made to the "district attorney" in order that proceedings against them might be taken by him "according to law," it is obvious that no exclusive jurisdiction in the board of trustees was intended to be conferred. The district attorney, having no official connection at all with the municipality, could proceed only under the general law by directing the grand jury's attention to the matter of official delinquencies which was called to his attention by the mayor, and having an accusation presented by the grand jury under section 758 of the Penal Code, such as was presented here, or inaugurating a proceeding under section 772 of the same Code at the instance of a private individual.

We have called attention to these matters simply to show that upon the face of the charter there is nothing found which, either in terms or by implication, confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the board of trustees to remove municipal officers. Neither do we perceive, as contended, any inconsistency between the power to remove delinquent officials conferred on the trustees under the charter and the jurisdiction conferred upon the superior court under the provisions of section 758 and the following sections. The power or jurisdiction conferred in either case is directed to the same subject-matter—a derelict municipal officer; and the remedy in either case is the same—his removal from office. Under either the general law or under the charter the same evil is dealt with, and the same remedy provided. The method of procedure is, it is true, different; but this does not affect the matter of consistency, and proceeds from the difference in the nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the superior court and by the board of trustees under the charter. The one is judicial, the other political or administrative, or at best quasi judicial. The power conferred under the charter is, strictly speaking, the power of expulsion or amotion of its municipal officers, lodged in its executive and legislative branches, and exercised in the discharge of an administrative duty. This power of expulsion, amotion, or quasi impeachment of delinquent municipal officers has generally been considered both at common law and in this country as an incident to corporate existence, and is exercised by the municipality as an administrative duty, springing from its political existence, and as vital thereto, to remove incompetent, unfaithful, and unworthy officers in the interest of good order and government. It is, strictly speaking, this administrative power which is conferred upon the trustees of the city of Sacramento under the charter, and the proceedings against officials provided for therein are administrative, rather than judicial. The proceedings under the Penal Code are essentially judicial, and the jurisdiction to entertain an accusation of the grand jury against a municipal officer for corrupt or willful misconduct in office is conferred upon the superior court by the Legislature under a constitutional provision directly authorizing the Legislature to so confer it. Article 4, section 18, of the Constitution, provides for the impeachment of certain state officers for misdemeanor in office, and then further provides that "all other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide." Official misconduct at common law was an indictable offense, and the result of conviction removal from office. Brackton's Abridgment, tit. "Office and Officer." The charge against the petitioner constitutes both at common law and under the provision of the Penal Code a public offense—a misdemeanor in office—and the proceedings under which he is prosecuted are of a criminal nature. Aside from section 333 of the Penal Code, to which we have heretofore referred, which makes it a crime for a police officer to refuse or neglect to proceed against and prosecute violations of the general law against gambling, it is further provided by section 15 of the same Code that "a crime or public offense is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed upon conviction either of the following punishments: * * * Fourth. Removal from office." The provisions of the Penal Code constitute a general law applicable to all municipal corporations, whether created by freeholder charter, existing under special charter granted prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, or organized under the general municipal act. The judicial proceedings which are there provided for may be inaugurated by the grand jury or by a private individual. Under the charter the proceeding can be inaugurated only by the mayor. In the one instance a more general right is conferred to proceed towards the removal of such officers than in the other. Authorizing proceedings under the general law to remove municipal officers is not inconsistent with the charter provisions also empowering the board of trustees to do the same thing. There are simply provided several tribunals in which to administer the same remedy, and the remedies are cumulative. The subject-matter over which jurisdiction is conferred is common to both—official delinquency; and the same remedy is to be applied by each—removal from office. It is not at all unusual for different tribunals to have concurrent jurisdiction over the same subject-matter, the same parties, and to be empowered to grant the same relief; and, in our judgment, that is the condition here. The jurisdiction conferred upon the board of trustees is not exclusive, but concurrent with that of the superior court under the provisions of the general law. And the granting of this power to remove delinquent officers by the charter is not at all inconsistent with the existence of concurrent jurisdiction in the superior court over the same subject-matter. Nor did the charter provision in that respect supersede the general law as inconsistent with the charter under section 8, art. 11, of the Constitution.

It is insisted by counsel for petitioner that his position in this matter is supported by the ruling of this court in Croly v. Board of Trustees of Sacramento, 119 Cal. 229, 51 Pac. 323. That was a proceeding in prohibition, in which Croly, then the superintendent of streets of the city of Sacramento, sought to prohibit the board of trustees under the charter from trying him on certain charges of misconduct, on the ground that jurisdiction to remove him was exclusively vested in the superior court, to be inaugurated by a proceeding under section 758 et seq.—the general law we have been considering. This court sustained the power of the board of trustees to try him. Counsel construes the language in the opinion in that case as holding, in effect, that jurisdiction was vested in the board under the charter to do so.

We do not so understand the decision. The main question there was not whether the superior court had exclusive jurisdiction to try him, but whether the board of trustees had any jurisdiction to do so. The contention of counsel for Croly in that case was that the provision of the charter was unconstitutional, as an attempt to confer judicial power upon the board of trustees. It was held that vesting the board of trustees with power to try and remove municipal officers was rather the exercise of a power necessary to secure good governmental administration—a political and administrative power; and the right of the board of trustees to try him was sustained on that ground. It was not decided that the jurisdiction of the board was exclusive, or that jurisdiction in the superior court concurrent with that vested in the board did not exist. It is said in the decision, and the power was sustained on that ground, that "it is clear that the right of amotion is but the exercise of a police power necessary to the welfare of a city." We cannot perceive anything in the decision of the Croly Case which sustains petitioner's contention.

It is finally insisted that the removal of municipal officers is purely a "municipal affair," and that as to such matters the charter provision under section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution, cannot "be subject to and controlled by general laws." Whether the removal of petitioner is or is not a "municipal affair" has been very largely discussed by counsel upon both sides, but we do not perceive that the solution of that question is germane to the case. The general law, which confers jurisdiction on the superior court to entertain proceedings for the removal of municipal officers, does not thereby render the charter provision conferring similar jurisdiction on the board of trustees "subject to and controlled by" the general law. To be "subject to" is "to become subservient to" or "subordinate to," and to "control" is defined as "to exercise a directing, restraining, or governing influence over; to direct, to counteract, to regulate." Cent. Dict. The general law does not have this effect. That law, conceding that the removal of municipal officers is purely a "municipal affair," does not assume to subordinate or make subservient the jurisdiction conferred on the trustees by the charter to remove delinquent officers, or to control, govern, direct, or regulate it. The jurisdiction under the charter is exercised untrammeled, unrestrained, and uncontrolled by the fact that jurisdiction on the subject is also conferred on the superior court under the general law. The jurisdiction of both is consistent and concurrent.

The demurrer to the petition is sustained.

SMITH v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 4,353.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 8, 1905.)

1. DIVORCE—INTERLOCUTORY DECREE.
Under Civ. Code, § 132, as amended, an interlocutory decree of divorce must be entered in the judgment book one year before a final decree can be granted.

2. SAME—APPEAL FROM INTERLOCUTORY DECREE.
By the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 131, the right to appeal from an interlocutory decree in divorce, determining that one of the parties is entitled to a decree, continues for six months after the entry.

In Bank. Mandamus by Nelita Estrada Smith to compel the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to enter a final decree of divorce in her favor. Writ denied.

R. M. F. Soto (O. F. Meldon, of counsel), for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate requiring the superior court to enter a final decree of divorce. In an action by petitioner against her husband, the court heard the evidence, and an order was entered in its minutes reciting the submission and consideration of the cause, and adding: "it is ordered by the court that an interlocutory decree of divorce be entered herein in favor of the plaintiff on grounds of defendant's willful neglect and desertion." Nothing further was done. No findings were filed, and no decree ever entered in the judgment book. More than a year after the entry in the court minutes, above quoted, petitioner, upon proper notice, moved the court to enter a final decree, which motion was denied.

These being the facts, the petition for the writ of mandate must be denied. We hold that upon the proper construction of section 132 of the Civil Code, as recently amended, an interlocutory decree of divorce must be entered in the judgment book one year before a final decree can be granted, and under section 131 the right to appeal from the interlocutory decree continues for six months after such entry.

Writ denied.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RY. CO. v. WORKMAN et al. (L. A. 1,302.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 8, 1905.)

In Bank. On application for rehearing. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 79 Pac. 586.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause by the court in bank. The principal question presented by the two appeals is new and important, and I think has been decided without sufficient consideration of the consequences involved in the precedent we are making, and without any consideration of a proposition the correct determination of which is absolutely essential to a just conclusion upon the matters in controversy.

The statement of the case in the department opinion is in some respects inaccurate and obscures the real question to be decided. The appeal from the judgment and the appeal from the order each rests upon its own separate record. The case on the appeal from the judgment is presented by the complaint and the default decree. The case on the appeal from the order granting a temporary injunction is presented by the complaint, the bill of exceptions, setting forth the evidence introduced at the hearing of the motion, and the order. The record on this latter appeal shows fully and clearly the actual state of facts out of which the controversy arises. The record on the appeal from the judgment shows only the facts alleged in the complaint and admitted by the demurrer. The assessment of the so-called "right of way" is not set out in the complaint, but does appear in full in the bill of exceptions constituting a part of the record on the appeal from the order. The opinion of the court, however, which deals exclusively with the appeal from the judgment, quotes a portion of the assessment ("being the Southern California Railway right of way," etc.), in order to show (if that is what the opinion means) that it was evidently the intention to assess the mere easement of the right of way. If, instead of the language so quoted, the whole assessment had been set out as it appears in the bill of exceptions, it would be seen that there was no attempt to assess an easement as such, but simply an assessment to unknown owners of a tract of land described rather indefinitely by boundary lines, but identified by the additional term of description: "Being the Southern California Railway right of way between Avenues 33 and 50." It may be true that this and the other evidence contained in the bill of exceptions will serve as an aid to interpretation in dealing with ambiguous phrases used in the complaint, but for this purpose the whole must be taken, and not a part; and considering the whole evidence together, in connection with the argument of plaintiff's counsel as contained in the briefs, it is very evident that the phrase "right of way," in plaintiff's mouth, means, not a mere easement of one person in the lands of another, but the strip of land over which the line extends, whether owned by the railway company or by another. It is in this untechnical sense that the expression is used by the assistant engineer of the plaintiff in his affidavit, constituting the principal evidence offered by plaintiff on the hearing of the motion. He deposes that the plaintiff acquired different portions of its "right of way" by various bargain and sale and quitclaim deeds, and as to that portion of the so-called right of way with which we are particularly concerned—the portion, that is to say, about 1,000 feet in length, which actually abuts upon Pasadena avenue—he sets out the description of the property so conveyed as follows: "Being a strip of land 30 feet wide on each side of the center line of the railroad track of the California Central Railway," etc.; "also a strip of land on the westerly side of the foregoing described strip, and adjoining the same, 40 feet wide and 900 feet long, being 450 feet north and the same distance south from the center line of Morgan Station as now located; also" other adjacent strips similarly described. In short, the evidence plainly shows that what the plaintiff calls its "right of way" is really and truly a strip of land 60 feet in width for the most part, along the center line of which its track extends, and which it owns in fee. For about 1,000 feet where it abuts on Pasadena avenue, this strip is extended back 40 feet further to accommodate a railway station, and the whole strip 100 feet in width is likewise owned by the plaintiff in full property. It has no easement. It owns the soil, but calls it nevertheless its "right of way."

The assessor, in his effort to make his description of the tract assessed definite and certain, merely used the expression "right of way" in the sense in which the plaintiff's witnesses use it—the sense in which it is often used in the records and briefs that come to this court, and the sense in which we can take judicial notice it is commonly employed by railroad men. See So. Pac. Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032. Looking to the assessment itself as it appears in the bill of exceptions, no other possible construction can be placed upon it than that of an assessment of a tract of land, and all the other evidence tends only to strengthen this view. It is also clear that the plaintiff was the owner in full property of all that portion of the tract abutting on Pasadena avenue. The question, therefore, which is really presented on the actual facts of the case, is whether a lot of land abutting on a public street ceases to be assessable as such for its proportion per front foot of the cost of grading, etc., when acquired and used by a railroad company for laying its track and operating its trains. But the question to be determined on the appeal from the judgment depends, not on the facts as proved at the hearing of the motion, but on the facts alleged in the complaint and confessed by the demurrer; and it is necessary to consider whether there is any material difference between the facts alleged and the real facts. I do not think that there is. It is alleged that there was an attempt to assess the right of way; but what the assessor actually did is not alleged specifically, and the assessment as it appears of record is not set forth. The allegation is rather of a conclusion of law than a matter of fact, and, construed with reference to other allegations, evidently means no more than what is in fact true that he assessed the strip of land which plaintiff calls its right of way. It is alleged, for instance, that the holder of the land demanded of the defendant Workman that he should sell the right of way to satisfy the bond, and thereupon defendant published the notice, a copy of which is incorporated in the complaint, and that, unless restrained, defendant will under said advertisement and notice attempt to sell the right of way, etc. Looking to the notice itself, we find that it says nothing about selling a right of way, but merely announces the sale of a tract of land. In short, when the phrase "right of way" is construed in the sense in which plaintiff uses it in the complaint itself, it can be seen that nothing inconsistent with the truth is alleged, and so the question is the same in both appeals: Does a lot of land abutting upon a public street become unassessable for street improvements when acquired and used by a railroad company for laying its track and operating its trains? In effect, the opinion of the court holds that it does become exempt from the burden which the law imposes upon all other property similarly situated. For, although the decision only declares in terms that there is no authority for making an assessment upon a right of way, it means, when construed with reference to the facts of the case, that you cannot assess or sell a tract of land belonging to a railroad company, if its track extends over it, without expressly exempting the right of way; that is to say, without reserving to the company in the express terms of the sale the exclusive right to use the land for all the purposes of its traffic. The proposition broadly laid down is that a part of a railroad company's right of way cannot be sold on execution or for a street assessment. Of course, it is consistent and logical to say that such property cannot be assessed if it cannot be sold; for there is no possible way of enforcing a delinquent assessment for street improvements, except by a sale of the abutting lots, and an assessment which binds no one is equivalent to no assessment at all.

But I dispute the proposition that a right of way cannot be sold on execution or for a street assessment. As to executions, the unsoundness of the proposition is easily demonstrated by a simple example: Suppose a tract of land subject to a judgment or mortgage lien to be sold by the mortgagor or judgment debtor to a railroad company and crossed by its track; or suppose, instead of a sale of the land, a grant of the mere easement of the right to lay and operate the track. Can it be pretended that the judgment creditor or mortgagee would not have the right to sell the land on execution, freed of the servitude, if necessary to satisfy the lien? I imagine his right to make the sale will scarcely be denied, and yet all the direful consequences to the public and the company—stoppage of traffic, forfeiture of franchise, etc.—would follow just as surely (or, rather, they would be just as surely avoided by a satisfaction of the debt and discharge of the lien) upon such a sale as upon a sale for a delinquent street assessment. For this reason I say the opinion is here again perfectly logical and consistent in putting sales upon execution and sales to satisfy delinquent assessments upon the same footing. All the reasons advanced against the right to make such sales have the same application to one as to the other. I go further, and say that all the reasons in favor of the right to sell on execution in the case supposed apply with equal force in favor of the right to sell in satisfaction of a delinquent street assessment. By the general laws of the state an equal burden is imposed upon all abutting lots in proportion to frontage for the purpose of improving the street. The front-foot rule being the basis of apportionment, the law would be unconstitutional if it did not have a uniform application, and an assessment upon a part only of the frontage to pay for any particular improvement would be void. Neither the Legislature by statute, nor the assessor by his assessment, can, by exempting a portion of the frontage, impose an excessive burden upon the balance. People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15, 21 Am. Rep. 677. And what cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. The Legislature could not, if it would, exempt a lot owned or used by a railway company from its liability to contribute equally with other lots similarly situated to the expense of street improvements. But there has been no attempt to confer any such exemption by the Legislature. By the law all abutting property is subjected to a uniform charge in proportion to frontage, and when an improvement is made the lien, till then merely potential, becomes fixed and definite, and there is no more reason why the property should not be sold in satisfaction of such a lien than there is for saying it could not be sold to satisfy the lien of a judgment or mortgage in the case above supposed.

The serious consequence to flow from this decision is that hereafter, when any part of the lots fronting on a public street is used by a railway company for its track, the street must remain unimproved; for the assessment cannot include the whole frontage, and, if it does not, it will be void, according to the decision in People v. Lynch, supra, and the cases in which that decision has been followed and affirmed.

1 Cal. App. 281

PACIFIC PAVING CO. v. VIZELICH et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District. California. July 6, 1905.)

1. COMPLAINT—DEFECTS—WAIVER—STIPULATIONS.

Where, after a demurrer to a complaint had been overruled, the parties stipulated that judgment should be entered as prayed in the complaint in case the plaintiff in another suit then pending recovered, such stipulation amounted to a waiver of the defects in the complaint.

2. REVIEW—JUDGMENT BY STIPULATION.

A judgment under a stipulation is a judgment by consent, which is not reviewable on appeal.

3. JUDGMENT—CONSTRUCTION—AMOUNT.

Where the complaint demanded judgment for $51.1898, with interest thereon at 10 per cent. per annum from September 21, 1892, to rendition of judgment, also $15 attorney's fees and taxable costs, a judgment for $107.02, enumerating principal, interest, and attorney's fees, should be construed as containing the attorney's fees as a part of the $107, and was therefore not objectionable, as greater than the amount prayed.

4. TRIAL—ISSUES—FAILURE TO FIND.

Where a complaint alleged V. was sole owner of the property in controversy, but that defendant F. had or claimed some interest therein, but the action was dismissed as to him, and his interest, if any, did not appear, the court's failure to find as to F.'s interest was not fatal to the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; E. I. Jones, Judge.

See 74 Pac. 352.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeals August 3, 1905; by Supreme Court September 2, 1905.

J. B. Webster and C. H. Fairall, for appellant. George A. Louttit and Gunnison, Booth & Bartnett, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Appeal from a judgment in an action to foreclose a street paving lien. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, with leave to answer. The court found: That subsequently the parties filed the following stipulation:

"It is stipulated and agreed that the defendants in the above-entitled actions need not file an answer in said actions, but that the said actions shall abide the result of the action of the Pacific Paving Company against J. L. Mowbray, 5,163 [see 59 Pac. 205], and whatever judgment may be finally entered in said actions shall also be entered in each of the above-entitled cases, whether the same be in favor of the plaintiff or defendant; and, if in favor of the plaintiff, then in each case according to the prayer of the complaint.

"Dated April 23rd, 1897.

"Jas. A. Louttit,
"Attorney for Plaintiff.
"F. H. Gould, James H. & J. E. Budd,
"Attorneys for Defendants."

That judgment was finally entered in favor of plaintiff in the action referred to in said stipulation. And on these findings the court entered judgment for plaintiff "for the sum of $107.02, being the amount of principal and interest due on assessment against the lot in the complaint set forth, together with the further sum of $15, attorney's fees of plaintiff herein, and $14.80, costs in this action." Appellant makes two objections to the judgment: (1) That it is not supported either by the complaint or by the stipulation; and (2) that the court has failed to find all the material facts.

1. The insufficiency of the alleged facts is grounded in part upon the decision in Buckman v. Hatch, 139 Cal. 53, 72 Pac. 445. It is not contended that the court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person. The defect in the complaint is not pointed out, but we may assume, as it seems not to be denied by respondent, that there was some defect in the complaint in some matter of substance. The record shows nothing but the complaint (filed December 2, 1893), demurrer (overruled January 29, 1894), stipulation (filed April 28, 1897), findings (filed September 12, 1900), judgment (entered September 12, 1900), and notice of appeal. We think the court was authorized to enter the judgment "according to the prayer of the complaint," in accordance with the stipulation or written agreement of the parties. This agreement was entered into more than three years after the demurrer was overruled, and manifestly to avoid a trial of this action on its merits. We think, also, it should be deemed to constitute a waiver of defects in the complaint, of which the demurrer was intended to take advantage. The plain and natural meaning of the agreement was that plaintiff should have judgment "according to the prayer of the complaint," regardless of defects in the complaint, on condition only that plaintiff recovered final judgment in the Mowbray Case presumably similar to this case. When the court found that such final judgment had been entered, and that said stipulation had been entered into by the present parties, the conclusion of law, as the court found, followed from these facts, "that plaintiff is entitled to judgment as prayed for in its complaint." See question in some particulars discussed in Cook v. Lion Fire Ins. Co., 67 Cal. 368, 7 Pac. 784. It was held in Erlanger v. S. P. R. R. Co., 109 Cal. 395, 42 Pac. 31, that judgment by consent will not be reviewed, whether or not a motion to dismiss the appeal be made; and a judgment under stipulation is a judgment by consent. See, also, Haskins v. Jordan, 123 Cal. 157, 55 Pac. 786; Spelling's New Trial and Appellate Practice, vol. 2, § 676, and notes.

But appellant suggests that, if the judgment is based upon the complaint, it is invalid, because the amount is greater than prayed for. The prayer demanded $51.1898, with interest thereon at 10 per cent. per annum from September 13, 1892, to rendition of judgment; also for $15 attorney's fees and taxable costs. The court gave judgment as hereinabove quoted. Computation shows that, by including the attorney's fees of $15 with the interest on the principal sum, we have the amount of the judgment, $107.02, and 11 cents more. If the judgment will admit of this construction, it is slightly less than prayed for. The costs are usually taxed separately, because not ascertainable when the judgment is entered. We must give the judgment such construction as will support it, if this may be done within reason and accepted rules of construction. Davis v. Lezinsky, 93 Cal. 126, 28 Pac. 811. We think it reasonably clear that the sum of $107.02 was meant to include both interest and attorney's fees with the principal, for the judgment reads, "the sum of $107.02, being the amount of," and then enumerates principal and interest, together with attorney's fees. It is true the language used does not point unmistakably to this meaning, but it is equally susceptible of this meaning as of the meaning contended for by appellant. Under such circumstances we do not think the ambiguity warrants reversal. Looking to the pleadings and findings, as we may do to ascertain the meaning of the judgment, the amount at once appears to include principal, interest, and attorney's fees allowed.

2. The complaint alleged that defendant Finkbohner has or claims some interest in the lot involved, upon which there is no finding. Appellant contends that failure to find as to Finkbohner's interest is fatal to the judgment. The action as to him was dismissed, as appears from the recitals of the judgment. What his interest in the lot was, if any, does not appear. The complaint alleged that defendant Vizelich was the sole owner, and it is the owner who is a necessary party. Robinson v. Merrill, 87 Cal. 11, 25 Pac. 162. In support of the judgment, and in view of the stipulation, we must presume that the action as to Finkbohner was properly dismissed, and hence no finding was necessary as to him.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARRINGTON v. PARDEE, Governor.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
July 6, 1905.)

STATES—OFFICERS—APPOINTMENT—ADVICE OF SENATE—ISSUANCE OF COMMISSION.

Under St. 1887, p. 67, c. 57, providing for the appointment of certain trustees by the Governor "with the advice and consent of the Senate," an appointment is not completed by the transmission of the nomination by the Governor to the Senate and the confirmation of the nomination by the Senate; but it is still discretionary, after such confirmation, for the Governor to issue the commission or not, and until the commission is issued the appointment is not completed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Application by John T. Harrington for a writ of mandate against George C. Pardee, as Governor of the state of California. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition, and from a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

BUCKLES, J. On March 16, 1901, Henry T. Gage, who was then the Governor of the state of California, nominated the plaintiff to the office of trustee of the California Home for the Care and Training of Feeble-Minded Children, and transmitted such nomination to the Senate, which was then in session, and the Senate duly advised in and consented to the nomination and appointment of said plaintiff. Gov. Gage failed to issue to plaintiff a commission as trustee of said home. George C. Pardee, being the successor of Henry T. Gage as Governor of California, was applied to to issue to plaintiff said commission, and, the Governor not complying with plaintiff's request, plaintiff filed his petition in the superior court of Sacramento county praying for a writ of mandate commanding the Governor to issue to him said commission. The defendant demurred to the petition on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief sought. The demurrer was sustained. From the order sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment rendered thereon, this appeal is prosecuted.

The plaintiff, in his brief, assures us that: "The question presented to the court below and argued by counsel for the respective parties was this: Has the Governor a right to refuse to issue a commission after he has transmitted a nomination to the Senate and the appointment has been confirmed by the latter, or may he thereupon ignore his own action and the action of the Senate, and make a new nomination or appointment"? The trustees of said home are "appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate." Act March 9, 1887. St. 1887, p. 69, c. 57. As to the trustees of this home, the Governor cannot appoint, when the Senate is in session, without the "advice and consent" of that body. In all such appointments the first step to be taken is the suggestion by the Governor to the Senate of the name of a person for the office, and to ask the advice of the Senate, and for its consent for him to appoint such person; the second step is the advice and consent of the Senate, which is manifested by a resolution certified to the Governor and to the Secretary of State; and the third and last step is the issuing of the commission signed by the Governor, and this is the evidence of such appointment.

Plaintiff contends that "nominate" and "appoint" are synonymous terms and mean the same thing, and that therefore, when the Governor has nominated, he has appointed. Doubtless there are some instances where these terms may be used to mean one and the same thing, but by no process of reasoning can it be true that in "nominating" to the Senate the Governor is "appointing" the person to the office, because he cannot appoint without the advice and consent of the Senate. The "appointment" is not made until the "commission" is issued, and issuing the same is the last act, and in issuing the commission the Governor is performing an executive, and not a ministerial, act, and is therefore acting under his discretionary powers, and may or may not issue the commission, although the Senate may have advised it and consented that he should make the appointment. Plaintiff has presented no authority which in our opinion tends even in the slightest degree to show that the Governor has exhausted his discretionary power when he nominates a man for office and sends the name to the Senate. Over 100 years ago it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 137, 2 L. Ed. 60, that: "The last act to be done by the President is the signature to the commission. He has then acted on the advice and consent of the Senate to his own nomination. The time for deliberation has then passed, and he has decided. His judgment on the advice and consent of the Senate concurring with his nomination has been made, and the officer is appointed." Defendant has presented numerous authorities sustaining and approving this rule, and the plaintiff has brought to our notice no case holding a different rule, and we have been unable to find any. This doctrine has been cited approvingly in every case in this state which involves a like question. We think a principle established so long ago, so closely adhered to, and so unanimously sanctioned by all the courts, must be too well engrafted into our system of government to be disturbed now.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

BACON v. KEARNEY VINEYARD SYNDICATE.

1. WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION DITCHES—OVERFLOW—NEGLIGENCE.

Where defendant permitted its irrigation ditch to overflow by failing to repair a defective headgate, and such overflow injured plaintiff's grapes, then in a condition of ripening, defendant was guilty of negligence, rendering it liable therefor.

2. APPEAL — HEARSAY EVIDENCE — HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in an action for injuries to plaintiff's grapes by an overflow of defendant's irrigation ditch, defendant's negligence was conclusively established by other evidence, defendant was not harmed by the admission of evidence of statements of defendant's foreman that after the overflow he had notified the ditchman to be a little more careful, and that the accident happened through his carelessness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

M. K. Harris, for appellant. F. Kauke, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action for damages resulting from flooding the plaintiff's vineyard, alleged to have been caused from the negligence and carelessness of defendant and its agents in keeping and operating certain water ditches, dams, and headgates therein, and the water running therein onto lands of defendant for irrigating, and which lands are near those of plaintiff. The answer specifically denies all the allegations of the complaint. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the judgment was for the plaintiff for the sum of $378 damages, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from date until paid, and for $62.25 costs. A motion was made for a new trial and denied. The appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The evidence is before us in the statement settled on motion for new trial, from which evidence it appears that these are undisputed facts, viz.: (1) That defendant owned an artificial ditch used for irrigating his field of alfalfa, in which ditch are several headgates and a dam, to increase or lessen the flow of the water and to prevent the escape of the water onto other lands; (2) that plaintiff owns a vineyard of 20 acres near the said ditch; (3) that the grapes in said vineyard were near ripening; (4) that grapes in a condition of ripening would be injured by allowing the water to run over the surface of the ground around the vines; (5) that the water did escape from defendant's said ditch, and did flood a part of the plaintiff's vineyard; (6) that plaintiff's grapes were damaged by reason of the vineyard being flooded by the water escaping from defendant's ditch.

There is no claim of contributory negligence, and there is no evidence tending to show that plaintiff was in any way to blame for the flooding of his said vineyard. The defendant had the right to use said ditch and to run the water therein for the purposes of irrigating his field of alfalfa. The rule in such cases, as we understand it, is well settled, and is this: The owner of an artificial ditch, through which flows water for domestic uses or for irrigation, as in this case, is bound to keep such ditch in repair, so that the water running therein will not break through or escape therefrom and damage the land or crops of another, and that if through any fault or negligence of his in not properly managing the ditch, or keeping it in repair, the water does escape therefrom, and injures the lands or crops of another, he is liable, and the law will hold him responsible for whatever damage may be done. Richardson v. Kier, 34 Cal. 75, 91 Am. Dec. 681; Shields v. Orr Ditch Co., 23 Nev. 355, 47 Pac. 194; Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 487, 10 Am. Rep. 623. Defendant quotes numerous authorities to show that "one who does a lawful act upon his own premises cannot be held for injuries resulting, unless the act was done in a way to indicate negligence." This is so well known and so firmly a part of our system that there is no need of repeating the cases here in which the doctrine has been announced. The evidence for both plaintiff and defendant here shows that at least one of the headgates in said ditch was in a poor condition and very defective, and operated in such a defective manner that the water flowing in said ditch burst from it and ran down onto plaintiff's vineyard. The witness Harkness, the defendant's foreman, testified: "This headgate A was leaking, and that is why we put the dam in." This dam was put in, however, after the water had burst out of the ditch and overflowed a part of plaintiff's vineyard. The evidence clearly shows the headgates in said ditch were defective, and that it was by reason of their defect that the water was allowed to flow in too large a volume, thus rushing out and overflowing plaintiff's land. To allow the headgates to become leaky, and so they would not hold back the water sufficiently to keep it from escaping onto plaintiff's vineyard, was negligence. Negligence is defined to be "injury occasioned to another by want of ordinary care," etc. Had the water been permitted to break out and overflow plaintiff's vineyard at a time when no injury could have resulted from the overflow, then there would have been no negligence in a legal sense, because no injury.

Error is claimed by the court permitting the witness Grummett to testify as follows: "On one occasion * * * I met Mr. Tcherassy, the foreman of the Kearney Vineyard Syndicate. On Saturday evening I met him in town, and had a conversation with him in regard to this flooding of Mr. Bacon's vineyard." Question: "What did he say in regard to how it was done?" The defendant objected to the question on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, because Tcherassy was not shown to be the foreman for the defendant for this particular ditch, and whatever he might say could not bind the defendant. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "He said he had notified the ditchman to be a little more careful, and that this happened through his carelessness." The negligence had been conclusively established by the evidence given by the testimony of the witnesses Bacon, Dow, and Lewis, the last being a witness for the defendant, and afterwards corroborated by the witness Harkness. If it was error to have admitted this evidence, it could not have injured the defendant. While it might tend to prove negligence, yet there was abundant evidence, as has been seen, which was without substantial conflict on that point, to show negligence on the defendant's part, and the error will be deemed harmless. BUHMAN et al. v. NICKELS & BROWN BROS.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 5, 1905. On Rehearing, Aug. 1, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Notice—Time of Service.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 940, an appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, unless the undertaking is filed within five days after service of the notice of appeal.

2. Landlord and Tenant—Termination of Lease—Notice to Quit.

Where a lease provided that, in case of a sale of the demised premises, the lessee would quit and surrender the premises upon 30 days' written notice, grantees of the lessor were not required to give the 3 days' notice prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, as a condition of rendering a defaulting tenant guilty of unlawful detainer; but the lease was terminated by the sale, and the tenant was then entitled to 30 days' notice to quit, and was required to quit pursuant to such notice.

3. Same—Unlawful Detainer—Damages.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3334, 3345, requiring tenants holding over after notice to quit to pay treble rent, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, authorizing the recovery of treble rent in actions for unlawful detainer, the value of rents and profits trebled cannot be awarded as damages in an action of unlawful detainer.

4. Same—Damages—Assessment on Pleadings—Sufficiency of Pleading.

Where a tenant was required to quit in case of a sale of demised premises, but was entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in putting in a crop, an appellate court could not assess his damages on appeal, in an action of unlawful detainer, on an allegation of the complaint that he had put "about 40 acres" into hay and grain, and his expenses in so doing did not "exceed $400 per acre."

On Rehearing.

5. Appeal—Rehearing—Grounds.

A rehearing will not be granted to respondent on the ground of an error in a statement of fact, on which the court relied, which was contained in respondent's pleading, where the allegations of the pleading were specifically noticed in appellant's brief, which raised the question decided by the court, and respondent took no notice of the matter, and made no suggestion in its brief that there was no error, clerical or otherwise, in the allegations of its pleading.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by J. J. Buhman, Jr., and others against Nickels & Brown Bros., a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Webber & Rutherford, for appellants. Bell, York & Bell, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. Unlawful detainer. The complaint contains allegations showing: That the executors of the last will of Charles Robinson, deceased, leased certain real property of the estate in Napa county to the defendant corporation, and that the defendant went into possession under said lease. That the lease contained the following covenant: "It is further mutually understood and agreed by the parties hereto that in case of a sale of the demised premises that the said second party will quit and surrender the said premises upon 30 days' written notice, and the said first parties will pay to the said second party the actual cost or expense that said second party may have been to in putting any crop of hay or grain upon said premises." That the will of Robinson, deceased, authorized and empowered the executors to sell any property of the estate, without order or notice, at public or private sale. That under said power the executors sold the leased land to plaintiffs, at private sale, on October 15, 1902. That said sale was reported to the superior court on November 26, 1902, and on December 30, 1902, an order confirming the sale was made and entered. That pursuant to said sale a deed was executed by the executors on said last-mentioned day, which deed was delivered to plaintiffs on January 29, 1903, and that ever since said date they have been the owners of the premises. That on the 4th day of February, 1903, plaintiffs served upon defendant a written notice stating that the property had been sold to plaintiffs, and demanding that said defendant quit and surrender possession of said premises within 30 days from the date of said service. That on February 12th following a notice was served by plaintiffs upon defendant, demanding that defendant furnish plaintiffs with a statement of the actual cost or expense that defendant had been put to in putting in a crop of hay and grain. That on March 6, 1903, plaintiffs served upon defendant an offer in writing to pay defendant for putting 40 acres into hay and grain, at a cost of $4 per acre. That defendant failed to furnish a statement of cost and expense as requested, or to accept the offer so made, and remained in possession and occupancy of the premises, and refused to quit or surrender possession of the same. Then followed an averment that the acreage put into hay and grain amounted "to about 40 acres, and that the actual cost or expense that defendant was or has been put to in putting in said crop of hay or grain does not exceed $4 per acre." Plaintiffs then further alleged that the value of the rents and profits was $500 per month.

The prayer was for restitution of the premises, for the value of the rents and profits trebled, and for costs. Attached to and made a part of the complaint was a copy of the lease, in which the monthly rental is fixed at $50 from January to July, and $25 for the remainder of the year. Defendant, answering, alleged in substance that the executors had sold the land to defendant, and that as such purchaser defendant had contested the confirmation of the sale to plaintiffs, and had taken an appeal from the order confirming said sale, which appeal was then pending. It appears from the averments of the answer that the notice of appeal was served on January 12, 1903, and that the undertaking on appeal was not filed until January 19, 1903, 7 days after the notice of appeal was served. The pendency of the appeal was the only defensive matter pleaded in the answer, and none of the averments of the complaint were denied therein. To such answer the plaintiffs demurred, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The court overruled the demurrer, and such ruling is assigned as error.

The undertaking on appeal not having been filed within 5 days after the notice of appeal was served, the appeal was ineffectual for any purpose. Code Civ. Proc. § 940; S. F. P. Co. v. State, 141 Cal, 358, 74 Pac. 1047; Hoyt v. Stark, 134 Cal. 179, 66 Pac. 223, 86 Am. St. Rep. 246; Robinson v. Templar Lodge, 114 Cal. 41, 45 Pac. 998; Reed v. Kimball, 52 Cal. 325. The order overruling the demurrer was, therefore, erroneous. The respondent, however, claims that such error was not prejudicial, and that upon the findings, which are identical with the averments of the complaint and answer, the judgment should be for defendant in any event. This contention is based upon the proposition that the notice to quit and surrender possession given pursuant to the terms of the lease merely terminated the lease, and hence a further notice, styled a "three days' notice to quit," was essential before an action in unlawful detainer would lie. The covenant in the lease was that the defendant would "quit and surrender possession upon thirty days' notice." The law neither does nor requires an idle act, and it would certainly be idle to require three days' notice to quit, in view of the express stipulation of the parties and plaintiffs' compliance therewith. The defendant could not, by any act or acts, prevent the lease from lapsing, and under such conditions no further notice was required. Code Civ. Proc. § 1161; Harloe v. Lambie, 132 Cal. 135, 64 Pac. 88; Earl Fruit Co. v. Fava, 138 Cal. 76, 70 Pac. 1073; Kelley v. Teague, 63 Cal. 68. Besides, a reasonable construction of the lease leads to the conclusion that the parties understood and intended that a sale would terminate the lease, and that in such event 30, instead of 3, days' notice to quit, would be necessary. It results that the complaint did state a cause of action, and that the findings in accordance with such complaint would not support, much less authorize, a judgment for defendant.

Appellants ask that the trial court be directed to enter judgment upon the findings according to the prayer of the complaint. This cannot be done. The lease shows the rental value, which may be trebled (Civ. Code, § 3345; Code Civ. Proc. § 1174), and the prayer is according to the general averment as to the value of rents and profits. Damages in such actions as the one at bar must be fixed in accordance with rules of law. Civ. Code, §§ 3345, 3334; Code Civ. Proc. § 1174; Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 566, 58 Pac. 130. And it is obvious, from an inspection of the complaint and prayer, that it would be disregarding these rules to award the amount asked in the prayer. The defendant, under the complaint, is also entitled to have his expense and cost in putting in crops of hay and grain ascertained. This cannot be done when the averment is as indefinite as it is in this case; for "about 40 acres, at a cost of not to exceed $4 per acre," would be an uncertain basis upon which to rest the measure of defendant's right.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BUCKLES, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The petition for a rehearing is denied. This court on July 5, 1905, reversed the judgment, which was rendered by the trial court in favor of defendant. Defendant now asks a rehearing, on the ground that its answer erroneously alleged that the notice of appeal from the order confirming the sale of the real property in question was filed on January 12, 1903, when in fact it was not filed until January 19, 1903, on which day, also, the undertaking was filed. As the record stood when the cause was submitted here, it appeared by the answer that the undertaking was not filed five days after the notice of appeal was served, and hence, as we held, the appeal was ineffectual for any purpose. In appellant's brief the point was distinctly made, and attention was specifically drawn to the allegations of the answer, and numerous cases were cited in support of the point. Respondent took no notice of the matter, and in its brief made no suggestion that there was any clerical or other error in the date given for the service of said notice of appeal, but relied wholly on its demurrer to the complaint. The Supreme Court has denied rehearing in numerous cases (but few of which are reported) where points made in the briefs have been waived or presumably confessed by failure to argue or notice them, and afterwards the losing party has sought to have the same points heard by petition for a rehearing. See Atherton v. Board of Supervisors, 48 Cal. 157; Dougherty v. Henarie, 49 Cal. 686; People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. 865, 20 Pac. 129. In the present case the court had every reason for assuming that the facts were as stated in the answer, and we do not think the defendant should be permitted to have a rehearing for the purpose of correcting the record after having deliberately ignored the matter when its attention was called to it. Furthermore, it is not claimed that the answer, as printed in the record, is other than the answer served and filed. The claim is that a mistake occurred in its preparation, and thus we are asked, in effect, to permit an amendment of the pleadings, which we doubt our right to do. We have less hesitancy in denying, in view of the fact that defendant still has the opportunity to fully protect its rights in the trial court. The ruling of this court, as to the appeal pleaded in the answer, will not prevent the defendant from obtaining every advantage which his appeal may give him.

Upon the remaining questions discussed in the opinion on file, we adhere to the views there expressed.

We concur: BUCKLES, J.; McLAUGHLIN, J.

PEOPLE v. SMALL.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 18, 1905.)

1. False Pretenses—Statutes—Verdict.

Pen. Code, § 532, provides that every person who "knowingly and designedly," by false and fraudulent representations or pretenses, defrauds any other of money or property, is punishable in the same manner as for larceny of the money or property so obtained. Held, that where, in a prosecution under such section, the jury would have been justified in finding defendant guilty of knowingly and fraudulently depriving P. of $103, with intent to cheat and defraud by false and fraudulent representations, or guilty of knowingly and designedly, by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses, defrauding him of a less sum than $103, or less than $50, or not guilty, a verdict, "We, the jury, find defendant guilty of the crime of felony, to wit, obtaining money by false pretenses," was void.

2. Criminal Law—Jeopardy.

Where defendant was convicted under a void verdict, and made a motion to be discharged after the verdict was received and recorded, he was placed in jeopardy as provided by Pen. Code, § 1023, and was entitled to such discharge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 372, 374.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

William A. Small was convicted of false pretenses, and he appeals. Reversed.

Bert Schlesinger, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. Judgment of imprisonment in the state prison was entered against defendant under an information charging him with having obtained possession of $103 by certain false and fraudulent representations set forth therein. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying said motion.

His contention is that the verdict is insufficient to sustain the judgment, and hence that he should be discharged. The information charges the offense defined in section 532, Pen. Code, which provides: "Every person who knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representations or pretenses, defrauds any other person of money or property, * * * is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money or property so obtained." It is not necessary to give the information in full, or to enter into an analysis of it. It is sufficient for the purposes of this case that, in our opinion, it sets forth sufficient facts to constitute the crime defined in the section. It shows that the defendant unlawfully, knowingly, fraudulently, and with intent to cheat and defraud, obtained from one Perry $103 by certain false and fraudulent representations to the effect that he was the owner, free from all incumbrances or liens, of certain household furniture, which representations were untrue. The defendant pleaded not guilty to the offense charged. The jury had the right, as the evidence might have justified, to find the defendant guilty of the offense charged in the information, or guilty of knowingly and designedly, by false and fraudulent representations or pretenses, of defrauding the said Perry of a less sum than $103, or less than $50, or not guilty. The verdict was: "We, the jury, find the defendant, William A. Small, guilty of the crime of felony, to wit, obtaining money by false pretenses."

This verdict is not responsive to the issue before the court, and is not sufficient to show that defendant ever committed any crime. The words "of the crime of felony" may be omitted, as it is not the province of the jury to say or determine the legal definition of the acts claimed to constitute a crime. People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 448, 50 Pac. 675. We then have a verdict finding "defendant guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses." There is no section of the Penal Code making such act of itself a crime. A party must knowingly and designedly, by false or fraudulent representations or pretenses, defraud a person. It is not found or stated what the false pretenses were, and no reference is made to the information. "But no judgment of conviction can be given unless the jury expressly find against the defendant upon the issue, or judgment is given against him on a special verdict." Pen. Code, § 1162. The verdict is not a special verdict, nor is it a finding against the defendant on the issue. The issue was as to whether or not the defendant did the things charged against him in the information, or enough of them to constitute a crime. How could any one tell from this verdict how much money defendant obtained, or what he did to obtain it? If the verdict, instead of responding to the issue in the record, finds upon some other, or is silent on some element of the offense, it will not sustain a judgment. Bishop's New Cr. Proc. vol. 1, § 1005.

In People v. Cummings, 117 Cal. 497, 49 Pac. 576, the information charged defendant with the crime of obtaining the promissory note of C. Schnelle, of the value of $175, by certain false and fraudulent pretenses. The verdict found that "the defendant is guilty of defrauding C. Schnelle of the note of $175 in the indictment mentioned." It was held that the verdict was insufficient, and that there was no such crime, for the reason that the verdict did not find as to the false and fraudulent representations in the indictment charged. So in the case at bar there is no finding that defendant knowingly and designedly obtained any money, and no finding as to the amount. In People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 62, 67 Pac. 42, the defendant was charged with the crime of receiving stolen property in the language of the statute. The verdict was: "We, the jury, in the above-entitled case, find the defendant, Chas. H. Tilley, guilty of receiving stolen property." The verdict was held insufficient. It was said that there did not appear any intent to find defendant guilty as charged in the information, and the court said: "It may be that the jury were satisfied from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of the receiving of the stolen goods, but were not satisfied either of his knowledge of their being stolen, or as to the intent of personal gain, and that they accordingly found the fact of which they were satisfied, and omitted to find the others of which they were not satisfied." In the case at bar the jury were evidently satisfied of the fact that defendant obtained money by false pretenses. They were not satisfied that he was guilty of the offense charged, because they did not say so. They were not satisfied as to the amount of money defendant obtained, nor as to the fact that he knew the pretenses were false, for they did not say so. A person might, in the utmost good faith, represent himself to be the owner of certain property, and upon such representation procure money, and yet as a fact the representation might turn out to be untrue. It is not a crime to procure money by false pretenses, unless the party making them knew, or in law would be charged with knowledge, of their falsity.

The defendant has been placed in jeopardy. Pen. Code, § 1023; People v. Terrill, 132 Cal.

MANDAMUS—MOOT QUESTION.

Where a city charter required a school tax in question to have been levied on or before the second Monday of May, 1903, a petition for mandamus to compel the subsequent levy of such tax presented a mere moot question, and was therefore demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 48.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Petition by the board of education of the city of San Diego for mandamus to compel the San Diego common council to levy a tax for school purposes. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition, petitioners appeal. Dismissed.

H. W. Nisbet, for appellant. R. E. Bledsoe and C. L. Allison, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of San Diego county sustaining a demurrer to a petition for a writ of mandate, directing the city council of San Diego to levy a tax for school purposes upon the taxable property of said city, under the provisions of the charter thereof. The record discloses, and it is conceded by counsel, that the demand and requirement upon the part of plaintiff board for such levy, and the refusal of the council in connection therewith, was had with reference to a levy, which, by such charter, was required to have been made on or before the second Monday of May, 1903. It is apparent, therefore, that no authority now reposes in the council to make such levy, nor any jurisdiction in this or any other court to order the same; that a writ of mandate, if granted, could not be enforced and would be unavailing, and in such cases a writ will not issue. Board of Education v. Common Council, 128 Cal. 372, 60 Pac. 976. No agreement of parties can be invoked to call for a decision of what to them, or either of them, is merely a moot question, and courts should not render judgments which cannot be enforced by any process known to the law. Johnson v. Malloy, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. 228. It appears that the parties to this litigation have no rights which can be affected by the reversal of the order, that the defendant possessed no right to make any levy for the fiscal year 1903 at the date of the appeal herein, and that the superior court has no authority to render any judgment in the premises. Any opinion that we might give upon the merits of plaintiffs' application to the superior court would not, therefore, be followed by any action on the part of that court, and would not have any binding authority, or constitute any adjudication of the rights of the parties. Foster v. Smith, 115 Cal. 613, 47 Pac. 591.

Without determining any of the questions involved, for the reasons above suggested, and upon the authority of Foster v. Smith, supra, the appeal in this case is dismissed.

EXECUTORS—CONTRACT FOR BENEFIT OF ESTATE—LIABILITY.

Recovery cannot be had of the estate, but only of the executor, on a contract of the executor for services for the benefit of the estate.

Appeal from the Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

SMITH, J. Appeal on judgment roll, with bill of exceptions, from a judgment for the plaintiffs. The suit was brought to recover the balance due on contract made by the plaintiffs with the defendant, as executrix, by which plaintiffs agreed that they "would drill a well for defendant on the property of said estate in said county," etc. The answer alleges the terms of the contract more specifically, and, perhaps, differently. But the court found that the contract was as alleged in the complaint, and that the same was fully performed according to its terms, and, as conclusions of law, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover the amount claimed in the complaint, with interest and costs "and that said amount be paid to plaintiffs from the funds of the estate of said Richard H. Garland, deceased."

It is urged by the appellant that the findings of the court are not justified by the evidence, and also that a judgment against the estate cannot be maintained. The latter point, we think, must be sustained. " 'The rule is that executors and administrators cannot, by virtue of their general powers as such, make any contract which will bind the estate and authorize a judgment de bonis decedentis. But on contracts made by them for necessary matters relating to the estate they are personally liable, and must see to it that they are reimbursed out of the assets.' Schouler on Executors and Administrators, § 256, and numerous authorities there cited." Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 495, 51 Pac. 695; Melone v. Davis, 67 Cal. 281, 282, 7 Pac. 703; Eustace v. Jahns, 38 Cal. 21; Code Civ. Proc. § 1582 et seq.; Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 360. The last case is cited by the court in Sterrett v. Barker, and it is said: "This case also holds that the complaint cannot be amended so as to constitute an action against the executor individually. It would be an entire change of the party defendant and a different suit." And the same point is ruled in the case of Van Cott v. Prentice, 104 N. Y. 45, 10 N. E. 257. These authorities, or rather the California case cited, seem to be conclusive of this case. We are not, indeed, prepared to hold that the complaint is not amendable, upon a proper showing, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor the contrary. But it seems to be at least clear that the court has acquired no jurisdiction of Mrs. Garland in her personal capacity, and that the proceedings cannot now be amended, and a personal judgment against her entered.

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

ANDROS v. ANDROS.

DIVORCE—CONDONATION—KNOWLEDGE.

Civ. Code, § 115, defines "condonation" as the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce, and section 116 requires knowledge on the part of the condonor of the facts constituting the cause of divorce. Held, that though defendant's physical condition, known to plaintiff long before she ceased to cohabit with him as his wife, was such as would ordinarily be taken as proof of unfaithfulness, yet, where she testified that she believed his representations that his condition was not so occasioned, it was not error, in an action for divorce, to find that the offense had not been condoned; there being some testimony that, after being convinced of the cause of defendant's condition, she never thereafter cohabited with him.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

H. W. Nisbet, for appellant. R. E. Bledsoe and C. L. Allison, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for divorce. Judgment in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

It is insisted upon this appeal that the judgment was rendered in violation of section 130 of the Civil Code, which provides that no divorce can be granted upon the default of the defendant, or upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties, and that if any matrimonial offense had been established the same had been completely and fully condoned. The court found in favor of the plaintiff upon all of the material issues, and, while the corroborating testimony tending to establish the marital offense was slight, there was, nevertheless, some testimony to justify the court in its finding in that regard.

As to the question of condonation, which, by section 115 of our Civil Code is declared to be the conditional forgiveness of a matrimonial offense constituting a cause of divorce, and by section 116 such condonation requires a knowledge on the part of the condonor of the facts constituting the cause of divorce, the record discloses that the defendant's physical condition, known to plaintiff long before she ceased to cohabit with him as his wife, was such as would ordinarily be taken as proof of unfaithfulness; yet it appears from the testimony, and the court accepted it as the truth, that the plaintiff believed the representations of her husband that his condition was not so occasioned. This, no doubt, upon the theory that the confidence of a wife in her husband's loyalty leads her often to accept as true that which would not be so accepted if proceeding from a stranger. There was some testimony to warrant the court in finding that, after becoming convinced of the cause of his physical condition, she never thereafter cohabited with him as his wife, and there was sufficient testimony to warrant the court in finding that his physical condition was the result of an adulterous act. We think the condonation was not established sufficiently to bar the plaintiff's right of action, and we perceive no error in the record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte BOYNTON.

1. DISTURBING THE PEACE—"LOUD AND BOISTEROUS MANNER"—COMPLAINT.

A complaint alleging that petitioner did willfully, unlawfully, and maliciously disturb the peace of D. at a certain time and place, by then and there using vulgar and profane language in the presence and hearing of D., and in the presence and hearing of women and children on the streets of a certain town, did not charge the offense of disturbing the peace "in a loud and boisterous manner," prohibited by Pen. Code, § 415.

2. SAME.

There being no allegation that the peace of D. was disturbed because of "offensive conduct," the complaint did not charge the offense of disturbing the peace by offensive conduct, consisting of the use of vulgar and profane language in the presence and hearing of D., and of women and children, within such section.

Habeas corpus on petition of Harrison Boynton. Petitioner discharged.

A. Campbell, for petitioner. T. T. C. Gregory, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BUCKLES, J. The petitioner comes before this court on a writ of habeas corpus. He was arrested in the town of Suisun City on a warrant for disturbing the peace. He was brought before the justice of the peace and pleaded guilty, and on the 9th day of June, 1905, was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment in the county jail of Solano county. Petitioner claims the complaint on which he pleaded guilty charges no public offense. The charging part of said complaint is as follows: "Did willfully and unlawfully and maliciously disturb the peace and quiet of said Chas. H. Downing, on Solano and Main streets, in the said town of Suisun City, by then and there using vulgar and profane language in the presence and hearing of said Chas. H. Downing, and in the presence and hearing of women and children, on the said streets of the said town of Suisun City."

It was evidently intended, and the district attorney admits as much on the argument, to charge the petitioner with disturbing the peace by using "vulgar and profane language in the presence or in the hearing of women and children in a loud and boisterous manner," as provided in the latter part of section 415, Pen. Code. If such was the intention, then the complaint fails to charge a public offense, because it leaves out what seems to us to be the very necessary matter to complete the offense, to wit, "in a loud and boisterous manner." The district attorney claims, however, that the complaint states the crime of disturbing the peace by offensive conduct, which consists in using vulgar and profane language in the presence and hearing of Downing, and in the presence and hearing of women and children. But we think this view cannot be maintained, because there is no allegation in the complaint that the peace of Downing was disturbed because of offensive conduct. It may be true, and most likely is, that the vulgar and profane language used by petitioner was offensive to Downing; but he does not so charge in his complaint, and there is nothing in the complaint to connect the language used with "offensive conduct." The cases cited by the district attorney from the states of Missouri, Texas, Michigan, Arkansas, and South Carolina, whatever application they may have under the statutes in those states, do not support the contention of the district attorney, when attempted to be applied to the provisions of section 415 of the Penal Code of this state. The complaint charges no public offense, and the petitioner is entitled to his discharge.

Petitioner will be discharged.

PECKHAM et al. v. FOX.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS — ATTORNEY'S FEES — STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1195, providing for the recovery of an attorney's fee in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, is not in violation of or in conflict with Const. art. 20, § 15, providing that mechanics, etc., of every class, shall have a lien for the value of their labor done and materials furnished, and that the Legislature shall provide by law for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such lien.

2. SAME—REPEAL.

Such constitutional provision is not to be construed as repealing existing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure on the subject of "Liens of Mechanics and Others," among which is section 1195.

3. SAME—LIEN FOR FEES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1195, providing that in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien plaintiff shall be entitled "to recover an attorney's fee," should be construed as entitling plaintiff to such fee as a part of the recovery, and therefore confers a lien for the fee, as well as for the subject-matter of the action.

Action by William M. Peckham and others against E. R. Fox. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court September 11, 1905.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mechanic's lien. The only objection urged by appellant's counsel is to the attorney's fee allowed by the court and made a lien upon the property in question. The points made by the appellant are: First, that section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for such fees, is unconstitutional; second, that there is no provision in the act making the attorney's fees a lien upon the property foreclosed. But neither point is tenable.

As to the first, under familiar rules of construction, there is nothing in the provisions of section 15, art. 20, of the Constitution to limit the ordinary powers of the Legislature, or to take from it the specific power exercised in section 1195; nor is the constitutional provision to be construed as repealing the existing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure on the subject of "Liens of Mechanics and Others," among which is the section in question. Sedgwick on Stat. and Const. Law, p. 123 et seq.; Germania, etc., Ass'n v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. On the contrary, the duty is imposed upon the Legislature to "provide by law for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens;" and this, we think, imposes upon it, if deemed necessary to that end, the duty of providing for the cost of recording the lien and attorney's fee "as an incident to the judgment" (Rapp v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac. 325; McIntyre v. Trautner, 78 Cal. 449, 21 Pac. 15; Lumber Co. v. Neal, 94 Cal. 192, 29 Pac. 622); or, at least, empowers it to do so (Lumber Co. v. Welton, 115 Cal. 1, 46 Pac. 735, 1057; Sweeney v. Meyer, 124 Cal. 517, 57 Pac. 479). Nor are the provisions of section 1195 in conflict with section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution, or with any other provision of the federal or state Constitution.

The second point is in effect disposed of by the decision in Reid v. Clay, 134 Cal. 215, 216, 66 Pac. 262. That was a case of the foreclosure of a street assessment lien, under the act governing that subject, which provided that "in all cases of recovery under the provisions of this act the plaintiff shall recover the sum of fifteen dollars, in addition to the taxable cost, as attorney's fees." St. 1889, p. 168, c. 151, § 12. And it was held that "this must be construed as entitling him to the recovery of it as part of the recovery and judgment provided for, which is exclusively for a lien"; and it was added upon the authority of cases cited that, "otherwise, it could not be recovered." The cases are substantially similar in principle. In this respect, cases coming under the provisions of section 1195, Code Civ. Proc., and similar statutes, are to be distinguished from the case of foreclosure of mortgages, where there is no statutory provision providing for attorney's fees, "in the absence of a provision in the mortgage." Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 570, 14 Pac. 514; Hotaling v. Montieth, 128 Cal. 557, 61 Pac. 95.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 7, 1905.)

1. SALES — MERCHANTABLENESS — WARRANTY — BREACH — DAMAGES — ATTORNEY'S FEES — COSTS.

Civ. Code, § 3313, provides that the detriment caused by breach of warranty of quality of personal property is the excess of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time; and section 3314 declares that the detriment caused by breach of warranty of fitness is that which is defined by the preceding section, together with a fair compensation for loss incurred by effort and good faith to use the property for the purpose intended. Held that, where plaintiff sold an engine to defendants, who were its agents for resale, and defendants defended an action for breach of warranty of suitableness brought by the purchaser, without notifying plaintiff thereof, and it did not appear that the delay suffered by defendants in obtaining payment for all the machinery sold to the purchaser was caused solely by the controversy over the engine, defendants were not entitled to recover either interest on their claim against the purchaser, costs incurred in the suit against them, or their attorney's fees paid therein.

2. SAME—REMEDIES.

Where an engine was sold with a warranty of suitableness, on discovering the breach, the purchaser was entitled to retain the goods and plead a breach of the warranty as an offset to an action by the seller for the price.

3. SAME—SETTLEMENT.

Where, after it was discovered that an engine sold under a warranty of suitableness was defective, plaintiff supplied a new governor, and granted a credit on the belief that such governor would remedy all defects in the working of the engine, which proved not to be true, the granting of such credit did not relieve plaintiff from liability for future damages resulting from an effort to use the engine.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Erie City Iron Works against Henry L. Tatum and others. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Young, for appellant. J. P. Langhorne, for respondents.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought an action in 1895 against defendant, wherein it alleged that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $735 for one No. 9 Economic boiler, sold to defendants by plaintiff January 25, 1895. Defendants answered, and, besides denying said indebtedness, set up a counterclaim. In the counterclaim, after alleging the copartnership of defendants, and that plaintiff was a corporation of the state of Pennsylvania, engaged in the manufacture and sale of steam engines, defendants alleged: "(3) That on or about the 31st day of August, 1888, defendants purchased of plaintiff, and plaintiff sold and delivered to defendants, a so-called automatic cut off steam engine for the sum of $857, which said purchase price defendants paid plaintiff, and defendants also paid $120 freightage on said engine at time of its purchase, from Erie, Pennsylvania, to the Pacific coast. (4) That defendants ordered said engine of plaintiff, and purchased the same as a steam engine that should be reasonably fit for the purpose of operating and running machinery, and plaintiff furnished the same to defendants as a steam engine reasonably fit for such purpose, and plaintiff did furthermore expressly warrant that said engine would properly and effectively operate machinery; and defendants purchased said engine of plaintiff, relying upon and solely by reason of said implied and express warranties that the same should be reasonably fit for operating machinery, and that it would properly and effectively operate machinery." Then follows an allegation of the breach of warranty and of damage to defendants in the sum of $977. The court made its findings, and among other things found that, by reason of the failure of the engine to perform in a proper, efficient, and reasonable manner the work of running machinery, defendants have been damaged as of date January 31, 1892, in the sum of $883, and ordered judgment for defendants for $364, "the same being the excess of the damages $883, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from the 31st day of January, 1892, to date hereof, over and above the sum of $735 claimed in plaintiff's complaint, with interest thereon from the 25th day of January, 1895, to date hereof." Plaintiff moved for a new trial, and this appeal is from the order denying its said motion.

Appellant specifies insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding as to damages above quoted; and, as we think a new trial must be granted on this ground, we will first dispose of the question thus presented. At the trial no question was made as to the fact that defendants owed plaintiff $735 for the boiler, and the only real contention was as to the counterclaim set up by defendants against plaintiff. The engine was purchased by defendants of plaintiff in 1888, and by defendants sold, with other things, to Glenn & Handley, at Dalles City, Or., for the purpose of running an electric light and power plant, and on a warranty such as had been given them by plaintiff. It did not work satisfactorily, and plaintiff supplied a new governor, and in December, 1889, plaintiff gave defendants credit for a bill of expense of $247.55 incurred on the engine, and $27.59 freight paid by defendants on the new governor. The evidence shows, without contradiction, that the engine still did not efficiently or properly operate the electric light plant; and finally, in 1891, defendants sued Glenn & Handley for the balance alleged to be due on their original bill of upwards of $4,600 for material furnished for the electric light plant, and Glenn & Handley answered, and, besides denying any indebtedness on the claim sued on, set up a counterclaim of damages in a large sum growing out of the imperfections of the said engine. This suit was compromised in January, 1892, by an allowance or deduction of the sum of $219 made to Glenn & Handley by the defendants in this action. We think that, as to this deduction of $219, the evidence may be fairly said to show that it was made on account of damages and expenses to which Glenn & Handley had been put, subsequent to the first allowance heretofore referred to by reason of the imperfections of the engine. Shortly after this compromise defendants sent a bill to plaintiff for $319, being the $219, plus $100, paid their attorney in the matter of said suit. This bill plaintiff refused to allow or pay, and the matter was allowed to rest until the present suit.

On the trial of this case the only evidence as to the amount of damage suffered by defendants by reason of the breach of warranty as to the engine was given by Mr. Tatum, a member of the defendant firm. He said: "The damages that my firm sustained on account of defects in the engine subsequent to December 9, 1889" (the date of the first bill of expense, which had been paid) "was $319, for which we sent in a claim. That was composed of $100 for attorney's fees to Woodward & Woodward in the suit that we brought against Glenn & Handley, which was compromised; and then there was $20 court costs. There was $100 attorney's fees, and $219 allowed on our bill. That claim of $319 did not include the freight of $120 paid by us on the automatic cut-off engine, nor the $20 court costs, nor interest on our claim against Glenn & Handley in the sum of $544." The sum of $219, plus $100 attorney's fees, plus $20 court costs, plus $544 interest, amounts to $883, which, it will be observed, is the amount of damages found by the court as of date January 31, 1892. There was also read in evidence a communication, under date January 28, 1892, from the attorneys of Tatum & Bowen (defendants herein) in the suit against Glenn & Handley, purporting to show the loss of Tatum & Bowen on the compromise, in which they say:

The expenses of suit and first costs of court	$ 20 00
Attorney's fees	100 00
Discount allowed defendant on settlement	219 00
Making total	$339 00
To this sum should be added interest on principal sum for 2 years 10 months at legal rate of interest, 8 per cent. per annum, amounting to	544 00
Making total loss	$883 00

This statement of the attorneys for defendants, made to defendants, is not evidence against the plaintiff, and only serves to make clear the basis upon which the court fixed the amount of damages. The sum of $120, paid by defendants as freight on the engine, cannot be considered in fixing the damage; for it is shown that defendants sold the engine to Glenn & Handley as part of an electric plant before any defect was discovered in the engine, and undoubtedly charged for the engine such price as they thought reasonable, and, upon final settlement of their bill against Glenn & Handley the only deduction claimed to have been made from their bill on account of this engine was the sum of $219. Nevertheless the court fixed their damages at the sum of $883, evidently adding to the $219, deducted from their bill, the $100 attorney's fees, $20 court costs, and $544 interest on defendants' total claim against Glenn & Handley. The bill of defendants against Glenn & Handley included many things besides this engine, and amounted originally to upwards of $4,600, and at the time of the bringing of the suit to over $2,500.

The Civil Code (section 3313) provides that "the detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." Section 3314 provides that "the detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the fitness of an article of personal property for a particular purpose is deemed to be that which is defined by the last section, together with a fair compensation for the loss incurred by an effort in good faith to use it for such purpose." No evidence was given as to the actual value of the engine, but all the evidence of damages was directed to consequential damages or loss incurred by an effort to use it. Speaking of consequential damages in cases of breach of warranty, the court said in Wilson v. Reedy (32 Minn. 256, 20 N. W. 153): "The rule as to this class of damages, as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, and approved in Paine v. Sherwood, 21 Minn. 225, and in Frohreich v. Gammon, 28 Minn. 476, 481, 11 N. W. 88, is that such damages are recoverable when, from the circumstances of any particular case, they may reasonably have been supposed to have been contemplated by the parties, when making the contract, as the probable result of the breach." The evidence in this case does not show that the delay in paying defendants' bill against Glenn & Handley was caused solely by controversy over the engine; but, if it did, we do not think that such loss can be reasonably supposed to have been contemplated by plaintiff and defendants when the engine was sold by plaintiff to defendants.

We have been cited to no case where attorney's fees have been allowed to swell damages in cases of breach of warranty on sale of personal property; but, on the contrary, in the case of Reggio v. Braggiotti (7 Cush. 166), cited by respondent, it was held that in no case can the attorney fee, paid by the first vendee in defending himself in suit brought by his subvendee, be allowed to swell damages against the original vendor. The syllabus in this last-mentioned case so completely fits the case at bar that we quote it in full: "The measure of damages, in an action brought for a breach of an implied warranty of the genuineness of an article sold as opium, is the value of an article corresponding to the warranty, deducting the value, if anything, of the article sold; and if the vendor [vendee] has in the meantime sold the article with a like warranty, the sum paid on a judgment obtained against him, in an action brought by his vendee for a breach of that warranty, is prima facie evidence of the amount which he can recover of his vendor; and if he gave notice to his vendor of the commencement of that action, he may also recover his taxable costs therein; but he can in no case recover counsel fees paid for the defense thereof." (The italics are ours.) The same rule is laid down as to taxable costs in a similar case in Coolidge v. Brigham, 5 Metc. 68. In this case it is not shown that defendants gave plaintiff notice, either of the suit they brought against Glenn & Handley, or of the counterclaim set up by Glenn & Handley. Neither the interest on the principal of defendants' claim, nor the costs or attorney's fees, should have been included in the damages found; and the finding that defendants were damaged in the sum of $883 is, therefore, not supported by the evidence.

It is urged by appellants that, the engine having been retained after examination and trial, all defects were waived, and no action would lie in favor of defendants on account of the breach of warranty. This is not the law. On the contrary, one buying with a warranty, on discovering the breach of warranty, may either return the goods and rescind the contract, or he may retain the goods and bring an action for the breach of warranty, or plead the breach as an offset in any action brought by the vendors for the purchase money. Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573. Indeed, the various authorities cited by appellant concede this to be the rule.

It is also urged by plaintiff that all damages arising from the breach of warranty were paid by appellant by the credit given defendants shortly after supplying the new governor. We do not think that this contention can be sustained. It is probably true that it was believed at the time the said credit was given that the new governor had remedied all defects in the working of the engine, but this proved not to be true. Appellant, in giving the credit, made a payment which it was legally bound to make, and there is nothing in the record to sustain the proposition that there was any agreement, express or implied, that by so doing it relieved itself from liability for any future damage that might result from an effort to use the engine. On the contrary, it is quite evident that it was intended that Glenn & Handley should, after receiving the new governor, continue the use of the engine. They did so, and were put to much expense in so doing, for which defendants were liable to them, and appellant as the original warrantor to defendants.

Practically the same matter, coupled with delay in presenting claim for damages, is urged by appellant as an estoppel; but, having in mind the relation of the parties (defendants had the exclusive right to handle on this coast articles manufactured by appellant, and were charged with the duty to advance its sales and trade on the coast), we see nothing in the case to work an estoppel. Other matters urged by appellant are disposed of by what we have said on the question of damages.

Order denying motion for new trial is reversed.

SCHANDER v. GRAY et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1905.)

Bill of Exceptions — Proof in Supreme Court.

On petition to the Supreme Court, under Code, Civ. Proc. § 652, to prove exceptions which the trial judge refused to allow in accordance with the facts, it appearing that he did not allow some actually taken, and, while allowing others, did not allow them in the form proposed or in the form appearing in the reporter's notes, a bill of exceptions setting out the proceedings as they appear in such notes will be approved.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Bertha M. Dolbeer, deceased; Adolph Schander being appellant, and Geo. D. Gray and others being respondents. Heard on petition to prove exceptions. Granted.

See 81 Pac. 1098.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell, Lippitt & Lippitt, and Thomas H. Breeze, for appellant. Edmond Tauzky, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This cause having been referred to me to take testimony in reference to exceptions alleged in the affidavit of petitioner to have been reserved by him, with directions to report to this court the result of my proceedings in the premises, I hereby make the following report:

The parties appeared before me, and introduced a large amount of testimony touching the matters alleged in said affidavit. Most of this evidence was offered for the purpose of showing that the statements contained in the bill of exceptions as settled by the judge of the superior court, in connection with the exceptions which he allowed, were incorrect, either in the way of omission or inclusion of matter not proper to have been omitted or included. As to all those matters, the rulings of this court in construing section 652 of the Code of Civil Procedure show that the evidence was entirely immaterial. The parties consented that some corrections should be made by the judge of the superior court in the bill to be finally certified by him after engrossing, and but one matter was left to be passed upon by me. On the examination of the witness William Carson a number of exceptions were reserved by the petitioner herein. In proposing his bill of exceptions the petitioner did not state these various rulings, objections, and exceptions exactly as they appear in the notes of the official reporter of the superior court, and the judge did not allow them either in the form proposed, or exactly in the form in which they appear in the reporter's notes, nor were all of the several exceptions actually taken allowed. I have therefore decided to approve a separate bill which sets out these proceedings exactly as they appear in the reporter's notes, in lieu of what appears in the bill of exceptions as settled by the superior court. The parties to the proceeding waive any report of the testimony adduced before me.

The bill of exceptions approved by me is hereto attached, and will be certified in duplicate upon the approval of this report.

GRANT et al. v. CORNELL, Tax Collector.
(L. A. 1,381.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1905.)

1. TAXATION — INVALID SALES — EQUITABLE RELIEF—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—TENDER OF TAX.

Where it is claimed that a tax levy is invalid in part, but it is admitted that the residue thereof is in all respects valid, a property owner who seeks to enjoin the tax collector from executing a deed in pursuance of a sale of the property for unpaid taxes must pay or tender the valid portion of the tax, in order to be entitled to relief.

2. SAME — CERTIFICATE — EFFECT AS NOTICE —STATUS OF PURCHASER.

A tax certificate, genuine and valid on its face, imparts constructive notice to a purchaser of the land, and charges him with knowledge of the existence of the lien and of the nonpayment of the taxes, and he is in no better position than the original owner with respect to the requirement of doing equity before he can receive relief from the sale, in pursuance of which the certificate was issued, on account of illegality therein.

Action by Fannie C. Grant and another against A. F. Cornell, tax collector of the county of San Diego. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied September 21, 1905.

Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Nutt & Shaw, A. E. Nutt, and George H. P. Shaw, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and is taken upon the judgment roll alone.

The complaint attempts to set forth a cause of action in equity to enjoin the defendant from executing to the state of California a deed of certain lands belonging to the plaintiff Fannie C. Grant, in pursuance of a certain sale thereof for taxes of the year 1891. The basis of the complaint upon which it is claimed that the deed should not be executed is that the assessment of the taxes for the year in question was informal and irregular, particularly with respect to the description of the property, and that the levy was in part illegal. The property consisted of a block in Horton's Addition to the city of San Diego. The description in the assessment did not mention the name of the city. This is the principal defect alleged. The other irregularities, aside from the alleged illegal levy, relate to certain defective proceedings for the sale of the property. There is no allegation or showing that the plaintiffs, or either of them, at any time paid or tendered any part of the taxes for the year in question. The case in this particular is in all respects similar to the case of Couts v. Cornell (L. A. 1524) 82 Pac. 194, decided by the court in bank, and it must be decided upon the same principles. It is there held that in a case where it is not claimed that the property is not liable for taxation, or that the proportion of taxes for which it is justly chargeable has ever been paid, it is necessary, in order to maintain a bill in equity against the officers of the state to prevent the execution of a deed in pursuance of a tax sale, that the plaintiff should show that he has paid or tendered the amount of the tax justly chargeable against the land, according to the levy legally made for the year in question. It is claimed that the levy for the year 1891 was invalid as to the road tax, and bond and interest tax, composing part of the levy. It is admitted, however, that as to the remaining portion of the levy it was in all respects valid. In such cases it is necessary that the party should pay or tender the valid portion of the tax in order to enable him to enter a court of equity to ask relief concerning the portion claimed to be illegal or invalid.

The respondents make the additional point in this case that the plaintiff Fannie C. Grant became the owner of the property in October, 1899, long after the proceedings for the sale took place, and that she was an innocent purchaser for value, and the court finds the facts in accordance with this claim so far as actual notice is concerned; but finds further that she had constructive notice of the sale by reason of the record of the certificate in the recorder's office. It is claimed by the respondents that this certificate did not constitute constructive notice, because the assessment upon which it is based was void. The authorities cited, however, go no farther than to state that a deed or other instrument which upon its face is void, or which is a forgery, does not constitute constructive notice. Oglesby v. Hollister, 76 Cal. 140, 18 Pac. 146, 9 Am. St. Rep. 177; Hearst v. Egglestone, 55 Cal. 367; Hager v. Spect, 52 Cal. 584. This certificate in question gave a correct description of the property, showing the name of the town, and was not subject to the defects which, it is claimed, make the assessment invalid. We doubt if the purchaser of property can claim the benefit of the doctrine protecting innocent purchasers, for the purpose of evading any duty or burden resting upon the property for the payment of taxes to the state, in cases where the party is seeking to restrain the officers of the state from proceeding in the manner prescribed by law to enforce payment of the taxes. The lien of the tax exists by statute, and can be discharged only by payment (Pol. Code, §§ 3716, 3717), and all persons are required to take notice of that fact. But, however this may be, the certificate, being genuine and valid on its face, imparted constructive notice, and charged plaintiffs with knowledge of the fact that the tax lien existed, and that the taxes had not been paid. It was said in Couts v. Cornell, supra, that, notwithstanding the defective and irregular proceedings for the enforcement of the lien and the collection, the Legislature could authorize a reassessment of the property and subsequent proceedings for the enforcement thereof. And see San Diego v. Riverside, 125 Cal. 500, 58 Pac. 81. The tax is a charge upon the property from the first Monday in March of the year for which it accrued, and the plaintiffs, under the circumstances of this case, occupy no position different from that of the original owner with respect to the requirement that they must do equity before they can be allowed to receive relief at the hands of a court of equity. The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, and the judgment was therefore erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1905.)

1. TAXATION—ILLEGAL SALES—RELIEF—CONDITIONS—PAYMENT OF TAX.

Pol. Code, § 3817, requires an owner who seeks to redeem his land from a tax sale to pay the original tax with interest, costs, and penalties. Section 3806 enjoins the tax collector not to offer land for sale, where on account of irregular assessment, or of any other error, the same ought not to be sold. Section 3650, subd. 2, requires land to be listed in the assessment book by some description sufficient to identify it. Held, that where the original tax is valid in whole or in part, or the amount claimed to be due is justly due, except the penalties and costs incurred by reason of an illegal sale, a taxpayer who seeks to have the assessment and sale and certificate declared invalid, and to enjoin the tax collector from issuing any deed in pursuance thereof, on the ground of the insufficiency of the description contained in the assessment to identify the land, must pay or tender the amount of the tax which is justly due from him.

2. SAME—OBLIGATION TO PAY TAX—IRREGULAR ASSESSMENTS.

There is a legal as well as moral obligation to pay, and also a lien established by law for the general annual tax, irrespective of the regularity of the assessment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Cave J. Couts against A. F. Cornell, tax collector of San Diego county. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., and W. R. Andrews, Deputy Dist. Atty., for appellant. Stearns & Sweet, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff had judgment on a demurrer to the complaint and the defendant appealed.

The object of the action was to obtain a decree in equity, declaring invalid certain assessments for taxes and the sales and certificates made thereunder, enjoining the defendant from issuing any deed in pursuance thereof, and canceling the certificates so issued. The complaint is in two counts, alleging that the plaintiff is the owner of certain land in San Diego county, consisting of parts of the Rancho Guajome, and that in pursuance of the assessments claimed to be invalid the defendant, as tax collector of the county, is about to issue to the state of California deeds purporting to convey said land to the state, in pursuance of tax sales and certificates thereof made and issued for nonpayment of the taxes on one of said tracts of land for the year 1898 and 1899, respectively, and upon the other for the year 1895. The only defect or irregularity alleged, and the one which it is claimed makes the sales invalid, is that the descriptions of the lands in the respective assessment rolls are uncertain, and for that reason void. The appellant, for the purposes of the case, concedes that the descriptions are insufficient and uncertain, and that the sales were thereby rendered invalid, and we therefore refrain from expressing any opinion on the point.

In the consideration of the case it must be assumed as true that the land was subject to taxation; that the tax levies were regularly made, and the rates legally fixed by the proper authorities; that the plaintiff's land was fairly and legally valued at the sum stated in the assessment; and, consequently, that the plaintiff's property has been charged with no more than its fair and just proportion of the taxes levied; and, further, that all the proceedings for the assessment, collection, and sale were regular and valid, except that the descriptions of the land in the assessment, though correct as to the number of acres assessed, was technically insufficient to identify the land as required by subdivision 2, § 3650, of the Political Code. The plaintiff comes into a court of equity admitting that he should have paid, on account of this property, the exact sum originally charged against it, and that this was no more than his fair share of the public burden, which he, in common with all other taxpayers, must bear for the support of the government whose protection he enjoys. We think the case thus presented is without equity, and that on the familiar principle that he who seeks equity must do equity, the plaintiff should be denied the equitable relief which he demands. The obligation to pay his just proportion of the taxes legally levied is one of the highest civic duties of the citizen to the state. The plaintiff admits that he has not been subjected to a greater proportional charge than other citizens have paid, and he practically asks exemption from any charge on the technical ground that one of the public officers engaged in the duty of assessing the property has imperfectly described the property upon which his portion of the burden should be imposed. He claims that this just charge has become, because of an imperfect description, an injurious and oppressive cloud upon his title to the land, which a court of equity should remove. The principle justly applicable to the case is thus tersely stated in Esterbrook v. O'Brien, 98 Cal. 674, 33 Pac. 765: "So long as the moral obligation to pay any portion of the tax exists, a court of equity will not lend its aid to prevent a cloud upon the title, but will leave the party to his remedy at law." Similar views have been expressed and enforced by this court in Weber v. San Francisco, 1 Cal. 457; Hibernia S. & L. Soc. v. Ordway, 38 Cal. 682; San Jose Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 614; County v. Ballerino, 99 Cal. 597, 32 Pac. 581, 34 Pac. 329; Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 508, 37 Pac. 514; Pacific P. I. Co. v. Dalton, 119 Cal. 606, 51 Pac. 1072; Ellis v. Witmer, 134 Cal. 253, 66 Pac. 301; and Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 141, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057. If the description of the land had been sufficient, the plaintiff, in order to redeem his land from the tax sales, would be compelled to pay the original tax, and also interest, costs, and penalties, amounting to more than the original sum. Pol. Code, 3817. The original tax was not unjust, and if we concede that the defective descriptions were so material as to make the sales void, that consequently, under the provisions of section 3806, Pol. Code, the tax collector should not have offered the lands for sale, and hence that the penalties and costs are unjust, the plaintiff cannot ask to have the sales canceled, nor the assessments set aside, unless he shows that he has paid or offers to pay the amount, which of right he ought to pay.

The application of this rule is not confined to cases where the relief demanded is confined to the enjoining of the collection of a tax, as distinguished from suits to obtain an injunction against the issuance of a deed, or a decree removing a cloud, or some other equitable relief in regard to the proceedings taken to enforce collection. The rule is applied because of the broad principle that equity is peculiarly a forum of conscience, and it will not give relief which will enable a party to escape payment of all of a sum of money, when it can perceive that in justice he should pay a part, unless he is ready to pay, and accompanies his demand with an offer to pay, the part which is just. The particular kind of equitable relief applied for is immaterial. Weber v. San Francisco, supra; Hibernia S. & L. S. v. Ordway, supra. Nor can the rule be limited to cases where it appears that only a part of the original tax is just. If the entire tax or charge should justly be paid, the complainant would have no standing at all in equity, and he is allowed relief in any case solely because he offers to pay all that is just. Besides, this case does not present the question; for, by the forms of law, the plaintiff's lands are now chargeable, by reason of the added penalties, with more than twice the amount of the original tax, and it is strictly a case where part of the charge sought to be evaded is just and part unjust. The fact that the assessment is imperfect as to the description does not, in view of the circumstances here appearing, destroy the moral obligation to pay the tax. The moral obligation to pay the amount justly chargeable as taxes is as great where the defect arises from an imperfect description of property as where it is caused by a valuation fraudulently made excessive, as in Pacific P. I. C. Co. v. Dalton, supra, and County v. Ballerino, supra, or by a higher levy than the board had power to make, as in Quint v. Hoffman, supra, or by a levy improperly made, or a street assessment upon an illegally enhanced value, as in Esterbrook v. O'Brien, supra, in each of which cases the rule here invoked was applied. Similar and much stronger applications of the rule are found in National Bank v. Kimball, 103 U. S, 733, 26 L. Ed. 469; Huntington v. Palmer, (C. C.) 8 Fed. 449, 7 Sawy. 358; State R. R. Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 616, 23 L. Ed. 663; and Hunt v. Easterday, 10 Neb. 165, 4 N. W. 952.

Furthermore, in the case of a general annual tax, such as that here involved, there is an obligation to pay, in a sense legal as well as moral, and also a lien therefor, each established by law, irrespective of the regularity of the assessment. There can be no doubt that the Legislature could authorize an amendment of the assessment, so as to make it correctly describe the land, and, if that were done, the payment of the tax already levied could be enforced. An instance of the exercise of this power is shown by the act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 290, c. 207). In regard to such general taxes this court has said: "The assessment does not create the lien. It is merely one of the steps for its enforcement. * * * The lien for the taxes justly leviable upon property, * * * attaches on the first Monday of March in each year, and the obligation to pay necessarily accrues at the same time, if not earlier." San Diego v. Riverside, 125 Cal. 500, 58 Pac. 81. The payment, it is said, is not due until a legal assessment is made; but when that is done there is no new obligation created, but a mere step toward the enforcement of the original one. Id. It follows that there is a valid existing obligation upon the plaintiff to pay the tax, and one capable of enforcement at law. Therefore the argument that the rule of equity here invoked by defendant cannot be applied, unless there is an enforceable obligation on the plaintiff to pay, falls to the ground. There are some expressions in the opinion of Commissioner Smith in the recent case of Palomares Land Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 80 Pac. 931, which, if considered apart from the context and the question there involved, seem to state positively that until a valid assessment is made there exists no obligation, legal or moral, to pay the tax levied; but the court is there speaking of the right of the state to impose on the taxpayer an additional penalty for a failure to pay the tax when due, and the word "obligation" is obviously used in reference to a perfected and matured obligation, one of which immediate payment is due. What is meant is that until an assessment is made there is no such obligation of immediate payment as would justify punishment for a failure to perform within the time prescribed. The doctrine of that case is not inconsistent with the views here expressed.

The respondent has not made any argument. The appellant calls our attention to the case of Grant v. Cornell (L. A. 1381) 82 Pac. 193, now pending in department 1, involving the questions here discussed, in which the respondent has filed a brief in answer to the points made by the appellant in this case, and upon the consideration of this case we have availed ourselves of the argument of the respondent in that case, so far as applicable. For the reasons here given, the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. WARNER. (Cr. 1,208.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1905.)

1. Criminal Law—Commitment by Magistrate—Effect—Cure of Errors.

Where a charge has been examined by a magistrate, and the evidence has been taken, and the examination warrants holding accused to answer, imperfections in the complaint are cured, and the commitment is legal.

2. Same—Presumptions.

It will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that proceedings leading up to a commitment by a magistrate were regularly conducted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 728.]

3. Jury—Competency of Jurors—Property Qualification.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 198, 199, declaring a person not assessed on the last assessment roll of the county incompetent to act as a juror, a juror who was not assessed on the assessment roll was incompetent, although he was an heir of a decedent whose estate had real property assessed against it, where it did not appear that any of such property belonged to the juror, or would become his upon final settlement of the estate.

4. Same—Mutual Challenges—Allowance—Absence of Prejudice.

Accused is not prejudiced by the excuse of a juror whom he has challenged, although the prosecution has concurred in the challenge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 3114–3116.]

5. Same—Prejudice against Death Penalty.

In homicide, a juror who was not willing to find a verdict of guilty on circumstantial evidence, if the effect thereof would be punishment by death, was properly excused.

6. Same—Bias or Prejudice.

Under Pen. Code, § 1076, declaring that no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion founded on public rumor, statements in the public journals, or common notoriety, provided it appears to the court that he will, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially and fairly, jurors, who stated in effect that the fact that defendant had been held to answer would raise a presumption against him in their minds, were not disqualified, where they stated, further, that they knew nothing about the facts except what they had read in the papers, had formed no opinion regarding the merits, did not know defendant, had no bias or prejudice regarding the case, could try the case fairly and impartially, and could give to defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt.

7. Same—Examination of Jurors—Questions as to Testimony.

While a juror may be asked if he will consider all the evidence fairly and impartially, and give to each part of it such weight as he deems it entitled to, it is improper to ask him whether, if accused should himself testify on some material point, and his testimony was reasonable and not contradicted, he would give it weight.

8. Criminal Law—Trial—Argument of Counsel—Absence of Predjudice.

Pen. Code, § 1258, declares that on hearing an appeal the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties. In homicide, the district attorney in closing commented on the testimony of a certain witness as to statements made to her by defendant, and stated that she was not contradicted, and that no witness had testified that defendant did not make the statements to her. Defendant's counsel excepted on the ground that "there were but two persons present at the conversation," but did not request the court to disregard the comment, nor request the district attorney to withdraw the same, and nothing further was done. Held, that there was no such impropriety in the comments of the district attorney, or prejudice to defendant, as to necessitate a reversal.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Walter Warner was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied September 14, 1905.

H. C. Booth and S. E. Crow, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. Defendant was accused by the district attorney of Santa Barbara county by information of the crime of murder. He was tried and convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. The evidence shows that about midnight on June 10, 1904, at the house of Lizzie O'Brien, in Santa Barbara, one Maria Tamayo was called to the door by defendant, who demanded money of her, and, it being refused, he shot her dead. The appeal is taken from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions. On behalf of the appellant the following points are made: (1) Error in the refusal of the court to set aside the information; (2) error committed during the impanelment of the jury; (3) error in the admission and rejection of testimony; (4) misconduct of the district attorney in his closing argument.

1. The main ground that seems to have been relied upon in support of the motion to set aside the information was that there was nothing to show the year in which the crime was committed, or that the testimony before the committing magistrate was reduced to writing under his direction, and that the transcript of the proceedings before the committing magistrate was filed with the clerk of the superior court, together with the complaint, subpœnas, and warrant, without any other verification than the signature of one Henry A. Dewing, without any evidence showing who Henry A. Dewing was. It is stated in the bill of exceptions that Joseph J. Price was at all times mentioned a justice of the peace in the Second township of Santa Barbara county, Cal. The complaint in this case was signed and sworn to by Nat Stewart before said Price as justice of the peace of said township, charging the defendant with the crime of murder, upon which complaint a warrant was properly issued and returned on June 10, 1904, with the defendant, by the officer who made the arrest, to the justice of the peace issuing it. The examination that followed, as shown by the bill of exceptions, indicates that the examination was conducted according to the forms of the law, by questions and answers, and there seems to be no question as to the jurisdiction of the committing magistrate in the premises, nor as to the form of the commitment by said magistrate which followed the examination. It is not contended that the stenographic reporter was not appointed by the court, but it is urged that it does not appear from the transcript that he was so appointed. There is, however, nothing to show that the defendant was deprived of any substantial right. When a charge has been examined by a magistrate, and the evidence taken, and the examination warrants an order holding the defendant to answer, the imperfections of the complaint are cured, and the commitment is legal. People v. Cole, 127 Cal. 545, 59 Pac. 984. In the late case of People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 Pac. 1028, in considering the point made by appellant in support of his motion to set aside the information on various grounds antecedent to the commitment by the examining magistrate, this court said: "The object of the statute in providing for the issuance of a warrant of arrest is that the defendant may appear before a committing magistrate, and when he is once there, and an examination of the case is had in pursuance of the terms of the statute, and the defendant is held to answer, a foundation is laid for the filing of an information by the district attorney. The regularity of the proceeding by information did not, therefore, depend in any manner upon the affidavit on which the warrant of arrest was issued, and had no connection with it"—referring to the case of People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457. And, continuing: "If there be anything inconsistent with these views in the two department cases of People v. Christian, 101 Cal. 471, 35 Pac. 1043, and People v. Howard, 111 Cal. 655, 44 Pac. 342, cited by appellant, they must be considered, so far as they are thus inconsistent, as overruled by the other cases above cited"—citing several cases. The presumptions are that the proceedings leading up to the commitment of the defendant by the magistrate were regularly conducted, and it is necessary, therefore, for the appellant to produce some showing to the contrary, which has not been done in this case.

2. It is claimed certain errors occurred during the impanelment of the jury. On the examination of juror A. C. Greenwell, in reply to the district attorney as to whether he was on the assessment roll of the county, he answered, "No, sir." He was asked by the court whether he was on the last assessment roll for property in his own name, and he said, "No; it is in the estate." And in answer to the defendant's attorney he said he was one of the heirs of W. A. Greenwell, deceased, and that the estate has real property in the county on the assessment roll. He stated again that he had no property assessed in his own name, whereupon the court granted the challenge of the district attorney and excused the juror. "A person is competent to act as a juror, if he be * * * (4) assessed on the last assessment roll of the county or city and county on property belonging to him. A person is not competent who is not so assessed." Code Civ. Proc. §§ 198, 199. This is not like the case of People v. Owens, 123

Cal. 487, 56 Pac. 251, cited by appellant. The challenge to the juror in that case was based upon the evidence that the property of a firm of which he was a member was upon the assessment roll in the name of the firm. The interest of each member of the copartnership extends to every portion of his property (Civ. Code, § 2402), and the facts of that case met the requirements of the Code. Here it does not appear that any property of the W. A. Greenwell estate that was upon the assessment roll of that county belonged to the juror in question, or that he would, upon the final settlement of the estate, become the owner of any of said property. We think there was no error in the court excusing Mr. Greenwell from acting as a juror in the case.

The examination of Daniel Maloney does not show a state of mind indicating any bias in any degree, and the same is true of the examination of Grant Dewlaney, and the court did not err in refusing to excuse them on motion of the defendant. And the examination of juror Hart shows him to be without bias which would prevent him from giving the defendant a fair and impartial trial on the evidence in the case, and the same may be said with reference to jurors Bates and Haynes.

The juror C. L. Donohoe was challenged by both the defendant and prosecution, and the court remarked: "It seems that both parties have challenged this juror on the same grounds. I think the challenge is sufficient." It is difficult to see how the defendant can be prejudiced where the juror against whom he makes an objection is excused by the court, although the prosecution may have concurred in the challenge.

There was no error in excusing juror Eddy on motion of the prosecution, on the ground that he was not willing to find a verdict of guilty, if the effect would be punishment by death, on circumstantial evidence. Under the evidence such a verdict might be required in this case, as appears was so found. There was no error, therefore, in excusing the juror.

In reference to the alleged disqualifications of jurors Burt More, James P. Donahue, W. W. Dunn, and W. C. Smith, they all brought themselves within the provisions of the Code, which declares that "no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion in the matters or cause to be submitted to such jury, founded upon public rumor, statements in the public journals, or common notoriety; provided it appears to the court, upon his declaration, under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him." Pen. Code, 1076. The following is a sample of the examination of the jurors in question touching their qualifications: After stating that he had read in the paper of the examination and commitment, he was asked by defendant's attorney: "And does the fact that the defendant has been held to answer by a justice of the peace raise any presumption of guilt in your mind? A. Why, I think so. I presume he would not have been held, unless there was some evidence against him, or any other defendant. Q. The fact that the defendant is held, that is to some extent to throw the burden upon the defendant to show that the justice was in error when he held him? A. Well, they don't usually hold a man unless there is some evidence against him. I believe, if there was no evidence at all against him, I think he would have been discharged, not him in particular, but any person so held. Q. That is an opinion of yours in regard to criminal cases? A. Yes; I think it is a presumption that there must have been some evidence, or the officers would not have arrested him and the magistrate would not have held him. Q. When a defendant comes to the superior court from the justice's court, that is to your mind a presumption that there is some evidence against him? A. I take it for granted that the officers of the law must have held him for some reason, or else they were incompetent—one or the other. It does not bias or prejudice me in the least, so far as the guilt or innocence of the defendant is concerned, any more than the officers would not have arrested or the magistrate have held him, if there was not some evidence connecting him with the crime." After the defendant had challenged the juror, upon an examination by the district attorney, the following occurred: "Q. Do you know anything about the facts of this case? A. Nothing but what I read in the paper. Q. Have you formed any opinion regarding the merits of the case? A. No; I can't say that I have. Q. Do you know the defendant? A. I do not. Q. Ever seen him before? A. No; not to know him. Q. Have you any bias or prejudice regarding the case? A. Not at all. Q. If you were accepted and sworn as a juror, can you try the case fairly and impartially? A. I think I can. Q. And give to this defendant the benefit of any reasonable doubt? A. Yes, sir." On the oral argument of defendant's counsel, in support of this point as to the disqualification of the jurors, he was asked by a member of the court how he could get an intelligent jury, if the rule he contended for was adopted, and he answered; "I think the whole tendency of our law is to deprive the prosecution of an intelligent jury. That is my candid belief on it, but we claim the decisions support our contention in this respect." We do not agree with counsel that a fair construction of the law as it exists would lead to the absurdity suggested, and we think that the jurymen in question, notwithstanding what they had read in the papers with reference to the matter, showed themselves to be entirely qualified to act and give the defendant a fair and impartial trial. Pen. Code, § 1076.

In the examination of several of the jurors, after each had stated that he would consider the testimony of the defendant, if given, and would not reject it simply because he was the defendant, the court refused to allow the following question: "If the defendant should himself testify on some material point, and his testimony was reasonable, not contradicted, and not impeached, would you give it weight?" The question was clearly incompetent, and the ruling was correct. A juror may be asked if he will consider all the testimony and evidence fairly and impartially, and give to each part of it such weight as, in his best judgment under all the circumstances of the case, he deems it entitled to. It is his duty to do this. But it is highly improper, under any circumstances, to ask him, as this question in effect does, to promise in advance to give weight to any particular part of the testimony either for or against the defendant.

3. We have examined the record with reference to the admission and rejection of testimony during the progress of the trial, and can see no error or irregularity which could have tended to the prejudice of the defendant, or prevent him from having a fair and impartial trial.

4. In the closing argument the district attorney stated as follows to the jury: "Another fact in the case, gentlemen, is that the revolver had been recently cleaned. His statement was true that it was clean. An examination made of it immediately after it was taken from him showed that it had recently been fired twice. Now those are facts. Arkley's testimony sustains the testimony as to that fact. Mr. Stewart's testimony shows that it is true. This revolver, which we have produced here, is the weapon which was taken from him, is the weapon he had there that night, the only weapon connected with him, and it had been fired twice. Now let us look at the testimony of Mrs. Ritchie, which counsel speaks so much about—her testimony that the defendant told her that the revolver was clean; he told her that at night. Her husband testified to that, and the defendant told her that the next morning, when he took out the revolver and opened it and told her it was clean. Why should he take out his revolver and tell her that? He did it. He took it out, and in connection with that it was very natural for him to say what he had done. He had shot a woman. She asked him why he cleaned it. He cleaned it so the officers, if they saw it, wouldn't mistrust anything. Was not that reasonable? Will you, gentlemen of the jury, as reasonable men, question the testimony of that little woman as to those statements? She is not contradicted. No witness has been called to testify that the defendant didn't tell her that." At this point defendant's counsel excepted to that remark of the district attorney, on the ground that it is shown by the testimony that there were but two persons present at the conversation. The court was not requested to instruct the jury to disregard the comment, nor was the district attorney requested to withdraw the same, and nothing further was done. For the protection of the innocent, who may be accused of crime, the law very properly has prescribed certain rules of practice in the trial of the accused, which are to be observed as well in the case of the guilty as of the innocent. In carrying out these humane and wise provisions of the law, it becomes the duty of the court, however, not to allow the ends of justice to be defeated by any refined technicalities. In this connection something must be allowed to the zeal of counsel on either side in discussing the case before the jury, and we cannot see that the comments of the district attorney on the testimony of this case transcended the bounds of propriety, or had a tendency to prejudice the defendant. People v. Kelly (decided Jan. 30, 1905; Cr. No. 1,186) 79 Pac. 846. The Code declares: "After hearing the appeal, the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." Pen. Code, § 1258.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BALLERINO v. BALLERINO. (L. A. 1,345.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1905.)

CONTRACTS—SERVICES IN VIOLATION OF LAW—COMPENSATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 316, declaring any person who knowingly lets an apartment or tenement for purposes of prostitution guilty of a misdemeanor, services rendered by a tenant in common in letting the common premises from day to day to lewd women for purposes of prostitution, and collecting the rents, cannot be made the basis of a claim for compensation against the co-tenant.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

LORIGAN, J. This action was to obtain a partition of certain lands owned by the parties as tenants in common. During the pendency of the suit, and until final partition should be had, it was agreed between them that plaintiff should collect and receive the rents from certain business buildings in the city of Los Angeles, and the defendant the rents from certain tenements therein, both to render accounts to each other from time to time of their receipts and necessary disbursements in the care and management of the property. When the time for final partition arrived, the parties being unable to agree among themselves as to the settlement of their accounts, the matter was submitted to the court for determination. The account of plaintiff showed a balance of $1,002.37 in her hands, and the account of defendant showed a balance in his hands of $342.68. The rents collected by defendant aggregated a large amount, which, save this balance, had been properly disbursed for the benefit of the Los Angeles city property and other property owned by the parties as tenants in common. In settling his accounts defendant claimed a compensation for his services in the care of the tenement property and collection of the rents thereof of $150 per month, which, for the period claimed, would amount to $1,725. The evidence showed that the tenements of which he had charge—some 20 or 30—were let from day to day to women for temporary occupancy, and the rents thereof were collected by him daily; that said tenements were let and used by lewd women for purposes of prostitution, of which defendant was at all times aware, and to which he consented; that, in order to collect such rents, it was necessary that the defendant should be present on the premises during the day and a considerable portion of the night. The court refused to allow him any compensation, holding that he was not entitled thereto, for the reason that the purposes for which the said tenements were let by him were illegal and immoral. Thereupon the court adjudged that the account between plaintiff and defendant should be balanced, and that neither should recover from the other, and from that portion of the judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The refusal of the court to allow the defendant any compensation for his services in the care of the property under his control and the collection of its rents was clearly right. The only care he gave it was to see that it was let for the purposes of prostitution, and that the rents due from its inmates were daily paid. It is declared by section 316 of the Penal Code that any person who lets any apartment or tenement, knowing that it is to be used for the purposes of prostitution, is guilty of a misdemeanor. The services for which the defendant asked the court to award him compensation consisted in devoting the premises under his control to persistent violations of the penal law. His conduct in that regard was criminal, contrary to the provisions of the Penal Code, and against good morals. It is a familiar rule of law, which needs no citation of authorities to support it, that one will not be afforded the aid of either a court of law or equity to obtain compensation for services rendered in doing what the law expressly prohibits him from doing. Aid will never be given by any court to a person who bases his cause of action or claim upon illegal or immoral acts or conduct. The general and comprehensive rule upon this subject supporting the refusal of the superior court to allow the defendant any compensation is stated by this court in Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 93, 45 Pac. 1015, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1905.)

1. VENUE—CHANGE—DEMAND—TIME OF APPLICATION.

A demand for a change of venue on the ground that the county of suit is not the county of defendant's residence must be made at the time of defendant's first appearance, either by answer or demurrer, and a failure to make the same until after appearance and demurrer is a waiver of the right to a change.

2. APPEAL—CHANGE OF VENUE—RULING OF LOWER COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The ruling of the lower court denying a motion for a change of venue on the ground of convenience of witnesses cannot be reversed where all the facts urged by the applicant in support of the motion are denied by counter affidavits of his opponent.

3. SAME—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

An objection that an affidavit in opposition to a motion for a change of venue is not properly verified must be made in the court below, and, if not so made, will not be considered on appeal.

4. VENUE—CHANGE—AFFIDAVITS — VERIFICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

A verification of an affidavit in opposition to a motion for change of venue, stating that affiant, "being first duly sworn, deposes and says, that he is personally familiar with the matter stated in the foregoing affidavit, and that such affidavit is true," signed by affiant, and duly sworn to before a notary public, is sufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

Action by W. I. Wadleigh and others against Josephine A. Phelps, as executrix of Timothy Guy Phelps. From an order denying a motion for a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied September 14, 1905.

George F. Witter, Jr. (D. M. Delmas, of counsel), for appellant. C. W. Cross, for respondents.

SHAW J. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion for a change of place of trial from Nevada county to San Mateo county. The action was begun in Nevada county, and the motion was made upon two grounds: First, that Nevada county was not the proper county for the trial, because of the fact that the defendant resided in the county of San Mateo; second, that the convenience of witnesses would be promoted by a change of the place of trial to San Mateo county.

1. With reference to the first ground, the motion was properly denied because of the fact that it was made too late. The original complaint was filed February 8, 1902. A demurrer thereto was filed and served March 29, 1902. On May 7th an amended complaint was filed, and on May 29th a demurrer thereto was filed. On June 9th there was a substitution of attorneys for the defendant. Various motions were made thereafter, but no demand, notice, or affidavit for a change of place of trial was made until August 14, 1902. Where a party claims the right to a change of place of trial upon the ground that the county in which the action is begun is not the county of his residence, and fails to make the demand for a change until after he has appeared and demurred, he thereby waives his right. Such demand and application must be made at the time of his first appearance, either by answer or demurrer. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72.

2. With respect to the second ground of the motion, it is sufficient to say that the counter affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs sufficiently controverted all the facts relating to the convenience of witnesses, and was sufficient to justify the court below in concluding that the convenience of witnesses would not be promoted by the proposed change. Under these circumstances this court cannot reverse the ruling of the court below.

The defendant's contention that the counter affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs is not properly verified is untenable for two reasons: First, because the record shows that the affidavit was read and considered by the court below, and that no objection to the form of the verification thereof was made to that court; second, because, as matter of law, the verification is sufficient. Where it is claimed that an affidavit offered in opposition to a motion is not properly verified, the objection should be made in the court below. This is obvious from the general principle that a technical objection, which can be removed if seasonably made, will not be considered where it is not made when it could be obviated, but is reserved until the proceedings have passed to a stage when the defect cannot be remedied. The affidavit in question was made by C. W. Cross, and the verification, omitting certain portions thereof not material to the question, was as follows: "C. W. Cross being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is personally familiar with the matters stated in the foregoing affidavit and that said affidavit is true." This statement was signed by him, and was duly sworn to before a notary public. This is a sufficient verification of the facts stated in the affidavit.

The order is affirmed.

ROBERTS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,258.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1905.)

ELECTIONS — OFFICERS — REMOVAL — JURISDICTION.

The charter of the city and county of San Francisco does not vest in the mayor of said city and county exclusive jurisdiction to remove election commissioners of the city and county for willful, unlawful, and corrupt misconduct in office, but the superior court also has jurisdiction to remove such commissioners on the accusation of the grand jury.

In Bank. Original petition by Robert W. Roberts and others for a writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and William P. Lawlor, judge thereof. Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

Thomas V. Cator and Hiram W. Johnson, for petitioners. Lewis F. Byington, Wright & Wright, and John A. Hosmer, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an original petition in this court for a writ of prohibition. An alternative writ was issued, and upon the return thereof the petition was heard and submitted. The petitioners are election commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, and there is pending in the court of respondents an accusation by the grand jury charging them with willful, unlawful, and corrupt misconduct as such commissioners, and asking for their removal from their said offices. It is averred that respondents are about to hear, try, and determine said accusation, and the purpose of this proceeding is to prohibit them from so doing and from taking any further action therein. The whole point of the petition is that the respondents have no jurisdiction to consider said application, because the exclusive power of removing petitioners from their offices is vested by the charter of the city and county of San Francisco in the mayor of said city and county. But this point was directly determined against the contention of petitioners by the recent case of Coffey v. Superior Court of Sacramento County (Sac. No. 1,360) 82 Pac. 75, in which the opinion was filed August 10, 1905. The grounds presented in the case at bar for the writ of prohibition are, to say the least, no stronger than those presented by the petitioner in the Coffey Case. It would be useless to repeat here the views expressed in the opinion delivered in that case; and for the reasons therein stated the prayer of the petitioners in the case at bar for a final writ is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

1. Wills — Construction — Estates Created—Remainder Interest.

Where a husband and father devised his real property to his surviving wife "for and during the term of her natural life," provided that she should not marry again, and further willed that after her death the property should go to the children who should then be alive, and, in case of their death without issue, then to his own brothers and sisters, the undivided half of community property belonging to the husband and wife at the former's death went to the wife in fee as survivor of the community, and the other undivided half went to her for life, she not marrying again, with remainder to the children who survived her death.

2. Limitations — Construction of Statute.

All statutory provisions on the subject of limitations are to be considered in determining whether an action is barred, and are to be construed in view of the presumption that legislators are acquainted with well-settled principles of law and legislate with reference thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, §§ 13, 14.]

3. Ejectment—Who May Bring—Persons Not Entitled to Possession—Remaindermen.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1452, providing that the heirs or devisees may maintain an action for the recovery of real estate against any one except the administrator, means only those heirs and devisees who have a present right of possession and a present cause of action as against every one except the administrator, and has no application to a remainderman, although he may have acquired his estate through a devise.

4. Remainders — Action Against Remaindermen—Limitations.

Code Civ. Proc. § 312, declares that civil actions can only be commenced within the prescribed period "after the cause of action shall have accrued." Section 318 provides that no action for the recovery of real property, or the possession thereof, can be maintained unless plaintiff or his predecessor was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action. Held that, since a remainderman has no right of possession and consequently no cause of action touching the possession until the death of the life tenant, the five-year period of limitations does not run against him during the life of the life tenant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, § 231; vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Remainders, § 16.]

5. Mortgages — Foreclosure — Effect on Paramount Title.

Where a widow to whom land was left for life, with remainder to her children, mortgaged the land, the title of the children was not subject to the mortgage, and their rights to the property were not affected by a foreclosure of the mortgage, although they were made defendants to the foreclosure suit.

6. Judgments—Res Judicata—Persons Concluded.

Civ. Code, § 741, declares that no future interest can be defeated or barred by any alienation or other act of the owner of the intermediate or particular interest. An administrator of the estate of a decedent, who had devised a remainder interest in property to plaintiffs, prosecuted an action of ejectment to recover possession of such property. Judgment was rendered for defendant in the action. Held, that such judgment was not binding on the remaindermen in a subsequent suit to quiet title instituted by them against the same defendant.

Action by Flora C. Pryor and another against Mary Winter. From a part of the judgment rendered, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied September 21, 1905.

J. J. Wells and Earll H. Webb, for appellants. H. P. Andrews, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiffs are the children of John E. Church, deceased, and they brought this action to quiet their title to undivided interests in certain lots of land in the town of Red Bluff, in Tehama county, including the undivided half of a lot described as lot 22 in block 12. The court below, sitting without a jury, gave judgment to plaintiffs for the other property involved, but held that plaintiffs are not the owners of or entitled to the possession of any part of lot 22, and that defendant is the owner of all of said last-mentioned lot by adverse possession, and rendered judgment accordingly. From that part of the judgment which decrees that defendant is the sole owner of the whole of lot 22, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

The said John E. Church, father of plaintiffs, died testate on January 13, 1886. At that time lot 22 was the community property of the deceased and his wife, Elizabeth Church. By his will he devised all his real property to his surviving wife, Elizabeth, "for and during the term of her natural life," provided that she should not marry again; and it is provided by the will that after her death the property should go to all of his children who should be then alive, share and share alike as tenants in common, and in case of their death without issue then to go to his brothers and sisters, and it was to go in the same way upon her marriage. The wife was made executrix and acted as such until her death. She did not marry again, and at her death, which occurred on the 22d day of December, 1898, the children, plaintiffs herein, were both alive. Therefore the references in the will to the contingencies of her marriage and of the death of the children without issue are of no consequence, except, perhaps, as touching upon the argument by counsel whether the remainder to plaintiffs was vested or contingent; and under our views of the case that question is immaterial. Therefore the undivided half of lot 22 went to the widow in fee as survivor of the community; and under the will she took a life interest in the other half, with the remainder of that half to plaintiffs. The only question in the case, therefore, is whether the plaintiffs' right as remaindermen to the undivided half of the lot was barred by the statute of limitations.

March, 1894, the surviving wife, Elizabeth, in her individual capacity, executed two mortgages on property including lot 22—one to the defendant herein to secure a loan of $2,500, and the other to the husband of defendant to secure a like amount. Afterwards the defendant became the owner of both the mortgages, and brought an action to foreclose them. She made the plaintiffs herein defendants in the foreclosure suit, upon the allegation that they claimed some interest in the property which was subject to the mortgages; and plaintiffs herein, defendants there, made default. Afterwards she obtained a decree of foreclosure, and purchased the property at the foreclosure sale, and obtained a commissioner's deed. On March 30, 1898, she dispossessed the executrix and entered upon the said lot 22, and since then has held possession of the same, claiming to have held it adversely to the whole world. When the present action was commenced the defendant had been thus in possession of the lot in contest for more than five years from the time of her first entry; but this action was brought within less than five years after the death of Elizabeth, the life tenant. Under the above facts the action was not barred; for the cause of action did not accrue until after the death of the life tenant, and it was brought within the statutory period of limitation after it had thus accrued. Before that time the plaintiffs had no right of possession of the lot, and had no cause of action touching such possession. It has been universally held that the estate of a remainderman is distinct from that of a tenant of a preceding particular estate, and cannot be in any way affected by any act of the particular tenant or his grantee. The rule is stated by Chief Justice Kent in Jackson v. Schoonmaker, 4 Johns. 402, as follows: "Neither a descent cast nor the statute of limitations will affect a right, if a particular estate existed at the time of the disseisin, or when the adverse possession began, because a right of entry in the remainderman cannot exist during the existence of the particular estate; and the laches of a tenant for life will not affect the party entitled. An entry to avoid the statute must be an entry for the purpose of taking possession, and such an entry cannot be made during the existence of the life estate [citing cases]." And in Tiedeman on Real Property, par. 400, it is said: "The tenant cannot do anything to defeat a vested remainder. A disseisin of the tenant affects the remainder in no manner. Nor can the possession of the tenant be deemed adverse to the remainderman, either for the purpose of preventing the latter from conveying his interest, or with a view to defeat it under the statute of limitations, unless the possession be continued after the termination of the particular estate. The statute of limitations does not begin to run until the remainder takes effect in possession." The citation of further authorities to the point is unnecessary. The principle is elementary, and we have been referred to no cases holding otherwise.

The conclusion of the lower court seems to have been arrived at by the process of looking only at section 318, Code Civ. Proc., and considering nothing else. That section provides that no action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof can be maintained, unless the plaintiff or his predecessor was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action. But all the law on a wide subject like that of limitation of actions is not to be found in one section. All the statutory provisions on the subject are to be considered, and they are to be construed in view of the presumption that the legislators are acquainted with well-settled principles of law and legislate with reference thereto. For instance, in section 1452, Code Civ. Proc., it is provided that the heirs or devisees may maintain an action for the recovery of the real estate against any one except the administrator or executor; but surely that provision could not be considered as applicable to a remainderman, although he may have received his estate through a devise, and therefore is literally in the general category of "devisees." It means only those heirs and devisees who have a present right of possession, and therefore a present cause of action, as against every one except the administrator. And so it cannot be held that the Legislature intended by section 318 to abrogate or overlook the principle, declared in jurisdictions where statutes of limitations include provisions similar to that of section 318, that the statute does not commence to run against a cause of action before such cause of action shall have accrued, unless otherwise expressly provided. Our Code itself expressly declares this rule in section 312, Code Civ. Proc., where it is enacted that civil actions "can only be commenced within the period prescribed in this title after the cause of action shall have accrued, unless where in special cases a different limitation is prescribed by statute"; and there is, to our knowledge, no statutory provision prescribing a different rule, except section 359, Code Civ. Proc., which refers solely to actions against directors or stockholders of corporations. The question here involved has not to our knowledge been directly decided by this court, probably because no one has heretofore contended that the statute of limitations would run against a remainderman during the life of the particular tenant. But in Le Roy v. Rogers, 30 Cal. 230, 89 Am. Dec. 88, Justice Rhodes, in delivering the opinion of the court, expressly declared the rule as above stated. In that case the purchaser at a foreclosure sale undertook to maintain that by his purchase he took a new title, and that the statute commenced to run against him only from the date of his purchase; but the court held against this contention, saying that "his estate in the land is the estate that the mortgagor had." And in the discussion of the question the learned justice, after referring to other instances where a new title might start a new running of the statute, said: "And the remainderman, upon the expiration of the particular estate, does not come in under it, but claims through an independent source of title, and he has his action, though the particular estate man may have been cut off from a recovery against the adverse possessor." And at the time of that decision the provision of said section 318 was part of the law of this state, as it has always been since 1850. See Hittell's Gen. Laws Cal. vol. 2, p. 633. It would be strange indeed if during the life of the particular tenant a remainderman could be compelled to lose his estate on account of another's possession which he would be utterly helpless to interrupt.

Plaintiffs' rights were not affected by the fact that they were made defendants in the foreclosure suit. Their title was not subject to the mortgage, but was an independent paramount title, and not a subject of litigation in that suit.

It appears that one Webb was appointed administrator of the estate of John E. Church, deceased, as successor of the executrix, and commenced an action of ejectment against the present defendant, Winter, to recover possession of the property here in contest. The defendant in that action pleaded the statute of limitations. The trial court gave judgment for her. Webb appealed, and this court affirmed the judgment. See Webb v. Winter, 135 Cal. 455, 67 Pac. 691. But that judgment did not in any way bind the plaintiffs herein. An administrator is not a trustee for a remainderman, and the latter is not estopped by anything the former may do or suffer to be done. In that case the court said: "In this litigation the court is not concerned as to the individual legal status of the two adult children. If they have rights above and beyond that of the administrator, those rights are not in litigation here." Section 741, Civ. Code, expressly declares—what was always the law—that "no future interest can be defeated or barred by any alienation or other act of the owner of the intermediate or particular interest."

That part of the judgment appealed from, and the order denying the new trial, are reversed.

JOYCE v. LOS ANGELES RY. CO. (L. A. 1,373.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 3, 1905.)

1. CARRIERS—STREET CAR—DUTY TO STOP FOR PASSENGER.

Where a passenger on a street car arose from her seat and stepped onto the step while the car was standing still, and either the motorman or conductor observed such act, it was sufficient notice of her desire to alight.

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where, while a street car was standing, a passenger stepped onto the step of the car, and while there it moved suddenly forward, owing to the negligence of the conductor, whereby the passenger was injured, she was not guilty of contributory negligence, unless an ordinarily prudent person would not so have done.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 9, Cent. Dig. Carriers, § 1385.]

3. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a passenger on a street car, while it was standing, stepped down onto the step, with a view of leaving the car, and while in the act of alighting the operatives caused the car to start, so as to injure her, the facts showed a prima facie case of negligence.

4. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A passenger on a street car cannot recover for injuries sustained in consequence of her voluntarily alighting from the car when it was in motion.

Action by Annie Joyce against the Los Angeles Railway Company. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying her a new trial. Affirmed.

Wm. Wylie and Waters & Wylie, for appellant. Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The action is to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in alighting from a car of the defendant company, in consequence of the sudden starting of the car when in such act of alighting therefrom. The case was tried before a jury, and, upon a verdict in favor of the defendant, judgment was rendered accordingly. The appeal is taken from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The appellant urges two points on the appeal, to wit: First, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; second, error in modifying certain instructions asked by the plaintiff, and in giving certain instructions asked by the defendant.

The testimony shows that the car upon which plaintiff was riding left Main street, in Los Angeles, on its journey to the easterly boundary of the city, on First street, and that it stopped at the westerly line of Alameda street; and plaintiff claims that while she was making her exit therefrom, and in the act of stepping from the steps of the car to the street, the employé operating the car, without warning, and knowing her dangerous position, caused the car to be suddenly jerked, thereby throwing her from the step to the ground.

1. The evidence on the part of the defendant shows that the plaintiff asked the conductor to stop at Hewitt street, and he told her that he would. Thereafter, when the car reached Vine street, a lady passenger alighted from the car, and the plaintiff asked the conductor, "Is this Hewitt street?" and he replied, "No; it is three blocks further." The next crossing going easterly is Alameda street, on which the Southern Pacific Company operates its steam railroad. It is the custom before crossing the steam railroad track for the conductor to go forward and ascertain whether the car can safely cross, and in obedience to this custom the conductor of this car, when it approached the west line of Alameda street, left the car and went forward to ascertain whether any trains were approaching the crossing of First and Alameda streets. He left on the right side of the car and went forward, and, finding it safe to proceed, looked back to see whether there was anyone in the act of alighting from the car, and gave the motorman the signal to go ahead, whereupon the motorman rang the bell and started the car. Thereafter, while the car was in motion, the plaintiff, without any notice to or knowledge of either the conductor or the motorman that she intended to leave said car at that point, alighted therefrom on the left-hand side, and, in consequence thereof, was injured. It further appears from the evidence that before she attempted to alight she was warned by one of the passengers not to do so. He testifies: "I thought maybe she was going to get off before the car stopped, and I said to her, 'Wait a minute.' The car was in motion, and she didn't pay any attention to me, but got off. I stayed on the car. The conductor went back to assist her in getting up." It also appears from the evidence that her intended destination was Hewitt street, a distance of two blocks east of Alameda street. She, however, gives as an excuse for alighting at Alameda street, that she had concluded to walk the remainder of the distance, although it was some 8 o'clock in the evening at the time of the accident. Without going further into the particulars in reference to the testimony given, it is sufficient to say that, so far from the evidence failing to support the verdict, as contended by the appellant, it appears that the defendant's version as to how the accident occurred is supported by a preponderance of the evidence.

2. It is contended on the part of the appellant that the court erred in modifying instruction No. 5 requested by the plaintiff. Plaintiff's instruction No. 5, as modified by the court, is as follows; the insertions being indicated by the portions in parentheses:

"If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff arose from her seat and stepped down onto the step with intent of alighting while the car was standing still (and that such act was observed by the motorman or conductor), such act was a sufficient notice to the employés in charge of said car of her desire to alight therefrom; and if the jury (further) believe that, while she was in the act of alighting, the car was suddenly started through the negligent act of the employé in charge of said car, (and) the plaintiff was thereby thrown to the ground and injured, she is entitled to recover."

In plaintiff's instruction No. 6, as modified by the court, the insertions also appear in parentheses, while the omitted portions are indicated by italics, as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the car came to a stop, and that while it was standing still the plaintiff stepped down onto the step of the car with the intent of alighting therefrom, and that while on said step the car moved suddenly forward in consequence of the negligent act of the conductor or motorman, and she was thereby thrown off and injured, and if they further believe that (the conduct of) the plaintiff did under the circumstances what an ordinarily prudent woman would have done (was that of an ordinarily prudent person), then she was not guilty of contributory negligence, and would be entitled to recover."

Instructions Nos. 1, 2, and 3, requested by the plaintiff and given by the court, are as follows:

"(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff exercised ordinary care, and that the defendant failed to exercise the utmost care and diligence of a very cautious person, and that, by reason of the failure to exercise such utmost care and diligence of a very cautious person, the plaintiff was injured, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

"(2) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was a passenger and had paid her fare on the car in question, and that she exercised that degree of care which a person of ordinary care and prudence would have exercised under the circumstances, and that the defendant failed to exercise the utmost care and diligence of a very cautious person, and that, by reason of the failure to exercise such utmost care and diligence of a very cautious person, plaintiff was injured, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

"(3) If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff was a passenger and had paid her fare on the car in question, and that while the car was standing still she arose from her seat and stepped down onto the step, with a view of leaving the car, and while in the act of alighting the defendant's servants caused the car to start forward with a jerk, which caused her to fall, whereby she was injured, she has established a prima facie case of negligence in the management of the car, and the burden of proof, which primarily rested on her, was uplifted, and the burden of disproof thrown upon the defendant."

No. 4 is in reference to the measure of damages in case a verdict should be rendered for the plaintiff.

The appellant also contends that the court erred in giving the first instruction requested by the defendant, to wit:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover in this action, it must appear from the evidence that the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were occasioned by the carelessness or negligence on the part of defendant or its servants or employés as charged in the complaint, and were not the result of the plaintiff's own fault; and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was injured in consequence of her voluntary alighting from the car of defendant, at the time of the accident, when it was in motion, then your verdict should be for defendant."

Also in giving the second instruction as modified by the court (the modification appearing by italics) as follows:

"(2) No presumption of negligence on the part of defendant's employés arises from the fact that the plaintiff was injured by alighting from the car of the defendant. If you find that she did so alight, voluntarily, while the car was in motion."

We think the instructions as a whole fairly presented the case to the jury upon the evidence introduced at the trial, and fully guarded the rights of the plaintiff and appellant. The preponderance of the evidence shows, and the jury evidently so found, that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by her own negligence in attempting to alight from the car while it was in motion, and, this being so, she could not properly recover. In Campbell v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 137, 67 Pac. 50, it is said: "The court found 'that plaintiff's injury was due wholly to his stepping off the car while it was still in motion, and such injury was not occasioned by the negligence of defendant.' * * * We think the plaintiff is not entitled to recover on the above facts. The defendant did not commit any breach or omission of legal duty. Donovan v. Ferris, 128 Cal. 54, 60 Pac. 519, 79 Am. St. Rep. 25. The motorman quickly and promptly stopped the car when last requested by plaintiff. It was stopped in a safe place. Plaintiff was warned not to get off until it had stopped. It is difficult to imagine what greater care could have been exercised by defendant." It is said in Booth on Street Railway Law, § 337: "But it has been held to be negligence per se, which justifies a nonsuit, to step off the car while it is being slowed up, in order to stop in response to a passenger's request, or when incumbered by a load or bundle." In a late case before the Supreme Court of New York (Saffer v. Dry Dock, etc., R. Co. [Sup.] 5 N. Y. Supp. 701), the defendant had requested the lower court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "If the jury believe that, while the car was being slowed up in order to stop in response to the plaintiff's request, the plaintiff, without waiting for the car to be stopped, stepped off the car while in motion, and thereby sustained his alleged injury, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the defendant is entitled to a verdict on that ground." The court on the appeal held that the instruction stated the law correctly, and should have been given. In the opinion of the court it is said: "If he got off while the car was in this rapid motion, then it was negligence; and, if he did anything in the way of getting off the car which helped or contributed to bring about the injury, then there was contributory negligence on his part, and he was not entitled to recover." It is said in Schouler on Bailments & Carriers (3d Ed.) § 662: "Thus a railway passenger is not justified in jumping from the train while it is in motion, even though the carrier was negligent, whether in carrying him past the station, or in starting before he had due opportunity to land." In Craven v. Central Pac. R. Co., 72 Cal. 347, 13 Pac. 878, this court said: "Did the plaintiff, at the very time of the accident, negligently jump off the train while it was moving, and thus cause or contribute to the injury? If she did not, then the verdict should have been for plaintiff. If she did, then there can be no doubt that her negligence contributed proximately to the injury. It was the very thing which then and there directly and immediately caused it."

Order appealed from affirmed.

MUNROE v. FETTE et al.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — RATIFICATION — KNOWLEDGE.

A party cannot be held to have ratified a transaction by acts without knowledge, or the equivalent, of the facts concerning the transaction.

Action by Squire Munroe against Margaret M. Fette and others. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. G. Rossiter and Flint & Barker, for appellants. D. Allen, Trusten P. Dyer, and Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Appeal from an order granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The suit was in replevin, and there was a verdict and judgment for the defendants.

Without noticing the many other assignments of error raised by the bill of exceptions, and on consideration of which the court granted a new trial, it is sufficient upon this appeal to call attention to instruction No. 10, which reads as follows: "You are instructed that if you find that certain of the property in question was held by Mrs. Stella Munroe under the lease from Barker Bros., with the privilege of purchasing the same, and that defendants furnished money as a part of the purchase price of said property described in the complaint to pay the balance to be paid thereon to said Barker Bros. necessary to secure the title to said property, and that plaintiff claims title to said property so purchased from said Barker Bros., or any interest therein, by reason of such payment by Mrs. Stella Munroe to them from moneys so furnished by defendants, or either of them, without offering to refund said moneys, then said plaintiff, by so doing, ratified the sale to defendants by which said money was derived." This instruction proceeds upon the theory that the fact of part payment by plaintiff's wife from the proceeds of the sale to defendants precluded plaintiff from claiming the property as community property, without offering to refund to defendants the amount so paid and applied by the wife to the purchase price, omitting therefrom all question as to the knowledge of plaintiff in relation to the transaction. That plaintiff may be held to the ratification of an act, it is essential that he have knowledge, or the equivalent, of the facts concerning the transaction. A ratification supposes a knowledge of the thing ratified. Blen v. Bear River, etc., Co., 20 Cal. 602, 81 Am. Dec. 132. "It is an inherent element of ratification that the party to be charged with it must have fully known what he was doing." Brown v. Rouse, 104 Cal. 676, 38 Pac. 507.

The fact of defendant Fette's withholding possession was an issue. The whole testimony does not purport to appear in the bill of exceptions, and we cannot say that the new trial was improperly granted as to her.

The court did not err in granting a new trial, and the order is affirmed.

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—OBSTRUCTION OF DRAINAGE SYSTEM—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

In an action to recover damages for injury to a crop caused by defendants' obstruction of the water course into which plaintiffs' lands were drained, where the evidence showed that the obstructed water course was the natural conduit of the drainage from plaintiffs' land, and that the land must of necessity have been drained into such water course, and no part of plaintiffs' drainage system was upon defendants' lands, and there was nothing to show that plaintiffs were not strictly within their rights in draining the land and planting the crop, it would be presumed that plaintiffs had title and a right to maintain their ditches and drainage system.

2. SAME—LIABILITY OF OBSTRUCTER.

Under Civ. Code § 3514, requiring one to so use his own rights as not to infringe upon the rights of another, a riparian proprieter is liable in damages for damming the stream and thereby obstructing a drainage system lawfully maintained by other landed proprietors, and destroying a crop previously rightfully brought into existence by such other proprietors.

3. SAME—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

Parties to a contract for cropping land on shares, each of whom owns an interest in the growing crop, are properly joined as plaintiffs in an action for the destruction of their crop, caused by interference with the drainage of the land on which the crop is grown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; J. W. Ballard, Judge.

Action by D. H. Thomas and another against the Bolsa Land Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dunn & Crutcher and Scarborough & Forgy, for appellants. F. O. Daniel and Victor Montgomery, for respondents.

GRAY, P. J. This action is brought to recover damages suffered by reason of a dam constructed by defendants, which had the effect to back up and cause certain waters to subirrigate and injure and destroy the celery crop of plaintiffs. On a trial without a jury the plaintiffs had judgment for $982 and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying them a new trial.

The plaintiff Thomas owns a certain 40 acres of land in Orange county, upon which the plaintiffs, under an agreement between them for cropping the land on shares, had growing some 11 acres of celery. The story of injuries complained of is aptly told in the findings of the court, the important parts of which are as follows: "That the said land is situated about two miles from and above the dam described in said complaint, and therein alleged to have been built by the Bolsa Land Company; that said land of the plaintiff

Thomas was, as early as the year 1892, to some extent drained by the construction of ditches along and through it, and prior to the construction of said dam had been drained to such an extent as to render it tillable, and susceptible of raising, and had raised, good crops of celery and other farm products; that prior to the building of said dam the ditches used in the drainage of the lands of the plaintiffs and other lands contiguous thereto emptied into a natural stream known as 'Freeman's River,' and from thence into Bolsa Chica Bay, and from said bay through a natural channel and outlet into the Pacific Ocean; that prior to the 1st day of October, 1899, the plaintiff D. H. Thomas had expended money in draining said land, and in preparing for and in reducing the same to cultivation, and in cultivating said land, and in digging and keeping open ditches for the purpose of draining said land into said Bolsa Chica Bay, and had, prior to the building of said dam, drained said land and kept the water off and from under the same by running said water into the Bolsa Chica Bay, from which bay it flowed out into the Pacific Ocean by a natural channel, carrying away the surplus water from said lands by means of said ditches, river, and bay, and natural channel, into the Pacific Ocean; that during the year 1899 the plaintiffs planted the land described in the complaint as belonging to the plaintiff Thomas with celery and other crops; that 11 acres of said land were planted with celery, and that plaintiffs were the owners of said crop of celery; that before said celery was planted the land was properly prepared and put in a fit state of cultivation for the planting of celery, and said land was cultivated in the usual and customary way; that the said crop of celery was growing and maturing up to about the 15th day of December, 1899, and was then worth in the field the sum of $1,100, and was worth said sum when it was damaged and destroyed, as herein stated, and had it not been for the building of said dam and the consequent backing of the water in said bay and ditches, said celery could have been sold at the time in the field and at harvest time for the sum of $1,100; that said dam was constructed by the defendants at and in said Bolsa Chica Bay, and at the place alleged in said complaint, and was an obstruction in and to the channel of said bay, and prevented the water of said bay from flowing through the natural channel and outlet, and out of the bay into the Pacific Ocean, and, as maintained by the defendants, the waters of the bay were dammed up and rose in said bay and in said ditches, and filled up the drainage ditches, and prevented the waters from said ditches and from the land of the plaintiffs from flowing away from said land into the Pacific Ocean, and caused said land to become subirrigated, and the celery to become wet, damaged, decayed, and destroyed, and to become unfit for market and unsalable, and the said crop of celery was lost to the plaintiffs, except a small portion thereof, which was sold for the sum of $118, which was all of said crop that could be sold, and was all that could be realized therefor; that about the 1st day of November. 1899, and after said crop of celery had been planted, and while it was growing on the lands of the plaintiffs, the said defendants built, erected, and maintained in and across said Bolsa Chica Bay, and across the channel thereof running into the Pacific Ocean, a dam extending above the high tide of the said ocean, which was maintained and kept above high tide up to the month of March, 1900; that for more than two years next prior to the building of said dam the land of the plaintiff Thomas had been cultivated and planted with celery, and good celery crops had been grown thereon and were matured and harvested, and said crops kept in good condition and were fit for market, and were marketed and sold for from $100 to $125 per acre in the field; that the ditches constructed for the purpose of draining the land of the plaintiff Thomas had not been used continuously and adversely for the period of five years before the commencement of this action."

The first and main contention of appellants is that "plaintiffs showed no right to maintain their ditches and to drain water into the Freeman river and the bay through their ditches, and hence cannot complain of the obstruction to the flow of water therein." In considering this question, it may be well to notice in the beginning that this is not an action in equity to restrain defendants from maintaining their dam. It is an action to recover only for an actual loss and injury to property, suffered by plaintiffs because of this dam. The property injured consisted of a growing and nearly matured crop of celery. The soil upon which this celery was maturing had been cultivated, drained, and made fit for the growth of the crop at a time anterior to the construction of the dam, and the celery had been planted and was rapidly maturing at the time the dam was built. There is nothing to show that plaintiffs were not in every respect acting strictly within their rights at every step they took in the draining and further preparation of this land, as well as in planting and bringing into existence the property destroyed by the subsequent acts of defendants. So far as the drainage ditches are concerned, the map in evidence shows that the river and Bolsa Bay were the natural conduits of the drainage from this land, and that, if the land was drained at all, it must have been by ditches, either into the river or into the bay direct, or into some other slough or stream connecting with the bay, and of necessity the dam would have affected disastrously any system of drainage that the plaintiffs could have reasonably adopted. The plaintiffs were in possession of a drainage system to the river. No part of this system was upon the lands of defendants, and it connected with a natural water course. From this possession a presumption of title and right of possession arises. It cannot be said that the use of this drainage system invaded any right of the defendants,—at least, not up to the time of the construction of the dam.

Now, then, the question is: After this crop of celery had been by plaintiffs' efforts brought into existence, presumably without invading the rights of any other person, are the defendants entitled, by reason of being riparian owners on the river and bay, to so use the waters of the same as to destroy property which has been brought into existence as above indicated? There is a principle in law, which finds expression in section 3514 of the Civil Code, as follows: "One must so use his own rights as not to infringe upon the rights of another." This principle has often been applied so as to restrain a lower riparian owner from damming up the stream in such a manner as to back the water upon the lands of an upper owner on the stream, to the injury of the land of the latter and the destruction of his crops growing thereon. The same rule has sometimes been applied to injuries arising on lands not riparian to the stream, but which found a convenient and natural outlet for the drainage of such lands when aided by artificial ditches. Krause v. Oregon Iron & Steel Co., 77 Pac. 833. This case was recently decided by the Supreme Court of Oregon. The plaintiff in it was the owner of a tract of 25 acres of land near the Tualitin river, which he alleges was drained by it and Rock Creek, a small tributary thereto, and that by reason of the obstruction caused by defendant's dam the water was cast upon his land, and the drainage so impeded and retarded as to hinder and delay him in planting his crops until too late in the season for them to mature properly. This land was once of a swampy character, but had been redeemed by drainage, and was very valuable for gardening and farming purposes. The court held that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restricting the dam to a height that would not result in injury to plaintiff's land. In the opinion it is said: "The defendant owes to the plaintiff and other land owners, whose crops are dependent upon the proper drainage of the soil in which they are produced, a duty to see that it does not trespass upon their prior acquired rights and privileges; and it can proceed with its obstruction of the stream just so far only as not to impinge upon these rights and privileges." No question of the statute of limitations is discussed, or even mentioned; but the opinion proceeds upon the theory that, the plaintiff having devoted this stream to drainage purposes before the construction of the dam, therefore the dam should be so regulated as not to interfere with such drainage. If a person can be restricted in the use of his dam in the manner indicated in the above case, it is clear that damages ought to be given plaintiffs herein under the circumstances disclosed by the quoted findings.

We are of opinion that defendants had not the right to back up or retard the waters of the bay and stream to the injury and destruction of the crops of the plaintiffs. The principle governing the case is analogous to that which gives to the owner of land an easement in the lower lands adjoining for the discharge of rain and surface water falling upon his own land. The owner of the lower lands is liable in damages, if he dams up and backs and holds the water upon the higher lands. So here the defendants are liable for not permitting the waters to proceed on their way to the ocean, and for interfering with the established drainage system of plaintiffs. The language of the findings will not admit of any other reasonable construction than that the crop was injured and destroyed by the act of the defendants in damming up and preventing the water from flowing away. The findings of the court find ample support in the evidence. It would serve no useful purpose to attempt to state or analyze the evidence here. The contract between the plaintiffs was for cropping the land on shares, and each of them owned an interest in the growing crop, and there was no misjoinder of parties plaintiff.

Other objections are urged by appellants, but after a careful examination of them we are of opinion that they are not of sufficient importance to warrant further discussion.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

McRAE v. ERICKSON et al.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—PLACES TO WORK—SUBSTANTIALLY COMPLETED STRUCTURES—TUNNELS.

The excavation of a tunnel and its completion to a temporary grade, over which is laid a temporary track, which is but a few inches from the level of the regular grade, the tunnel being completed, except for timbering and completing the excavation to the regular grade, is a substantial completion of the portion of the tunnel so excavated, within the rule making the completed portion of the tunnel an appliance and means to prosecute the work, furnished by the master, which he is bound to use ordinary care to render a safe place in which to work.

2. NEGLIGENCE — PERILOUS SITUATIONS—DEGREE OF CARE REQUIRED—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction on the degree of prudence required of a person in imminent danger need not be qualified by a proviso on the contributory negligence of such person in bringing about the dangerous situation, where there is no evidence showing that he did bring about such situation.

3. SAME.

An instruction on the degree of care required of a person in imminent danger need not be qualified with the proviso that he acted in the emergency as any ordinarily prudent man would have been likely to act under the same circumstances.

Action by Alexander McRae against Charles Erickson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for appellants. Edwin A. Meserve and Fred E. Burlew, for respondents.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff, and from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The suit is for damages for injuries received by plaintiff while working for defendants in the construction of a tunnel for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company on the line between Los Angeles and Ventura counties. The general course of the tunnel is eastward from the portal, or entrance to it. The work had been completed, and permanently timbered some distance into the mountain, and for some distance beyond that—variously stated, but which we may call about 50 feet—the tunnel had been completed, with exception of timbering, down to what may be called the "temporary grade." Over this there was laid a temporary track, reaching to the end or "toe" of what is called by the witnesses the "muck pile"—a point distant about 18 feet from the face of the tunnel—by which is meant the cross-section of the tunnel at the end of the part above described. The precise difference of level between the regular grade and the temporary grade is not stated, but was probably a few inches only; and, in the language of one of the witnesses, this portion of the tunnel had been completed, except for the timbering, and "taking up the grade," by which is meant completing the excavation to the regular grade. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was engaged on the south side of the tunnel in loading a car from the muck heap, and was injured by a rock falling from the side of the tunnel between him and the portal as he attempted to escape in that direction.

The jury were instructed (among other instructions), in effect, that where a permanent tunnel is being driven into a mountain to furnish a permanent bed for a railroad, the completed portion of the tunnel, as fast as completed, becomes an appliance and means furnished by the master by which the remaining work is to be prosecuted, and that, if the jury found that any portion of the tunnel was this completed, the employés of defendants were obligated to use ordinary care to render such completed portion a safe place in which to work, and to keep such completed portion in a condition reasonably safe, etc. And, in definition of the terms used, it is added by the court: "When I say 'completed,' I desire to be understood as saying, when substantially all the work of excavation is performed, in order to render the tunnel of the size and capacity provided for by the plans and specifications." This instruction was based upon the decision in Hanley v. California Co., 127 Cal. 232, 59 Pac. 577, 47 L. R. A. 597, and one of the points urged by the appellants is that "the tunnel at the point from where the rock fell was uncompleted," within the sense of the term used in the instruction, and in the case cited; but we are of the opinion that the excavation of the tunnel to the temporary grade was a substantial completion of that portion of the tunnel, within the meaning of the instruction and within the reason of the decision.

Another objection urged by the appellants was to the following instruction: "When a person is in imminent danger, he is not called upon to exercise that intelligence and judgment he would be expected to exercise were he not in danger. So, if a party in imminent danger has two ways open to him, but has not the time to stop and investigate, and determine which is the right or safe way, and which is the wrong or unsafe way, his choosing the latter is not, under the circumstances, negligence on his part. So, if you should find from the evidence in the case that McRae found himself in imminent danger, or had reasonable ground to believe that he was in such danger, and had not time to stop and consider and determine the better course to pursue, then you are instructed that his choosing to run out towards the portal, instead of back toward the bench, was not negligence on his part, even though in so doing he may have run right under the falling rock, instead of away from it." The objections urged to this instruction are that it should be qualified with the provisos that plaintiff acted in the emergency as any ordinarily prudent man would have been likely to act under the same circumstances, and that the dangerous situation was brought about by the plaintiff's negligence. But, with regard to the latter qualification, there was no evidence in the case tending to show that the plaintiff was brought into his dangerous position by any negligence of his own, and from the evidence and the verdict it must be assumed that the situation was the result of the negligence of the defendants; nor are we prepared to hold, in the absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, that it is a material question whether the dangerous situation of plaintiff was the result of defendants' negligence or otherwise. We are also of the opinion that the other qualification contended for by appellants is equally untenable. The principle expressed in the instruction is based upon the familiar and well-known fact that in circumstances of imminent danger the ordinarily prudent man commonly acts without prudence, and that it is only the exceptional man who can be relied upon, under such circumstances, to retain his presence of mind, or, in other words, the rule is based on an almost universal human infirmity.

It is objected, also, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, in that it affirmatively appears that the defendants were not guilty of negligence, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; but the question of negligence is commonly a question for the jury, and it is only in extreme cases (of which this is not one), that this court would be justified in disregarding the verdict. It may be added that the only claim of contributory negligence is that, when the imminence of the danger from the falling rock became apparent, the plaintiff like the other employés present, attempted to escape in the wrong direction.

The remaining point urged is that the court erred in excluding the testimony of Dr. Hitt as to a statement made to him by the plaintiff at the defendants' hospital, where he had been taken for treatment; and this is objected to on the two grounds: That there is nothing in the record to indicate that the witness was acting professionally, or with a view to treating plaintiff, or that the information was obtained with a view to treatment, and that the information was, in fact, not "necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." But the former point, we think, is obviously untenable. The witness was a physician and surgeon, and as such was in charge of the defendants' hospital, and his services were remunerated by assessments upon the wages of the men, so that he was, in effect, employed by the plaintiff. He examined the plaintiff as a physician, and the plaintiff knew that he was examining him as such, and the information sought was obtained from the plaintiff at the time he was examining him, or sometime during the day. The court below, we think, was right in holding that the communication was made to the witness in the course of professional employment.

As to the remaining objection: The question asked the witness was: "If Mr. McRae made any statement to you, explaining how the rock fell, and how it hit him," to which he answered: "He did." The witness was then asked: "Now, state whether he told you how the rock came down and from whence it came," and, the question being objected to, the witness testified that the statement referred to "had nothing to do with his [the plaintiff's] treatment, nor with the examination of him for the purpose of determining his physical injuries"; that "it had no relation whatever to his treatment"; that "it was customary in the hospital to get a record from the patients as to how these things occurred." The witness was then asked by the court: "Was it a part of the history of the case?" etc. To which he answered: "Why, I simply asked him how it occurred. 'How did you get this injury?' No matter if it is a scalp wound, or mashed finger, or whatever it may be, it is natural to inquire how it ocurred; and in connection with that he reported to me." The objection to the question was thereupon sustained, and the appellants excepted. The court was not informed as to the effect of the statement sought, otherwise than by the questions quoted above; and from these it cannot be very clearly determined what the statement would have been. If it was as indicated by the first question, the information sought was apparently of a character necessary to the proper treatment of the patient; but information as to the direction or point whence the rock came would seem to have been unnecessary for such purpose, and to this extent, if we have regard to the most obvious sense of the provision of the statute under consideration, the objection of the respondent would seem to have been well taken. But to give to the statute this narrow construction would equally exclude from its application many, if not most, of the answers to questions usually put, and properly and necessarily put, by competent physicians to patients in cases of this kind, in order to enable them to act for their patients. This, we think, would be to defeat the obvious purpose of the act, which, it is said, "is to facilitate and make safe, full, and confidential disclosure by patient to physician of all facts, circumstances, and symptoms, untrammeled by apprehension of their subsequent and enforced disclosure and publication on the witness stand, to the end that the physician may form a correct opinion, and be enabled safely and efficaciously to treat his patient." Will of Bruendl, 102 Wis. 47, 78 N. W. 169. Hence it is said in the case cited (which is also cited by the appellants): "The seal placed on the lips of the physician only relates to 'information necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician.' The tendency of all courts has been and should be toward liberal construction of these words to effectuate the purpose of the statute. Thus it has been held that the word 'necessary' should not be so restricted as to permit testimony of statements or information in good faith asked for or given to enable intelligent treatment, although it may appear that the physician might have diagnosed the disease and prescribed for it without certain of the information, so that it was not strictly necessary. Sloan v. N. Y. C. R. Co., 45 N. Y. 125; Grattan v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 80 N. Y. 281, 36 Am. Rep. 617; Renihan v. Dennin, 103 N. Y. 573, 9 N. E. 320, 57 Am. Rep. 770." In the case cited, under this liberal construction of the act, the testimony of physicians was admitted upon the ground that the examination of the patient was not made for the purpose of prescribing for her, the court saying: "We hold, therefore, that the information obtained by the physicians at the interview of September 18, 1896, was not necessary, and was not obtained for the purpose of enabling them to prescribe for the testatrix as physicians." Though the precise question has not been determined by the Supreme Court of this state, the same view seems to have been commonly taken. Thus, in the case of Freel v. Market St. Cable Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 46, 47, 31 Pac. 730, the testimony of a medical witness as to "information acquired by him * * * while visiting and prescribing for" plaintiff, was excluded. So, in Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 166, 47 Pac. 1019, the opinion of the physicians, "based upon facts ascertained by them during such medical attendance," was excluded; and so, in Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 187, 64 Pac. 294, there is a like ruling as to information of a physician "acquired by him from the decedent, and from observing him while he was in attendance upon him for the purpose of prescribing for him as his physician

We are therefore of the opinion that the view of the court below in this case was correct, and that the intention of the statute is to exclude all statements made by a patient to his physician while attending him in that capacity for the purpose of determining his condition; nor does this construction do violence to the language of the act liberally construed, which we think is to be understood as forbidding a physician to be examined "as to any information acquired in attending the patient, the acquisition of which was necessary (or which it was necessary for him to acquire) in order to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Of this necessity, from the nature of the case, the physician must commonly be regarded as the sole judge; for it would be obviously unreasonable to require of the patient the exercise of any judgment with reference to the propriety of the questions asked by his physician, except, possibly, in cases where the materiality of the question is obviously apparent.

We are of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—ACTION FOR RENT—ISSUES.

Where, in an action for rent, the answer admitted the execution of the lease, but averred that plaintiff, as agent for T., the owner of the premises, executed the lease for her and in her behalf, denied that plaintiff was the owner, and alleged that the rent had been paid to T. until she sold the premises to defendant's wife, whether the lease was made by plaintiff in his own behalf or as agent for T. was within the issues.

2. SAME—PAROL EVIDENCE—LANDLORD'S TITLE—DISPUTE.

Where, in an action for rent, defendant claimed that the lease was executed by plaintiff as agent for T., and that the rent had been paid to her, the lease of T. formerly made, her receipt for the rent, and a deed made by her to defendant's wife, together with the contract between plaintiff and T., were admissible, as tending to establish plaintiff's alleged agency, T.'s authority to create the same, and plaintiff's exercise thereof, and was not objectionable as constituting an attempt on the part of a tenant to dispute the landlord's title.

3. ESTOPPEL.

In an action by plaintiff to recover rent on a written lease, the contract between plaintiff and T., with reference to a sale of the property, containing a general authority to plaintiff to lease and assign the same and to cause all the rents to be paid to T., and plaintiff's act in representing himself as agent only, having the rents paid to T., his concealment of his own interest in the premises, and his declaration that he was executing the lease for T., estopped him to deny that he executed the lease in his own behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Estoppel, §§ 189, 190; vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Agent, § 43.]

4. SAME.

Where the owner of certain property authorized plaintiff to lease the same, and such owner received rent therefor, she was estopped to deny the execution of the lease on her own behalf.

A. B. McCutchen and Ward Chapman, for appellant. J. Wiseman McDonald, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. This action to recover rent was originally commenced in a justice's court and certified to the superior court, upon a verified answer being filed showing that questions of title and possession to real property were involved. Judgment in superior court went for defendant. This appeal is from an order denying a new trial, and is based upon a statement.

Plaintiff's action was upon a written lease alleged to have been entered into between plaintiff and defendant. The answer admits the execution of a lease as set out in the complaint, but avers that as agent of Mrs. Tarr, the owner of the premises, plaintiff executed said lease for her and in her behalf, and denies that plaintiff was ever the owner of the premises, and alleges, further, that the rent had been paid to the said Mrs. Tarr up until the date when said owner sold said premises to the wife of defendant. The finding of the court that the lease was made between the defendant and Mrs. Tarr was within the issues, and ample evidence appears in the statement to support such finding. It is insisted, however, that this evidence was improperly admitted, and that it was in furtherance of an attempt of a tenant to dispute a landlord's title. We do not so understand the object of such proof. The lease of Mrs. Tarr formerly made, her receipt for the rent, the deed to Mrs. Gonzales, the contract between plaintiff and Mrs. Tarr, each and all were competent as tending to establish the alleged agency, the authority of Mrs. Tarr to create the same, and its exercise by plaintiff. While as a general rule those only are bound by a written contract who sign it, and others cannot be held whose names do not appear therein, yet an exception to this rule exists, when evidence is admitted to show that it also binds another who has authorized its signing, because the act of the agent in signing an agreement in pursuance of the authority is in law the act of the principal. Estrella Vineyard Co. v. Butler, 125 Cal. 238, 57 Pac. 980. The contract between plaintiff and Mrs. Tarr in reference to the sale contains a general authority to plaintiff to lease and assign same, and to cause all rents to be paid to Mrs. Tarr. The act of plaintiff in representing himself as agent only, having the rental paid to Mrs. Tarr, his concealment of his own interest in the premises, and declaring that he was executing the same for Mrs. Tarr, certainly ought to estop him from denying that the contract was that of Mrs. Tarr, and that his intention in its execution was to bind her. Her authority for him to lease and the receipt of the rent should estop her to deny an execution in her behalf, were she even seeking to avoid the same, which she is not. Plaintiff had no interest in the property at the date of the sale to Mrs. Gonzales, and seeks to establish none, had no authority at any time to receive the rents, and nothing appears in the record indicating any right of the plaintiff to maintain an action for any part of the claim sued upon.

We find no error in the record, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

1. NOTES—EXTENSION OF TIME—INTEREST IN ADVANCE.

The acceptance of interest in advance on a note, while prima facie evidence of a contract to forbear and delay the time of payment, is not conclusive, and, unless it was agreed that such payment should have such effect, it does not suspend the holder's right of action on the note.

2. APPEAL — EVIDENCE — ORDER OF PROOF— HARMLESS ERROR.

Error in the exclusion of evidence on the examination of a witness in chief was cured by the admission thereof on cross-examination.

3. NOTES—EVIDENCE.

Where defendant claimed that the note sued on was a part of the indebtedness of a corporation which plaintiff had agreed to assume, and plaintiff admitted an agreement to pay $7,800 of such indebtedness, it was error for the court to exclude evidence with reference to the character, payment, and consideration of certain other notes, for the purpose of determining whether or not the note sued on was included within the obligations assumed.

4. ESTOPPEL.

Where several months elapsed after the execution of a note sued on by one of the signers before it was signed by B., and before he signed the same, and as an inducement to procure his signature, plaintiff represented that the note evidenced a firm indebtedness, on which B. relied, plaintiff, having assumed all the obligations of the firm, was estopped as against B. to deny that the note was a part of the liability so assumed.

Action by M. Y. Kellam against A. W. Brode and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeal August 18, 1905; by Supreme Court September 14, 1905.

ALLEN, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment and order denying a new trial. The complaint was filed March 19, 1902, declaring upon a promissory note, payable to plaintiff and signed by defendants, dated June 15, 1899, due in one year, for $1200, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. Upon the note appeared the following indorsements: "Six months Int.

paid on within note; $42.00. M. Y. Kellam." "March 19, 1900. Paid two hundred dollars on within note. M. Y. Kellam." "March 19, 1900. Int. paid in advance, $140.00; amount for two years from date. M. Y. Kellam." In an amended complaint it is alleged that the last indorsement was entered through mistake, which defendants knew or suspected at the time; that the payment of interest was only up to December 15, 1901, and not later—and a reformation of the indorsement to that effect was asked. The answer denies any mistake, and alleges that on March 19, 1900, in consideration of the payment of $200, and the sum of $140 advanced as interest, plaintiff agreed to extend the time of payment two years from and after March 19, 1900. By way of further answer, the defendants allege that the note sued on was given in consideration of a debt of the Electric Supply & Fixture Company, a corporation, of which plaintiff had notice; that on the 19th of March, 1900, the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, assumed and agreed to pay all the indebtedness of said Electric Supply & Fixture Company, including the note. The court found such indorsement of March 19, 1900, was not improperly indorsed by mistake, that the same does truly express the intention of said party, and that the interest was paid in advance to March 19, 1902. The court further finds that there was no agreement to any extension of time for the payment of said note, and the same was not then and never has been extended. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against defendants for $1000, with interest from December 15, 1901.

Appellants' first point discussed is that the action was prematurely brought; that the receipt of interest to March 19, 1902, amounted to an agreement to extend the time of payment to that date; and, that being established, the defendants had the whole of that day within which to pay the note, and were not in default when the action was commenced. The trial court, however, has found, and there was some testimony upon which such findings are supported, that while the interest was actually received and paid in advance to March 19th, there was no agreement to extend time of payment on account thereof. The general rule is "that the reception of interest in advance upon a note is prima facie evidence of a binding contract to forbear and delay the time of payment." Shelly v. Bristol Sav. Bank (Conn.) 26 Atl. 474, 19 L. R. A. 599, 38 Am. St. Rep. 340. "The inference is irresistible that, where a creditor receives interest in advance, there is a contract to extend the time of payment during the period for which interest is paid." Woodburn v. Carter, 50 Ind. 376. In these and many other decisions the inference to be derived is declared, while in others a prima facie case is said to be established by the proof of such facts. But such inferences and prima facie evidence may be overcome by proof that the facts are otherwise. It is entirely competent for parties to actually pay and receive money by way of interest in advance, upon an understanding that it should not affect the right to sue upon the original promise. This, in effect, is what the court below found, when it found that, notwithstanding the payment, there was no agreement to extend time. These findings were in line with plaintiff's testimony that the credit of $200 was a gift, and that "when I struck off the $200 I gave him that, and he suggested then that he would pay me two years' interest in advance, and I said, 'all right,' and set it down on the note that way." The court appears to have accepted plaintiff's testimony as to the incidents of the transaction, and to have determined that the consideration of the payment of interest in advance was based upon the gift of $200, and not a consideration for a new contract extending time of payment. In Hellier v. Russell, 136 Cal. 144, 68 Pac. 581, the principle is determined that the mere payment of interest in advance, pursuant to a stipulation in the original obligation so to do, is not even prima facie evidence of an intent to create a new contract.

It is further insisted by appellants that the court erred in excluding testimony of A. W. Brode, tending to show that the note set out in the complaint was given on account of the indebtedness of the Electric Supply & Fixture Company, which testimony was in support of the allegation of the answer. This was error; but it was cured by the admission of the same testimony upon cross-examination of the witness, and we are unable to see any prejudice resulting from its exclusion in the examination in chief. Error is claimed by reason of the refusal of the court to admit testimony with reference to the character, payment, and consideration of certain other notes presented to the witness, A. W. Brode. It was certainly material, in determining whether or not the note sued on was an obligation assumed by the plaintiff, to receive and consider evidence as to what notes or indebtedness were in fact paid under such assumption, and in discharge of what plaintiff admits was an agreement to pay about $7,800. While some of the notes about which inquiry was sought were admitted to be individual obligations of the makers, yet they formed a part of the notes claimed by plaintiff to have been paid pursuant to the assumption of the firm indebtedness. We are unable to see how the court could determine the vital question in this case, which was with reference to the assumption by plaintiff of the note in suit, without going into an inquiry as to what was actually paid, and the character of the notes so paid, together with the amount. The refusal of the court to admit the evidence with relation to these notes was error, nor was it cured by subsequent statements in relation thereto.

It is insisted, further, by appellants that the finding of the trial court that the note set out in the complaint was not the indebtedness of the Electric Supply & Fixture Company is unsupported by the evidence. This is true, in so far as defendant L. D. Brode is concerned. While the answer admitted the execution of the note at its apparent date, the testimony, without contradiction, shows that more than two months elapsed after its execution by A. W. Brode before it was signed by L. D. Brode; and, further, the uncontradicted testimony is that when it was signed by L. D. Brode, and as an inducement to procure his signature thereto, plaintiff represented that the note did represent a debt of the Electric Supply & Fixture Company, of which firm defendant was to become a member, and that such representations were believed and were the sole consideration for its execution by L. D. Brode. This being true, as between plaintiff and defendant L. D. Brode, the note became a firm obligation. Plaintiff having asserted that it was a firm debt, and defendant having acted upon his belief in the truth thereof, plaintiff is estopped to deny that it was and is a firm debt; and having, for a good consideration, assumed in his contract with L. D. Brode to pay all obligations of the Electric Supply & Fixture Company, this note became a part of the liability so assumed, and defendant L. D. Brode ceased to be bound thereby.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ADAMS v. THORNTON.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—CROPPING CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

Where plaintiff, the owner of certain orchards, contracted to let defendant a house and furnish implements, horses, wagons, feed, spraying materials, boxes, and trays for curing and marketing the fruit, furnish new trees to replace missing ones, pay for one-half of boxing materials when shipped, and, when dried, to pay for the expenses of cutting, drying, and sacking his share, and in consideration of defendant's labor in raising, harvesting, shipping, and marketing the fruit, the latter was to have one-half of the crop, the contract was a mere cropping contract, and not a lease, and plaintiff and defendant were therefore tenants in common of the crop.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, §§ 1349, 1355.]

2. SAME—POSSESSION.

Where plaintiff and defendant were tenants in common of a crop raised by defendant under a cropping contract, plaintiff was not entitled to maintain replevin against defendant for a portion of the crop alleged to have been wrongfully taken from plaintiff's premises.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Louttit & Middlecoff, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and J. M. C. Murphy, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. The complaint in this action was claim and delivery. The defendant set up by way of answer a contract, and alleged that under it he and plaintiff were copartners in carrying on the business of fruit growing and dividing the profits between them, and asked for a dissolution and an accounting. Judgment was for the plaintiff and for the return to him of all the property mentioned in his complaint, and for $4, damage and costs. Numerous errors are alleged in the bill of exceptions in the ruling of the trial court in the introduction of evidence, but in the briefs of counsel before us these matters are not touched upon at all, and only two points are presented for our consideration, viz.: (1) Were the plaintiff and defendant co-tenants in the fruit in controversy? and (2) if co-tenants, could the plaintiff maintain replevin against the defendant for the common chattels?

For the better understanding of the matter it is necessary to set out the contract under which the parties were operating, or, at least, so much of it as will assist in determining the questions involved, and it is as follows:

"New Hope, Cal., Nov. 1, 1899.

"This indenture, made this 1st day of November, 1899, between Arthur Thornton, of New Hope, county of San Joaquin, and state of California, as party of the first part, and W. H. Adams, as party of the second part, witnesseth: That the said Arthur Thornton, party of the first part, for and in consideration of the covenants hereinafter stated, hath let, and by these presents doth grant, demise, and let, unto the said party of the second part, W. H. Adams, all that parcel or parcels of orchard lands situated in the county of San Joaquin, near New Hope, and described as follows: [Then follows the description of a 50-acre orchard and a 10-acre orchard]—for the term of one year from above date. The said party of the first part does agree with the party of the second part that he will let him a house, that he will furnish implements, horses, wagons, feed, also spraying materials, also boxes and trays necessary for the curing and marketing of the fruit. The party of the second part does agree with the party of the first part that he will in due season prune the trees of said orchard in a workmanlike manner; that he will remove all brush and replant all trees needed to fill vacancies (said Thornton to furnish trees); that he will thoroughly spray said trees and plow and cultivate said lands; that he will properly thin fruit, will pick and deliver to railroad or steamer landing when shipping to cannery, and share and share alike, or, if for Eastern market, will pack all fruit for shipment, furnishing crates or boxes for same, the said party of the first part to pay for one-half of boxing materials and packing, and share and share alike, or, if dried, the party of the second part agrees to cure the fruit properly and to deliver one-half of the dried fruit to the party of the first part, the said party of the first part to pay for the expense of cutting, drying and sacks for his share of the fruit." Signed by both parties.

This contract was continued in force to November 1, 1902. A settlement had been made for the crop of each year up to November, 1902. There remained on hand of the crop of 1902 373½ sacks of dried apricots, which were in the possession of the plaintiff. On October 9, 1902, during the absence of plaintiff, the defendant came and carried said dried apricots away, and the plaintiff now seeks by his suit to have them returned to him. While the agreement set out and under which the parties were operating is called therein a lease, yet under the authority of Bernal v. Hovius, 17 Cal. 542, 79 Am. Dec. 149, it must be deemed only a cropping contract, and the parties are co-tenants in the fruits raised during the time of the contract, and each has an equal right with the other to the possession of the whole of said fruit, and, under the general rule, neither can maintain a suit against the other for the possession of the fruit. In Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal., at page 62, the court says: "It is the general rule that, where a term is created, the possession given to the occupant, and the produce agreed to be paid is to be paid as rent, then the instrument is to be regarded as a lease. It is also a general rule that, where the occupant covenants to deliver to the owner a portion of the crops, the agreement is held to be a cropping contract—a letting upon shares—and the owner and occupant are tenants in common of the crop."

Plaintiff relies upon Clark v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 596, 54 Pac. 74, as furnishing a different doctrine. In that case Justice Garoutte, who wrote the opinion, says: "The parties entered into contracts whereby one Cobb agreed to farm and cultivate certain lands to grapes and grain for a term of ten years. * * * It was provided therein that the lands were demised and let to said Cobb, he agreeing to give annually for the use thereof a certain portion of the crops of grain and other products grown thereon." There was a mortgage on the land, which was foreclosed, and the land sold while Cobb's contracts were in force. The justice continues: "Crops of various kinds were cultivated upon these lands by Cobb under his contracts during the cropping season of 1895–96; and subsequent to the aforesaid sales of the land, and during the period of time allowed by law for redemption, these crops were gathered and harvested by Cobb. As provided in his contract, he set aside the portion thereof to be given for the use of the land." The question in that case was as to whether the purchaser or redemptioner was entitled to these rents. Justice Garoutte further says: "That these contracts were leases, that the conventional relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and that the grains and fruits to be delivered to the landlord when gathered and harvested were rent, we are entirely satisfied. * * * The authorities of this state recognize that such conditions may exist," such as cropping contract and co-tenancy in the crops raised. "When it is established that a certain contract is a lease, and that the relation of landlord and tenant exists between the parties, there must be some appropriate words in the contract to indicate that the crops raised on the lands are to be held in co-tenancy, or such will not be the conclusion reached. If there is nothing in the language to indicate that intention, then the products to be delivered to the landlord after harvest, by the tenant, will be deemed the property of the tenant until that time, and treated as rent to be then paid."

The contract in this case is vastly different from a contract where the landlord is to furnish the land and do nothing more but receive a stipulated part of the crop as rent, as was the case in Clark v. Cobb. In the case at bar, Arthur Thornton agrees that he will let Adams a house, that he will furnish implements, horses, wagons, feed, also spraying materials, also boxes and trays for the curing and marketing of the fruit, furnish new trees to replace missing ones, also to pay for one-half of boxing materials when shipping, and, when fruit is to be dried, to pay for the expense of cutting, drying, and sacks for his share. His labor, and his capital, other than the land, went into the crops in raising, harvesting, shipping, and marketing. It seems to me they could not have made a clearer cropping contract, even though they had used the words, "We hereby enter into a cropping contract." It appears very plainly what the intention of the parties was. Thornton put up his land, his materials, his feed, his horses, and furnishings against the labor and skill of Adams, and they were to "share and share alike." Fruit was shipped in boxes, marked "Thornton & Adams." I presume, when the fruit was shipped to the Eastern market, they stood "share and share alike" on losses, which sometimes do happen. Under the view taken by us the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

OGLE et al. v. HUBBEL.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—DEFENSES—FRAUD.

In unlawful detainer, defendant may show that the lease, while not originally fraudulent, is held by plaintiffs by virtue of a fraudulent and fictitious deed from the original lessor, executed solely to deprive defendant of his rights under the lease.

2. APPEAL—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES—DECISION OF LOWER COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The discretion of the trial court in accepting or rejecting the statements of witnesses cannot be interfered with on appeal.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—DEFENSES—FRAUD.

In unlawful detainer, evidence held sufficient to support findings that the transaction by which the original lessor conveyed the premises to plaintiffs was fictitious and collusive in character, and was concocted solely to deprive defendant of his rights under the lease.

4. SAME—OPTION TO PURCHASE—RIGHTS OF LESSEE.

Where a lease provided that the lessor might sell the premises, either subject to the terms of the lease or thereby terminating the same, but further provided that the lessee should have the preference as purchaser in case of sale, the lessee could only be deprived of his rights under the lease by a bona fide sale. He could not be ousted on refusal to pay the lessor a sum fictitiously or fraudulently named as offered by another person for the premises, nor could his rights be affected by a gift by the lessor to her son.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, §§ 290-295.]

5. SAME—CONVEYANCE BY LESSOR—PREJUDICE TO LESSEE.

A fictitious and fraudulent sale by a lessor in a lease, which gave the lessee a preference right to purchase in case of sale, was prejudicial to the lessee, in that it deprived him of his privilege of purchase.

6. SAME—PREFERENCE IN PURCHASE—AVAILABILITY TO LESSEE.

The fact that a lease giving the lessee a preference right to purchase in case of sale does not constitute an enforceable contract for the sale of the premises in favor of the lessee does not effect the lessee's right to rely thereon to defeat a fictitious conveyance, executed solely to fraudulently deprive him of his rights under the lease.

7. SAME—FINDINGS—PROPRIETY.

In unlawful detainer, where it appeared and was found that the conveyance to plaintiffs by the original lessor was executed for the sole purpose of fraudulently depriving the defendant of his rights under the lease, the court was justified in further finding that plaintiffs were not damaged.

8. SAME.

Nor was it necessary, under the circumstances, to find that defendant refused to pay rent to plaintiff.

9. SAME—CONTRADICTION IN FINDINGS.

Nor, under the circumstances, were the findings contradictory, in that the court found that the property was conveyed to plaintiffs by the original lessor, and further found that plaintiffs had no title.

10. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In unlawful detainer, where the defense was that the conveyance of the demised premises to plaintiffs by the original lessor was collusive and fictitious, and was intended merely to defraud defendant of his preference right to purchase, it was competent for defendant to show his ability and willingness to purchase the property at its fair market value.

11. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Further evidence that defendant had offered to pay rent to the original lessor, who was not a party, and that she had refused to accept it, was, while perhaps unnecessary, harmless.

12. LANDLORD AND TENANT—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

Evidence of plaintiff's financial irresponsibility was also competent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. O. Minor, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by H. W. Ogle and another against John Hubbel. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeal August 22, 1905; by Supreme Court September 23, 1905, Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

CHIPMAN, P. J. One Barbara Hubbel, mother of C. F. Hubbel, was the owner of the demised premises, and on October 18, 1899, leased the same to the defendant. The lease was for five years, with right of renewal for five years, the term to commence on the day of its execution; the rental being $25 per month, payable monthly in advance on the 1st day of each month. It was further provided that the lessor "may sell said premises during the continuance of this lease, either subject to the terms hereof or that such sale may terminate and determine this lease within one year after notice of said sale; but it is understood that said party of the second part [lessee] may always have the preference as purchaser in case of sale." Defendant entered under the lease, and paid rent agreeably thereto, until and including the month of April, 1902. On April 29, 1902, Barbara Hubbel executed a conveyance of the premises to plaintiffs by bargain and sale deed, which was duly recorded April 30, 1902, and on that day they served written notice on defendant that they had purchased the premises and that they "wish to obtain possession of said premises as soon as they can be vacated by you." On May 22, 1902, plaintiffs served upon defendant written notice requiring him to pay rent to them, being $25, for the month of May, 1902, "or deliver to us the possession of all of said premises in three days from the time of service upon you of this notice." Defendant failing to pay rent, plaintiffs filed their verified complaint June 13, 1902, alleging, among other things, that they had purchased the property and were now the owners thereof. Defendant answered, admitting the execution of the lease and his possession under it. He also admitted the execution of an instrument by said Barbara Hubbel purporting to convey said premises, but alleged "that said purported deed was made to defraud defendant of his legal rights under and by virtue of said written lease, * * * denies that the plaintiffs are the owners of the lots described in the complaint," denies that he has refused or neglected to pay the rent required by said lease, alleges that he has offered to pay the rent to his lessor, Barbara Hubbel, and to plaintiffs, but that plaintiffs have refused such payment, and also alleges willingness and ability "to pay said rent to the persons whom the court may determine to be the proper persons to receive said rent, and here with the filing of this answer deposits the money in court." By way of an equitable defense to said action and as a cross-complaint defendant alleges the execution of the lease and his performance of all the conditions thereof on his part to be performed; that his lessor, "in order to oust defendant from said premises, fraudulently and without consideration transferred said property to * * * plaintiffs herein on or about the 29th day of April, 1902"; that plaintiffs took said deed with full knowledge of defendant's rights under said lease, and his right to purchase said property, and well knew that said deed was made "to oust defendant from said premises"; that defendant "has always been able, willing, and anxious to buy said property from said Barbara Hubbel"; "that she has refused to place a cash price upon said premises, so that defendant could purchase the same, and she still refuses and neglects to do the same."

There was no demurrer to the answer or cross-complaint, and the trial proceeded, the court sitting as a jury. The court found that the lease was executed as above stated; that defendant entered into possession, and has ever since been in possession, under it; that he has never refused to pay rent to said Barbara Hubbel; that she refused to accept rent after April 29, 1902, and that ever since that time defendant has been able, ready, and willing to pay said rent to said Barbara Hubbel, "and has proffered the same to her, but she has refused to accept the same or any part thereof;" that on April 29, 1902, she "by an instrument in writing conveyed said premises to plaintiffs herein"; that prior thereto she had notified defendant "that she intended to sell the same, and the terms of such sale," but refused to place a cash value upon the property upon defendant's request, and so notified him; "that said Barbara Hubbel, for the purpose of ousting defendant from said premises and to avoid the terms of said lease, conveyed said premises to plaintiffs; that plaintiffs at the time of said sale were in collusion with said Barbara Hubbel to defraud defendant of all rights under said lease, and to oust defendant from said premises, and to terminate said lease;" that defendant has performed all the conditions of said lease by him to be performed, and he always has been willing and able to buy said property, but said Barbara Hubbel refused to place a price upon the same; that, when plaintiffs received said deed, "they had actual notice of defendant's equity and interest in the land"; that plaintiffs have not been damaged. As conclusions of law the court found that plaintiffs are not the owners of the demised premises, that they are not entitled to rents, that defendant is rightfully in possession, that he has not broken the terms of the lease, and that neither of plaintiffs has any right, title, or interest in the premises. Judgment passed against plaintiffs, and each of them, "that all adverse claims of the plaintiffs, and each of them, to said premises or any part thereof, are invalid and groundless; that defendant be, and he is, hereby declared and adjudged to be entitled to the lawful and peaceful possession of said premises and every part thereof." From this judgment, and the order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, they appeal.

Plaintiffs claim that their title was not an issue and could not be tried in this form of action, and that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision, for the reason that there is no evidence that defendant either paid or offered to pay any rent to plaintiffs after April 29, 1902, the date of their alleged purchase of the premises. Defendant does not deny that he paid no rent to plaintiffs. He not only refused to attorn to plaintiffs, but denied their right to demand or receive rent, and denied their alleged ownership of the pemises demised. His contention was and is that the conveyance to plaintiffs by his lessor was fictitious and fraudulent, and therefore void, and was made for the express purpose of depriving him of his lease and of his right to purchase the property. The court found for the defendant upon these issues, and, if defendant had the right in this action to make this defense, and did in fact support it by sufficient evidence, it was not essential to defendant's recovery that he should show an offer to pay or a payment of rent to plaintiffs. The correctness of the decision rests mainly upon the right solution of the questions thus raised. We think that the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state show that the rule contended for by appellants is not applicable, where fraud is shown to have entered into the procurement of the lease, but that, under such circumstances, the tenant may dispute the title of his landlord.

In Mason v. Wolff, 40 Cal. 246, it was said that "the consequences of entering into the contract can only be avoided by showing some fraud or mistake which would have been sufficient to set aside the lease itself." In Johnson v. Chely, 43 Cal. 299, the action was unlawful detainer under the act of 1863 (St. 1863, p. 652, c. 411), to recover premises from a tenant holding over after demand of rent due and failure to pay for the space of three days. Defendant, among other defenses, alleged that the lease sued upon was procured through fraud. The trial court refused to permit defendant to prove that he was already in posession of the premises when he agreed to become the tenant of the plaintiffs, and that they induced him to assume the relation of tenant to them by their fraudulent misrepresentations that they were the owners of the premises. After showing that in ejectment the defendant is permitted to show fraud, and is not estopped to dispute his landlord's title where he did not enter under the lease, and that the landlord cannot throw him out by mere force of such a lease, the court said: "That the same result must follow so far as the defendant is concerned in an action of unlawful detainer, in which a lease, relied upon to establish the relation of landlord and tenant, is shown to have been obtained under such circumstances as would not have estopped the tenant from disputing the title of the landlord in a court in which the title could be tried."

In Knowles v. Murphy, 107 Cal. 107, 40 Pac. 111, one of the issues presented by the defendants was that they were induced to enter into the lease by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations. This defense seems to have been recognized as properly made, and failed only because of insufficient evidence to support it. In the case of Davis v. Schweikert, 130 Cal. 143, 62 Pac. 411, the lease provided that the lessee would surrender possession "in case the said party of the first part should sell the property herein described at any time during the term of the lease." The tenant's lessor made a conveyance of the premises to defendant, who represented to plaintiff (the tenant) that she had purchased and paid for the property, and, relying on the truthfulness of these representations, plaintiff surrendered possession. He afterwards learned that the sale was fictitious and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of regaining possession from him. He brought the action for damages, and recovered. The court, in affirming the judgment, said: "The lease conveyed to plaintiff the premises for the term of five years, subject to the condition, expressly written in the lease, that it should terminate upon the property being sold by the lessor. The covenant must be understood as meaning an actual bona fide sale, and not a fraudulent one. It was not contemplated—or, at least, the law does not contemplate—that the lessor could, by a pretended fraudulent sale, made for the very purpose of defeating his lessee of his estate, avoid the lease, and then take advantage of his own wrong." We cannot doubt that, had the action been unlawful detainer to dispossess the tenant under pretense of sale, he could have successfully defeated it by showing the sale to have been fraudulent and for the purpose of ousting him.

In the case of Newman Co. v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 174, 74 Pac. 761 the action was unlawful detainer. Defendant conveyed the property to plaintiffs, and subsequently gave plaintiffs a note for $936, in consideration of which plaintiff agreed that defendant might remain in possession one year. To plaintiff's complaint defendant answered that the deed was executed and the agreement for possession was made through the false and fraudulent representations of plaintiff. At the trial defendant had the verdict, and the trial court, on plaintiff's motion, granted a new trial. In the course of the opinion on appeal, the court said: "Respondent contends, as we understand the brief of counsel, that defendant is estopped to deny his landlord's title, under the general rule that a lessee cannot, in an action involving possession or right of possession, question the title of his landlord; that defendant must first go into the equity court and have the deed set aside, if made through fraud or undue influence. While desiring to avoid the discussion of questions that may not hereafter arise, it is proper, perhaps, to say that, in our opinion, the defendant may show, as part of the transaction leading up to the lease, and as evidence bearing upon the question of fraud and undue influence in the execution of the lease, that the deed as well as the lease, was so executed, and to show the relation of each to the other as one transaction. Defendant is not seeking rescission, nor is he asking to have the deed set aside as void. He is simply defending against plaintiff's action on the ground of fraud and undue influence, and asks no affirmative relief. We think he may do this without rescinding. [Citing cases.] The answer is intended to set forth what in Toby v. Oregon R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 550, is termed 'defensive relief, whereby fraud is set up by way of defense to defeat an action brought to enforce an apparent liability.'"

In the case now here the lease was not originally procured by fraud, but the effect of the findings is that plaintiffs now hold it in fraud of defendant's rights, through the acts of defendant's lessor and her grantees, and that they are seeking to enforce it to his detriment. So far as plaintiffs are concerned, the lease in their hands is found to be tainted with fraud, because the deed, by force of which alone the plaintiffs claim under the lease, was fraudulent and void. That evidence was admissible to establish the facts found, we entertain no doubt, in view of the principles enunciated in the foregoing cases. The remaining question, then, is, was the evidence sufficient to justify the findings?

Mrs. Hubbel, on February 14, 1902, wrote defendant, informing him that she had an opportunity to sell the premises for $1,900 cash and $4,500 payable in four years, with interest at 8 per cent. compounded yearly, and secured by mortgage on the land, and, unless she received from him the above or a better offer before March 1, 1902, she would accept the offer above mentioned, and sell the property upon the said terms. On February 26, 1902, defendant replied: "I have reason to know that said pretended sale is for the sole purpose of ousting me from said property.'

He stated, further: "If you intend to make a bona fide sale of the leased premises, kindly state the amount you will take in cash upon the delivery of the deed to me." And he also added: "By the terms and agreements and covenants of your lease to me, a cash and real value must be placed upon the premises and bona fide purchaser." To this letter Mrs. Hubbel replied March 3, 1902, informing defendant that he was not entitled to any better or different terms than those upon which she could dispose of the property to other parties, and added: "Of course, I understand from your letter that you are not desiring to purchase the property in good faith, and so it will receive no further attention from me, and I will proceed to complete the sale already agreed upon." Without further notice to defendant, she executed the deed to plaintiffs above mentioned. Plaintiff Ogle testified that for his half interest he paid $1,000 in cash and delivered his note, secured by mortgage on the premises, for $2,250, payable four years after date, at 8 per cent. interest. Plaintiff Hubbel testified that he gave his note to Mrs. Hubbel for $2,250, payable one year after date at 8 per cent. interest, without security. He testified that at various times in previous years he had deposited with his mother $400, which she allowed as a payment on the purchase, and that she made him a present of $500, and that he had paid about $100 on the note since the transaction. These items aggregate $6,500. The undisputed evidence was that the market value of the premises was not to exceed $3,000, some witnesses placing it at $2,500; that defendant was able and willing to purchase the property at its reasonable or market value; that plaintiff Hubbel was without means, and that his expectations to meet his note were that he would earn the money or obtain renewal of the note. Mrs. Hubbel did not testify, and the court had only the testimony of plaintiff Hubbel as to what he paid for his interest in the property. Some facts were brought out from which the court was no doubt led to discredit the testimony of plaintiff Hubbel, and which tended to show that the sale, if meant to be binding at all, was for about half the amount Mrs. Hubbel informed defendant she was offered for it. The trial court had the witnesses before it, and with its discretion in accepting or rejecting the statements of witnesses, under the circumstances disclosed, we cannot interfere. There was sufficient evidence to support the findings of the court as to the fictitious character of the transaction.

The contention of appellants that Mrs. Hubbel had the right to give away a half interest in the property to her son, if she wished to do so, is not consistent with respondent's rights under the lease. The lease contemplated a bona fide sale before defendant could be deprived of his rights under the lease. It may be that the lessor had the right to make a sale to some one willing to give more than the market value, and that defendant would be obliged to pay this sum, if he wished to purchase; but in any event the sale would have to be "an actual bona fide sale, and not a fraudulent one." Davis v. Schweikert, supra. It may also be that the lessor had the right to convey the property by gift to her son; but such a conveyance would not have terminated the lease, or have affected defendant's rights under it. He would still have the right of purchase in case of a sale during the life of the lease. But the court found that the conveyance here was a fraudulent one, and in effect found that the consideration to be paid by plaintiff Hubbel was pretended and fictitious, and was designed to so increase the price to defendant that he would not buy, while Mrs. Hubbel was at the same time receiving all the property was worth in the market. The undisputed fact, on plaintiff's own showing, was that she did not dispose of the property upon the terms she wrote defendant she was offered for it.

Plaintiffs contend that defendant's rights were not prejudiced by the conveyance, because he had the same remedies against them, as grantees, as he had against his lessor. This might be true, had defendant declined to purchase after notice of a bona fide offer of purchase by some other person. But he was deprived by this pretended sale of the important privilege to purchase which the lease gave him. He could not attorn to plaintiffs without recognizing the validity of their purchase and their right to terminate the lease and deprive him of the balance of his term.

Appellants further contend that the provisions of the lease were not such as to constitute a valid or enforceable contract for the sale of the leased land, because they were indefinite, uncertain, and incomplete. Under the terms of the lease, defendant could not compel his lessor to sell to him at any price. But this is not an action to specifically enforce the contract. Defendant does not seek affirmative relief. He seeks merely to prevent the perpetration of a fraud upon his rights. Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, supra. If, as was found by the court, the deed was made for the fraudulent purpose shown, the court was justified in finding that plaintiffs were not damaged. It was not necessary for the court to find that defendant refused to pay rent to plaintiffs, in view of its findings as to the fraudulent nature of the transaction.

Nor do we think the findings contradictory, in that the court found that the property was conveyed to plaintiffs by Mrs. Hubbel, and elsewhere that plaintiffs had no title. The findings plainly show that the court did not regard the conveyance as valid, though in fact executed. Under the issues it was competent for defendant to show ability and willingness to purchase the property at its fair market value. He was not bound to pay her a sum fictitiously or fraudulently named to him as offered by another person. It was not prejudicial error for defendant to show that he had offered to pay rent to his lessor and that she had refused to accept it. Under the circumstances of the case, and his lessor not being a party, it was, perhaps, unnecessary for him to show an offer to pay his lessor. If plaintiffs had shown themselves to have been bona fide owners of the property, an offer to pay rent to their grantor would have been no defense. This, however, was not the case, and the evidence was harmless.

It was not error to allow proof of plaintiff Hubbel's financial condition, as bearing upon the issues presented, and as tending to contradict his testimony.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GAY v. THORPE, Justice of the Peace.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 14, 1905.)

1. Depositions—Witnesses—Refusal to Attend—Contempt.

One who, as a witness, is summoned to attend and give his deposition in an action, is a person connected with a judicial proceeding before a court, and his refusal or failure to obey the subpœna is punishable as for a contempt; the taking of the deposition to be used on the trial of the cause being a proceeding in the case.

2. Same—Justices of the Peace—Jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of courts of equity having been given to the superior court by the Constitution, a justice of the peace before whom a witness' deposition was sought to be taken in a case pending in the superior court had no jurisdiction to punish the witness for contempt in refusing to appear and testify.

Application by John H. Gay for writ of prohibition against M. R. Thorpe, as justice of the peace, to restrain defendant from proceeding to punish petitioner for contempt in refusing to obey a subpœna issued by such justice. From an order denying the application, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

L. L. Boone and Oscar A. Trippett, for appellant. Valentine & Newby and Victor E. Shaw, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of San Diego county denying appellant's application for a writ of prohibition against respondent. The record discloses that on March 20, 1903, there was an action pending in said superior court, in which case notice was duly served upon the defendant, properly supported by affidavit, to take his deposition. This notice and affidavit were filed with respondent, as justice of the peace for said county, and he issued a subpœna requiring defendant to appear on a day specified and give his deposition. The defendant disobeyed such subpœna. Upon an affidavit being filed, a warrant of arrest was issued by the justice, directing the defendant to be brought into the presence of said justice to answer the charge of contempt. Appellant thereupon applied to the superior court of San Diego county for a writ of prohibition, commanding the respondent justice to appear before such court and show cause why he should not be restrained from further proceedings in said matter. Upon the hearing of this application, the same was denied. This was error.

The taking of a deposition is a part of the proceedings in the court for whose use the evidence is sought to be taken. One who is a witness summoned to attend and give his deposition in an action is certainly a person connected with a judicial proceeding before a court. His conduct in failing to attend in obedience to a subpœna is, therefore, a matter which can be controlled by the court; and, if so, the control can be made effective only by the existence of the power to punish the disobedience. Burns v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 11, 73 Pac. 597. The taking of a deposition to be used on the trial of the cause is a proceeding in the cause. Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 217, 73 Pac. 1006. The jurisdiction of courts of equity having been given to the superior court by the Constitution, it cannot be taken away by statute. Tulare v. Hevren, 126 Cal. 228, 58 Pac. 530; Burns v. Superior Court, supra. The same rule would seem to apply to the powers necessary to the exercise of this jurisdiction. Burns v. Superior Court, supra. The refusal of a witness in a proper case to attend and give his deposition before a notary is one of the contempts of court defined by section 1209, Code Civ. Proc. Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 215, 73 Pac. 1006. Every court of general jurisdiction has inherent power to punish for contempt persons who obstruct or interfere with its proceedings. Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 303, 9 Sup. Ct. 77, 32 L. Ed. 405. That one may not be put in jeopardy a second time for the same offense is a right guarantied by the Constitution. Were the statutes to be so construed as to give to a justice of the peace, acting for the superior court in the matter of taking depositions, power to punish for contempt the disobedience of a subpœna issued in such proceedings by the justice, it would be to say that the justice of the peace was given a power, the exercise of which would be to defeat and destroy the power reposing in the superior court in the first instance. We are of opinion that the statutes do not contemplate that the superior court should be shorn of any of its inherent power, and therefore no jurisdiction rests within the justice of the peace to punish for contempt the disobedience of the subpœna issued by respondent, and the writ should have been granted.

The order and judgment of the superior court denying the writ are reversed.

PERRIN v. CARBONE.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 11, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—RECORD—EVIDENCE — OBJECTIONS.

Where a question to which an objection was overruled did not appear from the record to have been answered, the objection could not be reviewed on appeal.

2. MONEY LENT—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

Where plaintiff sued to recover money loaned under an alleged agreement to repay the same absolutely, while defendant claimed that the loan was not to be repaid, except from commissions on insurance secured by him, evidence that plaintiff had employed at least a dozen insurance agents during the preceding five years, whose commissions had not covered the amount of loans made to them, but that he had not sued them, was relevant.

3. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Such evidence was admissible on plaintiff's cross-examination to discredit his testimony that the loan was payable absolutely, and not out of commissions, as claimed by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, §§ 936, 969.]

Action by Howard Perrin against Charles L. Carbone. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $320, money loaned. The answer denies the loan as plaintiff pleads it, and sets up the defense that the money was advanced to defendant by plaintiff, as the agent of the Washington Life Insurance Company of New York, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of defendant, who was acting as soliciting agent for said insurance company, and that such moneys were not to be repaid, except out of the commissions he (the defendant) should earn, when the same should be sufficient. The case was tried by a jury. There were but two witnesses, the plaintiff and the defendant, and the verdict was for the defendant, and judgment was rendered accordingly for defendant for his costs, amounting to $39.65. A motion was made for a new trial, and denied. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The evidence shows no difference between the parties as to the amount of money advanced or the date when loaned, but there is a marked and substantial difference as to the repayment of the $320; plaintiff saying it was to be repaid without any condition, and the defendant that it was to be repaid only in case he should make it in the way of commissions in selling insurance for the company. With this very substantial conflict in the evidence, the judgment could not be disturbed, unless there was some reversible error committed at the trial. Several errors are complained of in the bill of exceptions, but only two seem to have been taken as at all serious, for appellant has mentioned but these two in his argument. The first alleged error our attention is called to is the ruling of the lower court in overruling appellant's objection to the question asked Perrin on cross-examination, which is as follows: "Why did you make an exception in Charlie Carbone's case?" The court overruled the objection, and the record fails to show that the witness answered it at all, unless the answer can be found in the answer to some other question to which there was no objection interposed. The question not having been answered, there was no prejudicial error. People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 625–635.

The next point to which our attention is called is the alleged error of the trial court in overruling plaintiff's objection to the following question, asked by defendant of the witness Perrin on cross-examination: "How many agents have you employed during the last five years that have received loans from you whose commissions have not covered the amount of loans, and whom you have not sued and brought an action against?" Objection was made on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and not cross-examination, and had nothing to do with the case at issue. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "At least a dozen." We think there was a relevancy. The plaintiff claims there was no condition attached to the loan. If the plaintiff had advanced money to 12 other agents whose commissions had not amounted to enough to repay the loans, and no effort was made to collect the money so advanced, this fact would tend, in some small way, at least, to discredit plaintiff's theory that he loaned the money to defendant to be repaid irrespective of commissions earned. And, then, it is cross-examination, because plaintiff bases his right to recover upon the theory that the money advanced was a loan without any conditions as to payment, and, while he does not specifically so state on his direct examination, yet every intendment of his testimony is to that effect; and everything which will tend to rebut the fact testified to by a party to an action, or dispute an inference that may be drawn from his direct testimony, is admissible on cross-examination. It must be borne in mind that Perrin was the plaintiff, and claiming to recover on a contract, on a theory disputed by the defendant; and surely the plaintiff in a case like this would come under the general rule that a witness may be asked on his cross-examination any question which tends to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility. There was no error in this ruling.

Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HUMPHREY v. POPE.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. Appeal — Questions Reviewable — Matters not Discussed.

An appellate court will notice only such assignments of error as are discussed in appellant's briefs, and will not prosecute an independent inquiry to find out reasons for or against the correctness of the lower court's rulings.

2. Same—Conclusiveness of Verdict.

A verdict sustained by evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Husband and Wife—Alienation of Affections—Instructions.

In an action for the alienation of a husband's affections, a charge for plaintiff, hypothesized on "any act of another woman" by which a wife is deprived of her marital rights, was not misleading, where other instructions reiterated the proposition that plaintiff could not recover, unless defendant willfully, etc., alienated and destroyed the affection of plaintiff's husband for plaintiff, and maliciously caused the separation between them.

4. Trial—Instructions—Burden of Proof.

The omission of the word "preponderance" in referring to the evidence in an instruction given at plaintiff's request was not prejudicial, where the law relating to the burden of proof was otherwise fully and repeatedly called to the attention of the jury.

5. Husband and Wife—Alienation of Affections—Instructions.

An instruction confining the damages recoverable for the alienation of a husband's affections to "what shall fairly seem the pecuniary loss of plaintiff" is proper.

6. Witnesses — Examination—Objections—Scope.

An objection to a question as "wholly incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial" is sufficient to invoke the inhibition of Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, prohibiting the examination of a husband or wife as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage.

7. Same—Privileged Communications—Communications during Coverture.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, prohibiting the examination of a husband or wife without the consent of the other as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage, all communications so made during marriage are, unless consent is shown, absolutely incompetent, when offered to be shown by testimony of one of the spouses.

8. Evidence—Hearsay.

In an action for alienation of the affections of plaintiff's husband, testimony of plaintiff to narrations by her husband, in the absence of defendant, of declarations made by defendant to plaintiff's husband, is hearsay.

9. Same—Oral Admissions—Character of Evidence.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, evidence of oral admissions of a party is to be received with caution.

10. Appeal—Presumptions—Correctness of Ruling.

It is presumed, in the absence of an affirmative showing of error, that a ruling of the trial court excluding evidence was correct.

11. Husband and Wife—Alienation of Affections—Evidence.

In an action for the alienation of affections, testimony tending to show that the separation or alienation resulted from other causes than those alleged is admissible on the issue as to whether the loss of consortium was due to defendant's conduct.

12. Same—Mitigation of Damages.

In an action for alienation of affections, evidence tending to show unhappy relations and want of affection between the spouses prior to defendant's interference between them is admissible in mitigation of damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court September 23, 1905.

A. L. Levinsky and W. M. Gibson, for appellant. Jas. A. Louttit and Louttit & Middlecoff, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This is an action for damages caused by the acts of defendant in alienating the affection of plaintiff's husband, and abducting, persuading, and enticing said husband from plaintiff, and causing him to live separate and apart from her. The facts stated in the complaint are set forth in the decision on a former appeal (122 Cal. 255, 54 Pac. 847), and hence it is deemed unnecessary to repeat them here. The defendant, answering the complaint, denied each material averment thereof. The cause was tried before a jury, and upon the verdict of the jury a judgment was entered against defendant for damages in the sum of $2,000. From this judgment and an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The bill of exceptions specifies particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and contains many assignments of error. We will notice only those assignments deemed worthy of discussion in appellant's briefs, for we cannot be expected to "prosecute an independent inquiry in order to find out reasons for or against the correctness of the rulings." People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 297, 52 Pac. 833; Banister v. Campbell, 138 Cal. 460, 71 Pac. 504, 703; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 Pac. 661; Whyte v. Rosencrantz, 123 Cal. 634, 56 Pac. 436, 69 Am. St. Rep. 90; Taylor v. Bell, 128 Cal. 306, 60 Pac. 853; City v. Enos, 135 Cal. 167, 67 Pac. 52. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict of the jury. The testimony of plaintiff and defendant, aside from the letter written by the latter, sustains the conclusion reached by the jury, and hence such verdict cannot be disturbed. Iburg v.

Suanet, 47 Cal. 265; Brock v. Pearson, 87 Cal. 581, 25 Pac. 963; Bradford v. Woodworth, 108 Cal. 684, 41 Pac. 797; Shafer v. Willis, 124 Cal. 36, 56 Pac. 635.

Instruction No. 8, given at the request of plaintiff, was not erroneous. Instructions must be considered as a whole, and in the light of evidence introduced before the jury. While, therefore, an instruction that "any act of another woman," by which a wife is deprived of her marital rights, would, standing alone, be erroneous, we do not think the jury could have been misled in this instance.

In instructions numbered 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, and 12, requested by defendant, the proposition was reiterated that the plaintiff could not recover unless it was shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the "defendant, contrivingly, willfully, wrongfully, and with the intent to injure the plaintiff, did maliciously alienate and destroy the affection of W. G. Humphrey for plaintiff," and that she "maliciously and intentionally" caused the separation by means of "malicious, contriving, willful, or wrongful conduct" intended to alienate the husband's affection from his wife. This certainly made it plain to the jury that innocent or thoughtless acts, without any design to entice the husband from his wife, could not justify a verdict against defendant.

The word "preponderance" was omitted in another instruction given at plaintiff's request; but what has just been said shows that the law relating to the burden of proof was fully and repeatedly called to the attention of the jury, and hence the omission, in a single instance, was not prejudicial. People v. Jackson, 138 Cal. 465, 71 Pac. 566; People v. Morine, 61 Cal. 372.

We think the appellant has no reason to complain of the instruction relating to the measure of damages, which carefully confines damages recoverable to "what shall fairly seem the pecuniary loss of plaintiff." It contains no mention of children, gifts, or allowances, and is, therefore, not subject to the objection urged.

During the examination of plaintiff, she was permitted to testify as to what her husband said to her, with reference to the defendant, during the existence of the marriage relation, as follows: "Q. Mrs. Humphrey, coming down to the time of the second marriage with Mr. Humphrey, I will ask you what he said, if anything, with reference to the defendant during the period of that marriage, giving us any conversation you had with him in reference to it, commencing with the first event you recall. The first conversation you had with him in reference to the defendant? (Counsel for defendant objected to the question as wholly incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not binding upon the defendant unless in her presence, and the court overruled said objection. To which ruling counsel for defendant then and there duly excepted.) A. Well, the first was, I objected to his going at her beck and call; and he told me that she had plenty of money, and she wanted him, and it seemed as if he couldn't resist her." In response to similar questions, to which the same objection was interposed, the same ruling had, and exceptions reserved, the plaintiff was further allowed to testify: (1) "He came home with, both of his coat pockets, silver in them; seemed to be about half full; and he said the money was hers, and she had gave it to him to spend just as he pleased, and she said he shouldn't work any more." (2) "And he thought of giving up—that is, he was going to give up his business in town and take charge of the ranch—and he would have to get a divorce from me, as she demanded him to marry her, as it was not right for him to stay out there without they were married. He had been going out there; and he did afterwards. On these trips, he told me he was going to the ranch, he remained away from home one, two, and three nights at a time." (3) "Well, he told me that he could not get a divorce; but he asked me if I would, so that he could marry her. He said she wanted to be one of the 400, and she thought, by marrying him, they could be." (4) "Well, he said he wanted me to go ahead and get a divorce; give him a chance; that he would stop our income and starve me out; compel me to leave the house." These and other rulings touching the same line of evidence are assigned as error; appellant contending that the evidence was purely hearsay and was also inadmissible under section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent, however, contends that this evidence was a part of the res gestæ and admissible under exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay evidence, and also urges that the objection was not specific enough to invoke the inhibition contained in section 1881. The latter contention rests on the proposition that the objection should have extended to the competency of the witness. It has been repeatedly held that, where evidence objected to is absolutely incompetent, the general objection is sufficient. Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 324; Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 196, 56 Pac. 878; Spelling on New Trial, § 288. And the solution of the question now under consideration depends upon whether the plaintiff's evidence falls within this rule. We can readily see why an objection to the competency of experts, children under 10 years of age, ar persons of unsound mind, as witnesses, would be necessary. We can also understand why the specific objection, that particular communications between attorney and client, physician and patient, priest and penitent, were privileged, must be urged. But the lips of both husband and wife are forever sealed as to all communications between them during the marital relation, unless consent is shown or the cause of action falls within the exceptions. Neither spouse can be examined as to such communications without the consent of the other, and in our opinion the evidence is incompetent unless this consent is shown. In People v. Mullings, 83 Cal. 144, 23 Pac. 229, 17 Am. St. Rep. 223, this precise question was passed upon by our Supreme Court, and it was there said: "Other objections were made to similar questions which did not expressly state the ground of 'privilege,' but which did state, among other things, that the question was 'not in cross-examination, and incompetent.' The word 'incompetent,' under the circumstances, was sufficiently broad to include the ground of objection under review. Such questions were 'incompetent'—that is, apart from the consideration of relevancy and materiality, they were incompetent, because prohibited by law." And in another part of the same decision the court repeats that "the questions themselves were incompetent." In People v. Warner, 117 Cal. 638, 49 Pac. 841, the objection was "that the matter was incompetent, and not in cross-examination," and the court there say: "Nor is there anything in the suggestion that the objection was insufficient in form to include the ground now urged. People v. Mullings, supra." In other cases the evidence is spoken of as competent or incompetent. Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 166, 47 Pac. 1019; In re Mullin, 110 Cal. 254, 42 Pac. 645. In a Michigan case, almost identical with the one at bar, it was said: "Plaintiff was allowed to testify to conversations between himself and his wife, which did not occur in the presence of defendant; the record not showing that the wife consented to his testifying. This was contrary to section 7546, 3 How. Ann. St., as repeatedly construed by this court." The statute referred to contains only the general prohibition found in the first two sentences of section 1881, and that case is therefore exactly in point. The reason of the rule requiring specific objections, in certain cases, is entirely wanting here. The relation being shown, the law absolutely prohibited the examination of the wife touching communications during coverture. Jones on Evidence, §§ 751, 754, 764. The questions were, therefore, objectionable from every standpoint, and in such cases specific objection is not demanded. "There is no reason for it; and, where the reason is not present, the rule fails." Swan v. Thompson, supra.

But, aside from the objectionable feature of this evidence above discussed, we are satisfied that, as far as it was calculated to prove declarations by defendant to plaintiff's husband, it was hearsay pure and simple. There can be no doubt that the conduct and declarations of defendant, material to the issue, could be shown. But we cannot subscribe to the doctrine that the exigencies of this or any kindred case could justify a radical departure from well-settled rules, excluding hearsay evidence of the character under consideration. The doctrine of res gestæ does not dispense with cardinal rules of evidence, requiring the best evidence in degree touching declarations or any other relevant fact. Declarations and admissions, whether part of the res gestæ, or admissible under other exceptions to the rule excluding that character of evidence, are hearsay, and to permit them to be proven, by one other than the person hearing the statements from the lips of the declarant, would be to prove hearsay by hearsay, and this is not permissible. Estate of James, 124 Cal. 658, 57 Pac. 578, 1008; In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; Estate of Gregory, 133 Cal. 138, 65 Pac. 315; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1823, 1825, 1829, 1845, 1846, 1848, 1850, 1870; Jones on Evidence, §§ 197, 207, 216, 237, 297, 299, 347, 348, 351, 353; Greenleaf on Evidence, §§ 82, 108, 110, note 2, 124. Yet that would be the effect of permitting plaintiff to testify as to what her husband told her touching defendant's declarations and acts. "Evidence of the oral admissions of a party" must be received with caution. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061; Jones on Evidence, § 297. And it would be throwing caution to the winds to permit a class of evidence so fraught with danger and temptation, and so liable to errors and mistakes due to human forgetfulness and infallibility. Jones, Ev. § 297.

It is but fair to counsel for respondent, and to the trial court to say that authorities cited fully sustain the opposite view. Edgell v. Francis, 66 Mich. 303, 33 N. W. 501; Williams v. Williams, 20 Colo. 51, 37 Pac. 614, and cases therein cited. As the point is new in this state, we have endeavored to reach a conclusion in consonance with sound reason believing that good law is always supported by good logic; and, with all deference to the courts enunciating a rule favorable to the admissibility of such evidence, we are constrained to say that the reasoning upon which such rule is based is far from convincing, and we cannot concur in their view. We think the correct rule was laid down by the supreme court of Ohio in the following terse language: "The words and acts of the defendant Griffin, repeated by the wife to the husband and detailed by him in evidence to the jury, were nothing but hearsay, and in themselves clearly inadmissible." Preston v. Bowers, 13 Ohio St. 1, 82 Am. Dec. 430; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 634, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Huling v. Huling, 32 Ill. App. 521; Higham v. Vanosdol, 101 Ind. 164. It follows that the rulings were erroneous.

We cannot say what the judgment roll excluded by the court may have contained, and, as appellant must show error affirmatively, the presumption is that the ruling was correct. As the case must go back for a new trial, it may be remarked that any evidence tending to show that the separation or alienation of affection resulted from other causes than those alleged is admissible as bearing on the necessary averment that the loss of consortium was due to defendant's conduct. Evidence tending to show unhappy relations and want of affection between the spouses prior to defendant's interference or intrigues would also be admissible in mitigation of damages. Hadley v. Heywood, 121 Mass. 239; Waldron v. Waldron (C. C.) 45 Fed. 315; Rudd v. Rounds, 64 Vt. 440, 25 Atl. 438; Fratini v. Caslini, 66 Vt. 275, 29 Atl. 252, 44 Am. St. Rep. 843. The judgment and order are reversed.

WIELAND v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

1. EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

In an action for ejection of a passenger from a freight train, a statement, made by the conductor to a witness on the next day, that the passenger had ridden with him the day before, that he had been put off at a certain place because the train did not stop at his destination, and that he was not drunk and had paid his fare, was inadmissible.

2. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Plaintiff's condition as to being drunk or sober at the time having an important bearing on the degree of credit to be given to his testimony as to what occurred, and also on the cause of his remaining out all night, and the conductor having testified that he thought plaintiff was under the influence of liquor, the evidence was prejudicial.

3. RAILROADS—FREIGHT TRAINS—EJECTION OF TRESPASSERS—CUSTOM.

Where defendant carried passengers on a certain freight train having no regular schedule, and which did not always stop at R., and in case a stop was not to be made there it was the custom either to lock the caboose or to announce the fact before leaving F., a passenger with knowledge of such custom was entitled to assume its continuance, and that he would again be given transportation on the same terms as before, unless notified to the contrary according to the custom.

4. SAME—SPECIAL INQUIRY—PERMIT.

Where defendant railroad company customarily accepted passengers on a certain freight train, plaintiff, desiring transportation with knowledge of such custom, was not bound to make special and independent inquiry with reference to whether the train would stop at its destination, in the absence of notice to the contrary, or to obtain a special permit from the superintendent.

5. SAME—RULES.

Where a carrier customarily accepted passengers on a certain freight train for stations at which it made stops necessary for the handling of freight, the carrier was not bound absolutely to furnish such transportation, and, on notifying passengers that the train would not stop at a certain station, it was their duty to leave the same, and, if they did not do so, they could be lawfully ejected, as authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 484, 487.

6. SAME—PAYMENT OF FARE—BRAKEMEN.

Under Civ. Code, § 488, declaring that no collector or conductor without a badge provided for is authorized to demand or receive from any passenger any fare, etc., a passenger paying his fare to a brakeman, instead of the conductor of the train, is bound to show that the brakeman had authority to receive the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Henry Brickley and Geo. Cosgrave, for appellant. L. L. Cory, for respondent.

McLAUGHLIN, J. This is an action for damages caused by wrongfully ejecting plaintiff from one of defendant's trains. The pertinent facts may be summarized as follows: For several months prior to June 18, 1902, passengers had been carried to and fro between Fresno and Rolinda in the caboose of a freight train. The custom, as shown by the evidence, was for passengers to board the train at either point and pay the fare to the conductor, who always collected such fare from passengers in the caboose. On the date mentioned, respondent and other passengers entered the caboose, to be carried to different points along the route; plaintiff's destination being Rolinda. Rolinda is a flag station, where this train stops on signal, and it was the custom to let passengers on and off at this point. Kearney's Spur is a switch about 2⅓ miles from Rolinda, at which there are no houses. There are, however, three houses within a distance of 1¼ miles. The brakeman testified that before leaving Fresno he entered the caboose, and in a tone loud enough to be heard by any one therein announced that the train would not stop at Rolinda that night, and that thereupon some men left the caboose. In this he is corroborated by the witnesses who were present, and contradicted by none save respondent, who testified that he heard no such announcement, and saw no person leave the caboose, although he boarded the train quite a while before it left Fresno. The brakeman is not absolutely certain that respondent was present when the announcement was made, but two passengers say that he was and must certainly have heard it. The brakeman, conductor, and passengers, who were witnesses, agree in saying that respondent was intoxicated when he boarded the train and when he got off. This he denied, and considerable evidence touching his condition before and after his ejection, and relating to his habits in this regard, was introduced by both parties to the action. Respondent paid his fare to the brakeman before reaching Kearney, and at this point was told that he would have to leave the train, as no stop would be made at Rolinda. He himself says that no force was used, that he got off the train, and the brakeman handed him his satchel. He was next seen the following morning, lying near the railroad track at a point about one mile from Kearney, and close to a dwelling known as the "Saier Place." Later in the day he called at this house, obtained something to eat, and made himself obnoxious to Mrs. Saier, who turned the hose on him. That lady and her daughter both say he was intoxicated and drank some while at their house; but respondent again champions his sobriety, and says he was not drunk, but was sick. In fact, he says he went to Fresno for medicine, and was ailing during the whole trip. He admits that he had one bottle of wine with him when he left the train, but other witnesses say that he had four or five bottles in the satchel, which was so heavy that it caused him to stumble and fall when it was handed to him by the brakeman at Kearney. The conductor first saw the respondent at Kearney, heard his complaints about being put off the train, and offered to carry his satchel to Collis and leave it at Rolinda the following night, which offer was declined. The evidence shows without conflict that this was the only occasion when the brakeman collected fare from a passenger, and it is also clear that he had no authority to do so then. There is no evidence to show that the brakeman turned the fare over to the conductor or to the company, and the only evidence that the conductor knew that respondent had paid any fare is found in his declarations as narrated in the testimony of Mr. Kennedy, which narration will be considered later. The brakeman testified that he told the respondent that they would take him to Collis, a station beyond Rolinda, but respondent said he would prefer to get off at Kearney, as it would be a shorter walk from Kearney than from Collis. The respondent, however, says that he asked to be taken to Collis, but his request was refused.

It is apparent from the foregoing that there is a sharp conflict between respondent and other witnesses, and the importance of testimony bearing upon his capacity to realize and remember what transpired, and tending to show that he was less likely to be correct in his statements than other witnesses, is manifest. The theory of plaintiff, as disclosed by the evidence, was that sickness prevented his reaching Rolinda or any of the dwellings nearest to Kearney, and that as a consequence he was compelled to remain out all night, thereby contracting a cold, which, in time, resulted in severe and permanent injury. On the other hand, the theory of defendant was that, but for his continued drinking from the bottles he had with him, respondent could easily have reached Rolinda, or at least found shelter in one of the dwellings mentioned. Under these circumstances, J. W. Kennedy, a witness called by respondent, was, notwithstanding appellant's timely and sufficient objection, permitted to testify to certain declarations of Speake, the conductor, made the next evening at Rolinda, as follows: "I asked Mr. Speake if Mr. Wieland got on the train the evening before. At this time Mr. Wieland had not got home. The next evening, when train came along, I flagged the train, and asked Mr. Speake if Mr. Wieland got aboard the train at Fresno He said he did. I asked him what he did with him. He said, 'I put him off at Kearney's Spur.' I says, 'Was Wieland drunk?' He said, 'No.' I said, 'Didn't he have money enough to pay his fare?' He says, 'Yes, he paid his fare.' I said, 'What did you put him off for?' He said, 'Because I didn't intend to stop at Rolinda.'" This was error. Williams v. S. P. Co., 133 Cal. 550, 65 Pac. 1100; Heckle v. S. P. Co., 123 Cal. 441, 56 Pac. 56; Luman v. Golden Ancient Mining Co., 140 Cal. 709, 74 Pac. 307. Counsel for respondent, however, contends that the error is not prejudicial, because the evidence could have little bearing on the case, and in any event was substantially corroborated by the conductor. This contention cannot be sustained. We have seen that the condition of plaintiff, as to being drunk or sober, had an important bearing on the degree of credit to be given his testimony, and also on the cause of his remaining out all night. The conductor testified that he thought plaintiff was under the influence of liquor, and the evidence of Kennedy shows a contrary statement at another time. To hold that such evidence could be harmless would be to ignore its bearing on the testimony of plaintiff and on vital issues in the case, and sanction the impeachment of a witness, not only in an improper and illegal manner, but at a time antedating the testimony of the witness impeached. Moreover, the declaration as to the payment of fare was important; for, aside from this, there is nothing in the record to show that the conductor had any knowledge of such payment. The error was, therefore, very prejudicial.

This seems to be the pioneer case in this state touching some questions of law which must necessarily arise on a retrial of the cause, and hence we deem it our duty to pass upon such questions. The law of this state provides that, when fare is taken for transporting passengers on a freight train, the same care must be taken and the same responsibility is assumed by the corporation as for passengers on passenger cars. Civ. Code, § 483. This is the only statute we have touching the relative rights of passengers and company, under such circumstances as are disclosed in the case at bar. Nor can much aid be derived from a study of the few authorities bearing upon cases somewhat analogous. But law is reason, and reason points to principles of law which must control in the solution of questions presented. This particular train, under the regulations of the company, carried passengers whenever the train was to stop at Rolinda. Aside from these regulations there was strong evidence to show that it always stopped for passengers desiring transportation between the two points. The train did not always stop there, and there was no regular schedule, as stops, according to regulations, depended upon the necessity for handling freight at Rolinda. The custom, according to the conductor, was to lock the caboose when no passengers were to be taken, or to announce the fact before leaving Fresno, when no stop was to be made at Rolinda. This being the custom, respondent, who had traveled on this train before, had a right to assume its continuance, and that he would again be given transportation on the same terms as before, unless he was notified in the usual manner and according to the custom mentioned. Therefore he was not bound to make special and independent inquiry, nor to obtain a special permit from the superintendent. There can be no doubt that, if the company permitted the inauguration and continuance of this custom and accepted the fares collected, it would be bound by it; for "he who can and does not forbid that which is done in his behalf is deemed to have bidden it." It could not wink at a violation of its rules as long as benefits accrued, and then hide behind such rules and regulations when liability was threatened; for "he who takes the benefit must bear the burden."

But, on the other hand, the mere fact that passengers had been carried on this train did not give respondent an absolute right to transportation. The company could at any time suspend or discontinue this permissive use, and passengers notified, either under this undoubted right or under the custom mentioned, that the train would not stop at Rolinda, were in duty bound to leave the train; and, if they did not do so, they could lawfully be ejected. Civ. Code, §§ 484, 487. The respondent may not have heard the announcement; but, if he did, he could not here have an advantage growing out of his own wrong in thereafter remaining on the train. It is a matter of common knowledge that brakemen are not authorized to receive fares from passengers on any train, and as a matter of law passengers should not pay fare to any person, unless his badge indicates his authority to receive it. Civ. Code, § 488; Cox v. Los Angeles Terminal Ry. Co., 109 Cal. 105, 41 Pac. 794. Respondent having paid his fare to the brakeman, a person not generally authorized to receive it, the burden was upon him to show authority in this instance. This he utterly failed to do. The evidence affirmatively shows a total absence of such authority, and we think it was error to refuse defendant's instruction bearing on this branch of the case.

We believe the foregoing sufficiently indicates our view touching disputed questions of law. The judgment is reversed.

1 Cal. App. 340

1. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—PEACEABLE POSSESSION.

It is not essential to the maintenance of an action for forcible entry and for forcible detainer that plaintiff shall have had actual possession for any definite length of time, so long as it in fact had peaceable and quiet possession at all.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forcible Entry and Detainer, §§ 37–44.]

2. SAME—FORCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for forcible entry, evidence that a man armed with a deadly weapon approached plaintiff's agents and servants, and, flourishing the weapon, directed them to vacate the premises, supplementing the demand with a statement that "jumpers have been known to lose a leg," was sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff's vacation of the premises, in apprehension of danger therefrom, was forcible and with a strong hand.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 23, Cent. Dig. Forcible Entry and Detainer, §§ 6, 11, 15.]

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for forcible entry and forcible detainer, the evidence was sufficient to show that plaintiff had been compelled by force to vacate the premises of which it had peaceable possession, defendant was not prejudiced by the introduction of evidence showing plaintiff's title, right of possession, and good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Highland Park Oil Company against the Western Minerals Company and others. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Laird & Packard, for appellants. Reardan & Whitaker, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action for forcible entry and for forcible detainer. Judgment went for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff in its complaint alleges that on February 1, 1902, it was in peaceable and actual possession of the S. ½ of the N. ½ of section 28, township 11 N., range 23 W., San Bernardino base and meridian, Kern County, Cal., and was engaged in erecting upon said land a cabin; that on said date the defendants by force and violence entered on said premises, and in a forcible manner ejected plaintiff therefrom, tore down and destroyed the cabin, and carried away the materials used in its construction. As a second cause of action, plaintiff repeated all the matters stated in the first cause of action, and alleged, further, that defendants still forcibly keep and hold possession of said premises. The answer in effect denies all the material allegations of the complaint, and upon the trial the court found the allegations in the complaint to be true.

The principal contention of defendants on this appeal is that the finding that plaintiff was in the peaceable possession of said premises at the date of the entry has no support in the evidence. There is some testimony tending to show the actual possession of plaintiff for the greater portion of one day. It is not made an essential in the statute that actual possession should have existed for any definite length of time. The mere fact of peaceable and quiet possession is all that is material for plaintiff to establish.

It is insisted, further, that there is no support in the testimony for the finding of the court that defendants, with strong hand and with force and violence, ejected plaintiff from the premises. There is ample testimony in the record to show that the servants and agents of plaintiff were by force driven off the premises by defendants' agents. Where one man, who is armed with and flourishing a deadly weapon, approaches another and directs him to vacate premises, supplementing the demand with the statement that "jumpers have been known to lose a leg," and the other, apprehending danger, vacates, there should be no difficulty in determining that such vacation was forcible and with a strong hand.

It is further contended that the rulings of the court in admitting the deed to plaintiff of the premises was error. While it is true that in proceedings under the forcible entry act neither title, right of possession, nor good faith on the part of plaintiff are essential to a maintenance of the action, yet it is difficult to see the prejudice which would result to the defendants by the proof of all or either of them.

Many other exceptions and objections were made as to the ruling of the court in the introduction of testimony, in none of which are we able to discover any prejudicial error.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

Ex parte KELSO. (Cr. 1,259.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—ORDINANCES—ROCK QUARRIES—PROHIBITION — STATUTES.

The San Francisco city ordinance prohibiting the maintenance or operation of a rock quarry within prescribed limits in the city did not prohibit the making of reasonable excavations for construction purposes on land to be improved, and was therefore not in conflict with Civ. Code, § 832, confirming the right of every landowner to make proper and usual excavations on the same for the purposes of construction, etc.

2. SAME — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — POLICE POWER—DEPRIVATION OF PROPERTY.

The San Francisco city ordinance prohibiting the maintenance or operation of any rock or stone quarries within a prescribed portion of the city was not a proper exercise of police power, but was void as an unlawful interference with property rights.

In Bank. Application for a writ of habeas corpus by one Kelso to review his incarceration for violation of an ordinance of the city of San Francisco prohibiting the operation of a rock or stone quarry within certain limits in the city. Petitioner discharged.

J. C. Bates, for petitioner. Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., and James M. Hanley, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Petitioner seeks his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, by whom he is held under a commitment issued upon a judgment pronounced against him upon conviction of a violation of an ordinance of said city and county. The prohibitory portion of said ordinance is as follows, viz.: "No person, company or association shall maintain or operate any rock or stone quarry within that portion of the city and county of San Francisco bounded as follows." Then follows a description of a large portion of such city. The complaint filed against petitioner simply charged him in the language of the ordinance with willfully and unlawfully maintaining and operating a certain stone and rock quarry within the limits designated, and undoubtedly alleged a public offense if the ordinance is valid. In this proceeding, we cannot, of course, consider the evidence given upon the trial of petitioner, or determine whether or not that evidence showed that he committed the acts charged against him. The adjudication of the trial court, and the affirmance of the judgment by the superior court, are conclusive upon that question here. The only question presented for our determination is as to the validity of the ordinance.

We do not think that the ordinance can reasonably be construed as prohibiting an owner of land containing stone or rock from making thereon such "proper and usual excavations * * * for purposes of construction" as may be necessary. What is prohibited is the maintenance or operation of a "rock or stone quarry." The term "quarry" is not properly applicable to the comparatively slight excavations on land made primarily for purposes of construction thereon, and not primarily for the purpose of disposing of the rock, or stone, or other material taken out. As defined by the lexicographers, it is similar to a mine, in the sense that the material removed, be it mere rock, or stone, or valuable marble, is removed because of its value for some other purposes, and in the sense that it is not removed for the purpose of improving the property from which it is taken. It is distinguished from a mine in the fact that it is usually open at the top and front (see Century and Standard Dictionaries), and, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, in the character of the material extracted, but these distinctions are not material here. Webster defines a quarry as "a place, cavern, or pit where stone is taken from the rock or ledge, or dug from the earth, for building or other purposes; a stone pit," and in March's Dictionary, we find it defined as "a stone mine." In its proper significance, this is what it really is. It is a place, generally open at top and front, from which rock or stone is extracted solely because of its value for use elsewhere, just as gold or other precious metals are removed from a mine; and "proper and usual excavations" made for construction purposes on the land to be improved do not fall within the term "quarry." There is, therefore, nothing in the contention that the ordinance is in conflict with the provisions of section 832 of the Civil Code, confirming the right of the owner of land "to make proper and usual excavations on the same for purposes of construction, on using ordinary care and skill, and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other, and giving previous reasonable notice to the other of his intention to make such excavations," and subject to which right the coterminous owner is entitled to the lateral and subjacent support which his land receives from the adjoining land.

The case, however, presents a much more serious question. The effect of the ordinance absolutely prohibiting the maintenance or operation of a rock or stone quarry within certain designated limits of the city and county of San Francisco is to absolutely deprive the owners of real property within such limits of a valuable right incident to their ownership, viz., the right to extract therefrom such rock and stone as they may find it to their advantage to dispose of. While the use to which a man may put his property may be restricted or regulated by the state, in the exercise of its police power, so far as may be necessary to protect others from injury from such use, it is, of course, elementary, that the enjoyment of one's property cannot be interfered with or limited arbitrarily. As is said in Tiedeman's Limitations of Police Power, the next thing to depriving a man of his property is to circumscribe him in its use. A limitation of the use pro tanto deprives him of the enjoyment thereof, and any arbitrary action in this regard is a taking of private property without due process of law. Sections 122 and 122a. While in the exercise of its police power the state may limit or regulate the use, any such limitation or regulation must find its justification in the necessity for the protection of the legal rights of others. If it does not, it is an unwarrantable invasion of property rights, against which the courts will protect. Whether or not a certain limitation or regulation is essential is largely a question for the legislative department, to be determined with reference to all the existing circumstances; and the courts will not ordinarily interfere, where it can be seen that the regulation has some proper relation to an object within the domain of the police power of the state, which, as stated by Mr. Cooley, includes all regulations having reference to "the comfort, safety, or welfare of society." But regulations which transcend these objects cannot be upheld by the courts as legitimate police regulations. See Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 236, 77 Pac. 924, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82. Applying these well-recognized principles to the ordinance before us, we are unable to perceive any ground upon which it may be sustained as a legitimate exercise of the police power. It is in no sense a mere regulation as to the manner in which rock or stone may be removed from the land by the owner thereof, but is an absolute prohibition of any such removal. However valuable the rock or stone may be if removed, and however valueless if not removed, the owner must allow it to remain in its place of deposit. Such a prohibition might be justified, if the removal could not be effected without improperly invading the rights of others; but it cannot be doubted that rock and stone may, under some circumstances, be so severed from the land and removed as not in the slightest degree to inflict any injury which the law will recognize. So far as such use of one's property may be had without injury to others, it is a lawful use, which cannot be absolutely prohibited by the legislative department under the guise of the exercise of the police power.

It may freely be conceded that rock or stone quarrying may be done in such a way and under such circumstances as to occasion injury to others, or to make it a public nuisance (see Queen v. Mutter, 10 Cox, C. R. 6), and that the state has the power to impose such limitations as are necessary to prevent this. For instance, an ordinary method of loosening rock or stone is blasting with powder, dynamite, etc.; and respondent urges this as one of the reasons why the operation of a quarry is dangerous to the public safety. This objection goes, however, only to the way in which the work is done, and not to the work itself. Rock or stone may be extracted without blasting, not so easily, perhaps, and therefore not so profitably, but still blasting is not absolutely essential to the extraction of the rock. It has been properly recognized that the matter of blasting in a densely populated community is one for police regulation, and the circumstances may be such that blasting may be absolutely prohibited. It was so held by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Commonwealth v. Parks, 155 Mass. 531, 30 N. E. 174, where an ordinance prohibiting the blasting of rock and stone with gunpowder, etc., without written consent from the board of aldermen, was upheld. Doubtless the city and county of San Francisco may enact all needful regulations as to blasting, and such other regulations as to the manner in which and extent to which quarrying work may be done, as may be necessary to the protection of those rights which may be guarded by the state by the exercise of its police power. It may also be suggested that in so far as any work of the character here attempted to be prohibited, by reason of the place or manner in which it is being done, or the extent to which excavations are being made, constitutes an unauthorized invasion of the property rights of adjoining owners, such adjoining owners have their remedy by civil action. We can see no valid objection to the work of removing from one's own land valuable deposits of rock or stone that may not be entirely met by regulations as to the manner in which such work shall be done; and, this being so, we are satisfied that an absolute prohibition of such removal, under all circumstances, cannot be upheld. It may be that such regulations of the work as will be upheld as a proper exercise of the police power will entail such cost as will in many cases make it unprofitable to remove the rock or stone, or the rock or stone may be so situated as to make it impossible to extract it at all without violating the regulations; but, if this be the effect of proper regulations, the property owner cannot complain, for he holds his property subject to the proper exercise of the police power of the state.

It is unnecessary to discuss other objections made to said ordinance. The ordinance being invalid, the petitioner must be discharged from custody; and it is so ordered.

McCARTHY v. WILSON. (Sac. 1,283.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1905.)

1. ELECTIONS—CONTEST—APPEAL — TIME FOR TAKING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 1, providing that an exception to a decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal from the judgment unless the appeal is taken within 60 days thereafter, is applicable to election contests; section 1126 providing, in relation to election contests, that either party aggrieved by the judgment of the court may appeal as in other cases of appeal.

2. SAME—ERRORS OF LAW.

On appeal in an election contest, appellant's complaint that the court had refused to consider certain ballots voted for him, and had erroneously considered other ballots purporting to be for his adversary, presents questions of law as to whether the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence, and does not involve a review of the findings to determine whether they were sustained by the evidence, and hence the review of such questions is not prevented because the appeal was not taken within 60 days under section 939, subd. 1.

3. SAME—EXCEPTIONS IN TRIAL COURT.

The Supreme Court will not review the ruling of the trial court on any particular ballot in an election contest, in the absence of an exception reserved thereto by the party complaining.

4. SAME—OBJECTIONS NOT MADE BELOW.

On an appeal in an election contest, no objection to a ballot will be considered by the Supreme Court unless it has been specifically made in the trial court.

5. SAME—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

The ruling of the court on an objection to each particular ballot in an election contest, when excepted to by the injured party, is reviewable on appeal from the judgment.

6. SAME—BALLOTS.

On an election contest, ballots containing the printed words "No Nomination," in the absence of a nominee for a particular office, upon which the voter had stamped a cross after the words "No Nomination," were void.

7. SAME.

On an election contest, ballots on which the voter had written a name in the blank column on the ballot and had stamped a cross after such written name were void.

8. SAME.

On an election contest, a ballot having two or more distinct crosses after the name of a single candidate was void.

9. SAME.

On an election contest, a ballot having pencil writing in an improper place on the face of the ballot was void.

10. SAME—ELECTION BOARD—INELIGIBILITY—EFFECT ON VALIDITY OF BALLOTS.

Pol. Code, § 1142, providing for the appointment of boards of election by the boards of supervisors or other board having control of elections, declares that no person shall be eligible to act as an officer of election at any precinct who has been employed in any official capacity in the county, or city and county, within 90 days preceding the election. Held that, though certain members of an election board were ineligible under the statute, yet, having acted, their acts were valid, in the absence of fraud, and their ineligibility did not affect the validity of the ballots cast by the voters of the precinct.

11. SAME—OBJECTIONS TO BALLOTS — NAMES OF OFFICERS ON SEAL.

On an election contest, an objection to the ballots from a certain precinct on the ground that the election officers had not written their names across the seal of the envelope as required by Pol. Code, § 1259, was of no avail, there being no pretense that the ballots were not the original ballots delivered to the county clerk by the election board, and retained safely in his possession, or that the packages were not in precisely the same condition when produced in court as when received by the county clerk.

12. SAME—FINDINGS.

On an election contest, it having been found that one of the parties did not receive a majority of the votes, a failure to find that he was eligible to the office was not material.

13. SAME—ADMISSIONS IN ANSWER.

On an election contest it was not necessary for the court to find on such allegations in the statement as were admitted by the answer either by specific statement or failure to deny.

14. SAME — FINDING AS TO ELIGIBILITY OF CANDIDATE.

On an election contest it was not necessary that the court should find as to the successful party's eligibility, no question having been made under the pleadings.

15. SAME—STATEMENT BY CONTESTANT—SUFFICIENCY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1111, subd. 2, gives a right to contest an election on the ground that the contestee was not eligible, and section 1115 provides that on an election contest the statement filed by the contestant shall state, among other things, the particular grounds of contest. Held that, where ineligibility is relied on, it must be alleged in the statement.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Election contest by T. E. McCarthy against S. B. Wilson over the office of superintendent of schools of El Dorado county. From a judgment confirming the election of the contestee, the contestant appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied March 22, 1905.

Chas. A. Swisler, Abe Darlington, and Clarke Howard, for appellant. W. C. Burgess, W. F. Bray, and C. E. Peters, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment given in an election contest. The office in question is that of superintendent of schools of El Dorado county, and the appellant and respondent were the candidates for said office at the general election held on November 4, 1902. Upon the canvass by the board of supervisors respondent was declared elected, and this contest was thereupon instituted by appellant. The ground of the contest was malconduct on the part of the election officers in the matter of counting the votes, appellant claiming that he had received the highest number of legal votes, and that such fact would be ascertained by a recount. At the trial all of the ballots cast at the election were recanvassed by the court, with the result that the court found that appellant had received 1,050 votes and respondent 1,115 votes. Judgment was thereupon, on March 20, 1903, entered, confirming the election of respondent.

1. The appeal herein was not taken until September 18, 1903, and it is urged by respondent that, as the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of judgment, the rulings of the trial court upon the various ballots to which objections were made during the progress of the recount cannot be reviewed.

Admittedly, subdivision 1 of section 939, Code Civ. Proc., providing that an exception to the decision on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, is applicable to election contests. Section 1126, Code Civ. Proc.; Packard v. Craig, 114 Cal. 95, 98, 45 Pac. 1033. The theory of the respondent is that, inasmuch as the trial court counted the ballots, and found that appellant received a certain number of votes and respondent a larger number, any review of the rulings of the court upon individual ballots in the making of the count would be a review of the findings of the court for the purpose of determining whether the same were sustained by the evidence. It is said by respondent that the fact which appellant endeavors to show is that a count of the ballots received by the court in evidence shows a majority for appellant, which, as held in Packard v. Craig, supra, cannot be done where the appeal is taken more than 60 days after rendition of judgment. There is nothing in this contention. What appellant complains of is, not that the trial court reached a conclusion that is not sustained by the evidence actually, admitted and taken into consideration, but that it expressly refused to admit and take into consideration certain proper evidence, consisting of ballots legally voted for him, and erroneously admitted, and took into consideration certain other evidence, consisting of ballots purporting to be for respondent, which, by reason of their illegality, should not have been admitted. This presents questions as to whether the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence, questions of law which are not foreclosed by the failure to appeal within 60 days. It is well settled that this court will not review the ruling of the trial court upon any particular ballot in the absence of exception reserved thereto by the party complaining (Lay v. Parsons, 104 Cal. 661, 38 Pac. 447), and that no objection to a ballot will be considered by this court unless it has been specifically made in the trial court (People v. Campbell, 138 Cal. 11, 22, 70 Pac. 918; Langley v. Head, 142 Cal. 368, 371, 75 Pac. 1088). Each particular ballot is regarded as a piece of evidence, and the ruling of the court on an objection thereto, when excepted to by the injured party, is reviewable by the appellate court on an appeal from the judgment to the same extent as any other ruling in the matter of the admission or rejection of offered evidence. Such rulings can be reviewed in no other way. If they are erroneous and sufficient in number to materially affect the judgment, the judgment must be reversed. There is nothing in Packard v. Craig, supra, inconsistent with these views. The record of that case shows that it was not sought therein to review the ruling of the trial court upon any particular ballot, and this court expressly said that questions as to whether or not the court erred in admitting certain evidence were properly before them on that appeal.

2. There were 96 ballots, commonly known as "No Nomination Ballots," i. e., ballots containing the printed words "No Nomination" in the absence of a nominee for a particular office—upon which the voter had stamped a cross after the words "No Nomination." Eighty-seven of these contained a vote for respondent, and nine contained a vote for appellant. The trial court originally sustained objections to all of these ballots, but subsequently reconsidered its rulings, overruled the objections thereto, and admitted them in evidence. The appellant duly excepted to this ruling.

That these ballots were void, and should have been rejected, cannot now be doubted, in view of the many decisions of this court upon the subject of "No Nomination Ballots." See Maddux v. Walthall, 141 Cal. 412, 414, 74 Pac. 1026, and cases there cited; Kincaid v. Reid, 142 Cal. 88, 75 Pac. 657; Merkley v. Trainor, 142 Cal. 265, 75 Pac. 656; McMenomy v. Ruch. 142 Cal. 77, 75 Pac. 661; Treanor v. Williams (Cal.) 78 Pac. 884. The trial court, therefore, erred in overruling the objections to these ballots. As 87 of these were counted for respondent and only 9 for appellant, the net loss to appellant by reason of these erroneous rulings was 78.

The trial court also overruled the objections of appellant to 7 ballots containing a vote for respondent, on each of which the voter had written a name in the blank column on the ballot, and had stamped a cross after such written name. The objections to these ballots should have been sustained, and the ballots rejected. Salcido v. Roberts, 136 Cal. 670, 672, 69 Pac. 431. The loss to appellant by reason of these erroneous rulings was 7, which makes his total loss 85, or 19 more than is necessary to overcome the majority of 65 found by the court for the respondent.

The prejudicial effect of these errors is therefore apparent, unless it appears that there were other errors against respondent, sufficient in number to overcome the apparent majority of appellant. For the purpose of ascertaining the condition in this regard, we have examined all the other rulings of the court in the matter of the ballots, so far as such rulings were made the subject-matter of exceptions. Such examination discloses that there were eight errors against respondent and eight against appellant. Ballot 658, 868, 960, 1,100, 1,805, 2,142, and 2,153, all respondent's ballots, should have been counted for him. In no case was the mark thereon serving as the basis of an objection that the ballot bore a distinguishing mark of such a character that it should have been held to invalidate the ballot. Ballot 360, counted for appellant, should have been excluded, the voter having placed two distinct crosses thereon after the name of one candidate. On the other hand, ballots 70, 217, 551, 564, and 1,192, all for appellant, should have been counted for him, the alleged distinguishing mark in no case being such as to invalidate the ballot. Ballots 221, 950, and 959, counted for respondent, should have been excluded, two of these because of two or more distinct crosses after the name of a single candidate, and the other because of pencil writing in an improper place upon the face of the ballot. These are the only other errors found, and they simply balance each other.

Objections were made by respondent to the counting of the ballots from four precincts of the county, upon the ground that in each of said precincts one or more of the members of the election board was ineligible to act thereon for the reason that he had been a county or a township officer within 90 days next preceding the election. The basis of this objection is section 1142, Pol. Code, which, providing for the appointment of boards of election by the board of supervisors or other board having control of elections, declares that "no person shall be eligible to act as an officer of election at any precinct who has been employed in any official capacity in the county, or city and county, in the state, within ninety days next preceding any election." The objections were properly overruled. Conceding that the evidence showed that certain members of these boards came within the inhibition of section 1142, Pol. Code, and were therefore ineligible, they nevertheless did act, and were at least de facto officers of election, and as such their acts were valid in the absence of fraud, even though they did not possess all the qualifications requisite for the office. Certainly no principle of law would warrant the disfranchisement of the voters of a precinct on any such ground as the one relied on as the basis of this objection. See Whipley v. McKune, 12 Cal. 352; People v. Prewett, 124 Cal. 13, 56 Pac. 619.

Objections were made by respondent to the ballots from two precincts, upon the ground that the election officers had not written their names across the seal of the envelope, as required by section 1259, Pol. Code, and that there was nothing to show by whom the envelopes had been sealed, or whether they had been opened after being sealed. The record does not show that the names of the members of the board had not, as a matter of fact, been written across the seal; but assuming such to have been the condition, the ballots should not have been excluded. There was no pretense that these were not the original ballots from these precincts, delivered by the election boards thereof to the county clerk, and retained safely in his possession continuously thereafter, or that the packages were not in precisely the same condition when produced in court as when received by the county clerk. Of course, the members of the election boards should have complied with the law, and written their names across the seal of the envelope containing the ballots, but their failure to so do cannot warrant the disfranchisement of all the voters of those precincts, where it is manifest that no injury resulted therefrom. The objections were properly overruled.

This disposes of all the points made by respondent, and shows that the errors in regard to the no nomination ballots and the seven ballots whereon a cross was stamped after a written name, substantially prejudiced appellant's cause, and necessitate a reversal.

Appellant makes certain other points for a reversal of the judgment, none of which is tenable. The findings fully covered all issues material to the conclusion reached. It being found that appellant did not receive a majority of the votes, the failure to find that he was eligible to the office is not material. It was, of course, not necessary to find upon such allegations in the statement as were admitted by the answer, either by specific statement or failure to deny. The failure to find upon the matters stated as a "further and separate defense" by respondent is a matter concerning which appellant has no ground of complaint, for it could not prejudice him. It was not necessary that the court should find as to the respondent's eligibility, for there was no question, under the pleadings, as to his eligibility. The Code of Civil Procedure specifies various grounds of contest, one of which is that the person whose right to the office is contested was not, at the time of the election, eligible to such office. Section 1111, subd. 2. Where this ground is relied on, it should be alleged in the statement. Section 1115, Code Civ. Proc.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further poceedings.

DISMISSAL—APPEARANCE—STIPULATION.

A stipulation, signed by the attorneys for both parties, extending time to answer, is an appearance, though not filed, within Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 7, excepting from actions which shall be dismissed, where summons has not been served and returned within three years, those in which an appearance has been made by defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appearance, §§ 29, 37; vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Dismissal and Nonsuit, § 152.]

In Bank. Application by Jules F. Roth for writ of prohibition to the superior court of Los Angeles county and Waldo M. York, judge thereof. Writ denied.

H. C. Millsap, for petitioner. Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. On October 11, 1901, the State Bank & Trust Company commenced an action against this petitioner to recover the amount of a promissory note. Summons and copy of the complaint were served the same day, and on the following day the parties by their respective attorneys entered into the following stipulation:

"In the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, State of California.

"State Bank & Trust Company, a Corporation, "Plaintiff, v. Jules F. Roth, Defendant.

"It is hereby stipulated by and between the parties hereto that the above-named defendant may have to and including the twelfth (12th) day of November in which to plead in the above-entitled action.

"Dated this 12th day of October, 1901.

"Lawler & Allen,
"Attorneys for Plaintiff.
"Walter Rose and
"Ross T. Hickox,
"Attorneys for Defendant."

Nothing further was done until February, 1905, except that through the attorneys time to answer was extended by verbal stipulation, at request of the petitioner. The summons was never returned, and in February, 1905, petitioner gave notice of a motion to dismiss the action, upon the ground that more than three years had elapsed since its commencement without return of summons. After notice of this motion, and before the hearing, the attorneys for the plaintiff in that action filed the stipulation above quoted. The superior court denied the motion, and threatens to proceed in the action. Petitioner asks that all further proceedings be stayed, and bases his claim to the writ upon the provisions of subdivision 7, § 581, Code Civ. Proc. We think the writ should be denied. The stipulation, signed as it was by petitioner's attorneys in the action, was a virtual appearance, and none the less so because it was not filed. The case comes fully within the reasoning and principle of the decision of Cooper v. Gordon, 125 Cal. 296, 57 Pac. 1006, and is distinguished from the case of Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470, by the fact that in that case no stipulation was signed by any one as attorney for the defendant, while here a stipulation is signed by attorneys representing the defendant, and empowered to bind him in all proceedings in the action.

Writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

In re PIPER'S ESTATE.

APPEAL—PARTIES AGGRIEVED.

In a proceeding for distribution of the estate of a decedent, parties whose right to distribution depends on the property being community property, not having attacked the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that the property was the separate property of deceased, are not parties aggrieved, within Code Civ. Proc. § 938, so as to be entitled to appeal, making the point only that the court was without jurisdiction to make the decree distributing the estate to the state.

In the matter of the estate of Eva Agnes Piper, deceased. From the decree, Arthur L. Piper, administrator, and others, appeal. Affirmed.

Hendrick, Wright & Schoonover, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Geo. A. Sturtevant, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Eva Agnes Piper at the time of her death was a childless widow. In the petition for distribution the administrator of the estate set forth that the estate left by the deceased was the proceeds of community property of the deceased and of her husband, A. Dana Piper, who had died before her. The petition contains no allegation touching the relatives of the deceased wife, but alleges that there was no surviving father, mother, brother, or sister of A. Dana Piper; that A. Dana Piper had one brother, who was dead, and who was the father of the petitioner and of certain other children, who had assigned to petitioner their claims upon the estate of the deceased. The petitioner asserted a right to distribution in the children of the deceased brother of A. Dana Piper, under section 1386, subd. 9, Civ. Code, and prayed the court for such distribution. Issue was joined by the state of California upon all these matters, and in its answer to the petition the state affirmatively alleged that the property of the deceased, Eva Agnes Piper, was separate property, and that the decedent died intestate, leaving no husband or kindred and no heirs to take her estate, or any portion thereof, under section 1386 of the Civil Code. It alleged that the state was therefore entitled to the whole of the property of deceased by escheat for the benefit of the common schools, and prayed distribution accordingly. Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 10. The court, after hearing, found "for the people of the state of California upon the issues joined," and directed the payment of the moneys of the estate to the Treasurer of the state of California. From this decree Arthur L. Piper as administrator, Arthur L. Piper in his personal capacity, and the other children of Jerome Piper, deceased, brother of A. Dana Piper, take this appeal.

It is urged by respondent that the appellants have no standing in this court, in that they do not show themselves to be parties aggrieved, and the contention of respondent in this regard must be sustained. The only point presented by the appellants upon their appeal is that the court had no jurisdiction to enter the decree, under the authority of People v. Roach, 76 Cal. 296, 18 Pac. 407; Estate of Porter, 129 Cal. 90, 61 Pac. 659, 79 Am. St. Rep. 78; and Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 356, 70 Pac. 459. But, unless these appellants are parties aggrieved, within the meaning of section 938, Code Civ. Proc., it cannot matter to them what decree the court may have entered, and the proposition which they present for consideration, not affecting any interest of their own, is but a moot question. The findings of the court are conclusive against them as to the character of the property left by the deceased, and as to their alleged relationship. While by section 648, Code Civ. Proc., no particular form of exception is required, yet there must be some exception to the decision, when the exception is based upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict or decision, and the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient. The bill here presented contains no specifications of error, no objections for the insufficiency of the evidence. The findings of the court deny to them their asserted right of succession, and these are not objected to. Such being the case, it cannot matter to them what may be the form of the decree which the court has entered. They are not parties aggrieved. A similar question was presented in Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522. There the court found the plaintiff to be the daughter and sole heir of the deceased, and that certain claimants were in no way related to the deceased. These findings not being assailed and overcome, it was here held that the appellants were not aggrieved, and could not be prejudiced or aggrieved by any ruling made by the court in favor of plaintiff, and had no standing as appellants from the decision and judgment in her favor. The administrator in his representative capacity, of course, cannot prosecute the appeal. Estate of Williams, 122 Cal. 76, 54 Pac. 386.

For the foregoing reasons, the court declines to consider the proposition presented by appellants upon their appeal, and the decree appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1905.)

CORPORATIONS—CAPITAL STOCK—INCREASE—NOTICE OF MEETING.

Under Const. art. 1, § 22, declaring that the provisions of the Constitution are mandatory and prohibitory, unless expressly declared otherwise, article 12, § 11, prohibiting any increase of the capital stock of the corporation without the consent of the holders of the majority of the stock, at a meeting called for that purpose giving 60 days' public notice, as well as Civ. Code, § 359, making substantially the same requirement, must be construed as prohibiting an increase in capital stock without the 60 days' notice, even though all the stockholders are present at the meeting and consent to the change.

In Bank. Mandamus by the Navajo Mining & Development Company against Charles F. Curry, Secretary of State. Writ denied.

Chas. H. Braynard, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding in which a California corporation seeks to compel the respondent to file and issue certificates of increase of its capital stock. An alternative writ of mandate was issued upon the filing of the petition, and the respondent submits the controversy upon his general demurrer thereto for want of facts to justify the issuance of the writ. The facts are that the petitioner, having been originally organized with a capital stock of only $75,000, became desirous of increasing the amount to $1,000,000. To carry out this object a meeting of the stockholders was convened at the offices of the company, in pursuance of a resolution of the directors, for the purpose of considering the expediency of the proposed increase, and at said meeting the holders of all the issued stock were present in person or by proxy, as well as all subscribers for stock; and they all signed a written consent to the proposed increase on the record of the meeting. In short, the proceedings required for effecting an increase of the stock of a corporation were regularly pursued in every respect as prescribed by section 359 of the Civil Code, except that the public notice therein specified was not given. A certificate in proper form of what was done was delivered to the respondent, and the fees for filing were duly tendered; but he refused to file the certificate, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that the whole proceeding was invalid for want of the statutory notice by publication in a newspaper of the call for the stockholders' meeting.

The contention of the petitioner is that the actual attendance and consent of all the holders of and subscribers for its stock rendered the failure to publish notice of the meeting immaterial, that the statutory and constitutional requirement of published notice in such cases is wholly for the benefit and protection of the stockholders, and that, when the sole object of the notice has been accomplished by the voluntary attendance of all interested parties, the statutory provision for published notice should be held directory and not imperative. There is both reason and authority to sustain this contention as applied to a statute; but in this state we have not only a statute to construe, but a constitutional provision which in express terms prohibits any increase of the capital stock of a corporation, "without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock at a meeting called for that purpose, giving sixty days' public notice, as may be provided by law." Article 12, § 11. A provision of the Constitution of Missouri substantially identical was held by the Supreme Court of that state to be directory. Riesterer et al. v. Horton Land & Lumber Co., 160 Mo. 141, 61 S. W. 238. But we could not place the same construction upon the above-quoted provision of our Constitution, without disregarding, not only its expressly prohibitory terms, but also the rule prescribed by the Constitution itself for the effect to be given to its provisions. Article 1, § 22.

If it be conceded that the requirement is unduly rigorous we are, nevertheless, not at liberty to hold it directory merely. As a part of the Constitution prohibitory in terms, it is necessarily prohibitory in effect, and the failure of petitioner to observe its requirements rendered the attempted increase of its capital stock absolutely void. It would, therefore, have been a vain act to file the certificate, and, since mandate will not issue to compel the performance of a vain act, the writ must be denied and the proceeding dismissed.

It is accordingly so ordered.

WELCH v. GILLELEN. (L. A. 1,394.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 28, 1905.)

1. Corporations—Stockholders—Names on Books.

Civ. Code, § 322, declaring one to be a stockholder whose name appears on the books of the corporation as such, applies only to one who knowingly or voluntarily permits his name to so appear.

2. Same—Ratification.

Where the secretary of a corporation, on being directed by the pledgee of stock to issue a certificate to him as such, entered his name on the books as a stockholder, and issued a certificate to him as such, he did not ratify the act of the secretary, so as to make himself a stockholder as to creditors of the corporation, by retaining the certificate; he having offered it to the secretary to correct, and having retained it temporarily only on the repeated refusal to correct it till return of the vice president to sign a new certificate.

3. Same—Laches—Estoppel.

It is not laches, estopping one to deny his liability as a stockholder to creditors of a corporation, who became such after his name appeared as a stockholder on the books of the corporation, but without knowledge of that fact, that there was a delay of four weeks in having the entry corrected; he having, on the day after the secretary erroneously issued a certificate of stock to him as a stockholder, instead of as a pledgee of stock, applied to the secretary for correction of the mistake, and the secretary having promised this as soon as the vice president returned, so that he could sign a new certificate, which they supposed necessary before correction could be made on the books.

Oscar A. Trippet, Lawler & Allen, and Graves, O'Melvey & Shankland, for appellant. Borden & Carhart, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought by a creditor of the Ivanpah Smelting Company, a California corporation, to recover from the defendant his proportionate liability as a stockholder of said corporation under section 322 of the Civil Code. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and from said judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

The evidence shows that Blasdel and Sisson purchased certain stock of the Ivanpah Smelting Company, and to make payment therefor borrowed from defendant, the president of the Broadway Bank & Trust Company of Los Angeles, moneys sufficient to meet the purchase price, and, as collateral security for the loan, the certificates of stock in said corporation, representing in all 908 shares, were indorsed by him to defendant. Blasdel subsequently died, and Sisson, being interested in the stock indorsed by Blasdel to defendant as collateral, insisted that defendant should return said certificates to the corporation, and have reissued to him in place thereof a certificate showing the true nature of the transaction under which he held them, namely, that he held them in pledge. In conformity with this request defendant on February 27, 1902, called at the office of the Ivanpah Smelting Company in Los Angeles city, and presented to and left with the secretary of the company the various certificates indorsed to him by Blasdel, and requested the secretary to make out a new certificate in his name as pledgee. On the evening of that day he told the cashier of the bank to call at the company's office and bring back the new certificate, which he had asked the secretary to issue. The secretary of the company, in violation of the instructions defendant had given him and without any authority, issued a certificate in the ordinary form in favor of the defendant individually, without it showing that he held the stock as pledgee, and upon the record books required by law to be kept the secretary made an entry showing the issuance of such an individual certificate. Neither the certificate nor any of the books recited or indicated the true character under which he held the stock. The cashier of the bank, having no knowledge of the directions given by the defendant to the secretary as to the kind of certificate he desired issued, receipted for the form of certificate delivered to him by the secretary and returned with it to defendant. Defendant, discovering the error in the certificate, went the next day to the secretary, called his attention to the error, and asked him to correct it by inserting in the certificate the word "pledgee," as he had in the first instance requested him to do. The secretary said he could not make the change, on account of the other officers of the corporation not being present. Within a week afterwards defendant again called on the secretary to have a new certificate issued showing the true nature of the transaction, and was again told that, owing to the absence of the vice president of the company (the president being dead), he could not issue it until the vice president was present to sign it. At this visit the defendent tendered the secretary the erroneous certificate for correction, but, on his statement that he could not correct it until the vice president came to the office (which the evidence shows was at uncertain intervals), defendant retained the certificate and placed it with his papers in the bank. He spoke to the secretary several times upon the subject of issuing a new certificate to correct the old one, receiving the same assurance that it would be done when an officer came in. Nothing was in fact done to that end till May 15, 1902, when the secretary canceled the erroneous certificate, issued to the defendant another certificate showing the true character in which he held the stock—as pledgee—and made the proper entry upon the books of the corporation. The defendant never subscribed for any stock in the Ivanpah Smelting Company, nor did he in fact own any stock in it. He attended no meetings of the board of directors of the corporation, participated in no transactions in which the corporation was involved, received no dividends, nor did any act asserting a stockholder's right in the corporation. There is no question in the case but that upon his first visit to the secretary of the corporation the defendant requested him to make out the certificate which he desired issued to him, so as to show that he held the stock as a pledge. The failure of the secretary to do so is doubtless attributable to the fact that he was hard of hearing and did not understand the directions of defendant, and, as the certificates indorsed by Blasdel to the defendant indicated on their face an absolute transfer of the stock to him, the secretary, in issuing a certificate upon surrender thereof, assumed that it was to be made in favor of the defendant individually, and so issued it. The credit extended to the Ivanpah Smelting Company sued upon in this action was given between March 1 and March 24, 1902, a considerable portion within 16 days after the issuance of the erroneous certificate to the defendant by the secretary, and all of it within four weeks thereafter. These constitute the material facts in the case.

It is first insisted by appellant, notwithstanding the evidence without contradiction shows that respondent never was in fact the owner of any stock in the Ivanpah Smelting Company, and his name was entered on the books of the corporation and the certificate made out in his name as a stockholder without authority and against his express directions, that nevertheless he was in law a stockholder under section 322, Civil Code, of this state, which declares one to be a stockholder whose name appears upon the books of the corporation as such. And in this connection it is insisted that the mere appearance of his name on the books as a stockholder is conclusive of his liability. There is, however, nothing in the section which makes the entry on the books conclusive on the subject. It simply says that one shall be deemed a stockholder whose name appears on the books as such. While this language is quite broad, it must be interpreted in harmony with justice, and in accord with the rule, which universally applies, as to the effect which is to be given to entries in corporate books purporting to show who are the stockholders of a corporation. When the section declares that one shall be liable as a stockholder who appears upon the books to be such, it means one who knowingly or voluntarily permits his name to appear thereon as a stockholder. When it so appears, the presumption is that he occupies the relation to the corporation which the books indicate. The entry is, however, not conclusive, but presumptive merely. This is the general rule, and there is nothing in the terms of our section to take this case out of it. The general construction of the section in question contended for by appellant, if it were sustained, would necessarily preclude one from showing that, while upon the face of the corporate books he appeared to be a stockholder, yet in fact he was not; that he had never owned or subscribed for any stock, or authorized the issuance of any to him by the corporation. A construction which would lead to this result cannot seriously be considered. The relation of stockholder to a corporation is one of contract, either express or implied. It only exists when a party has either expressly consented to become a stockholder, or his conduct is such that in law his consent will be implied. He cannot be made a stockholder, and liable to the creditors of a corporation, without his consent, simply because an officer of the corporation has without authority, or in direct violation of his instructions, entered his name upon the books of the corporation as a stockholder and caused stock to be issued in his name as such. Nor does the entry of his name in the books as a stockholder preclude him from showing that in fact he was not a stockholder, and that the issuance of stock in his name was unauthorized. Mudgett v. Horrell, 33 Cal. 25; O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 529, 44 Pac. 227; Hunt v. Seeger, 91 Minn. 264, 98 N. W. 91; May v. Genesee Bank, 120 Mich. 330, 79 N. W. 630; Glenn v. Garth, 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649; 31 N. E. 344; Foote v. Anderson, 123 Fed. 659, 61 C. C. A. 5; Clark & Marshall on Private Corp. §§ 795, 816, 819. Now, within this rule, as the evidence conclusively shows that there was no express consent on the part of respondent to become a stockholder, that he intended merely to have the books of the corporation show the true condition under which he held the stock (as pledgee), and that the issuance to him individually of the certificate and the entry of his name on the corporate books as a stockholder, were without authority on the part of the secretary, and against his express instructions, the judgment of the lower court was right, unless the further point made by appellant can be sustained.

In that regard he insists that, notwithstanding the want of authority in the secretary to enter the name of respondent in the corporate books as a stockholder or to issue the certificate to him individually, and that these things were done against his express instructions, yet by accepting and retaining the certificate he ratified the action of the secretary, and by failing to use ordinary diligence to have his apparent relation as stockholder to the corporation effaced on the corporate books and changed in the certificate, he is estopped as against creditors from disclaiming that he is a stockholder. The legal propositions suggested by appellant in this contention are sound, but the evidence does not warrant their application. There is no evidence in the case tending to show ratification. The retention by respondent of the erroneous certificate did not have that effect. It was offered to the secretary for correction, and, upon his refusal to correct it until the vice president came in, the respondent temporarily retained it. This retention had no significance as evidence of ratification, in view of its production at all times to the secretary for correction, and the persistent disavowal and repudiation of it by respondent, as not being the certificate which he had requested to have issued, and which he at all times insisted on having corrected. Nor is there anything showing the respondent guilty of laches in failing to have a change of the entries in the books of the corporation made after discovery of the error committed by the secretary in issuing the certificate. We speak of changes in the entries on the books as something distinct from the change in the erroneous certificate, because the case of Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, indicates quite clearly that all a pledgee is entitled to demand of the corporation is an entry upon its books showing the true character under which he holds the stock, and that he is not entitled to the issuance of a certificate of stock indicating that character. In the case at bar both the respondent and the secretary thought that the proper method to pursue was to issue a new certificate on surrender of the old one. This belief, however, is not of much importance. When the respondent presented the old certificate, and requested the secretary to issue him a new certificate as pledgee, it was the duty of the secretary, under the rule laid down in Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, supra, notwithstanding he thought it proper to issue a new certificate, to have made, in addition to such issuance, proper entries on the transfer and stock books showing that the stock was held by respondent as collateral security. No matter in what form he might have issued the new certificate to the respondent, it was the duty of the secretary to have made the proper entries in the corporate book, so as to show the true relation of respondent to the stock, which was the declared purpose respondent had in view when he called on him to issue the new certificate. If this had been done, this trouble could not have arisen. The true nature of the transaction would then have properly appeared upon the corporate books, and the form of the certificate would have been immaterial.

Now, to return to the matter of laches: The respondent certainly made prompt effort to have the error committed by the secretary in the issuance of the certificate corrected, and was persistent in his efforts in that behalf from the date of the discovery of the error up to the time of correction. If he had permitted any unreasonable time to elapse after the discovery of the error before he sought to have the mistake rectified, there would be some excuse for the claim that he was negligent; but the evidence discloses nothing of the kind. He seems to have been actively insistent during the whole time in having his true relation to the stock correctly appear upon the books of the company. It is apparent, as a fact, that respondent never held himself out as a stockholder, or that he had any intention of doing so. The most that can be urged against him is that, relying upon the assurance of the secretary of the corporation that the error which had been made would be corrected when the vice president came in and the proper certificate could be signed by him, he for the period in March during which credit was extended by appellant to the corporation permitted the secretary to erroneously hold him out as a stockholder. This, however, was not respondent's fault. He promptly disavowed ownership in the stock, and was continually seeking to have the error corrected, and his true status disclosed upon the books, as he was promised it should be.

It is insisted by appellant that respondent should have applied to the court for a writ of mandate to compel the secretary to perform his duty; but, in making such an application, it would have been necessary to aver that the secretary had refused on demand to make the proper entry. This the secretary never did refuse to do. Both of the parties, it is true, were honestly in error as to what was necessary to be done in order to effect the change. They assumed that the issuance of a new certificate was required, when all that was in fact necessary was for the secretary to make the proper entries in the books. But whatever was necessary the secretary had not refused to do. On the contrary, he promised to have the correction made, as it was believed it should be, by having a new certificate issued when the vice president was present to sign it. The respondent had a right to rely upon this promise and the apparent willingness on the part of the secretary to have the error corrected, without being driven to the necessity and expense of appealing to the courts for redress. It was expected by both parties that this error would be corrected more speedily than it was; but the simple fact that it was delayed somewhat longer than was anticipated we do not think, under all the circumstances disclosed in the case, would warrant holding that there was an unreasonable delay in accomplishing it. It is not pretended that appellant had any knowledge that respondent appeared on the books as a stockholder, or that in fact credit was extended to the corporation on the faith of his appearance on the books as such. Nearly one-half of the indebtedness against the corporation was created the next day after the respondent discovered the error committed by the secretary in the issuance of the new certificate, and the rest of the indebtedness within 25 days thereafter. Certainly no laches could be charged against respondent in not having brought an action before the earlier part of the indebtedness was created, and if brought at any later period in March it would have been hardly possible to have obtained an alternative writ, a hearing, and the award of a peremptory writ between the discovery of the commission of the error in issuing the certificate and the creation of the indebtedness sued on. Under such circumstances the appellant could hardly be heard to say that he was injured by the delay, even if it was not otherwise excusable. Whether laches exists or not is to be determined from the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. There can be no inflexible rule laid down. One whose name is placed upon the corporate books as a stockholder without authority must be extended reasonable time within which to have the erroneous entry corrected, and it cannot be said in the case at bar that the delay of four weeks in accomplishing that result was unreasonable so as to constitute laches.

The authorities cited by appellant to sustain his general contention in this case have no application. In those cases the party asserting that he was not a stockholder and so endeavoring to avoid liability to creditors of the corporation had either knowingly and voluntarily assumed that position upon the books of the corporation, or, if he had not originally done so, yet from his conduct in dealing with the stock certificates issued to him, or with the corporation after the knowledge of the issuance of the stock to him, was estopped from repudiating that relationship. In Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 593, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, and Hurlburt v. Arthur, 140 Cal. 103, 73 Pac. 734, 98 Am. St. Rep. 17, relied on by appellant, it appears that the defendants there were within the class of those who knowingly and voluntarily assumed the relationship. In the one case, Babcock was not an owner as to part of the stock standing in his name, but held it for the accommodation of others; and in the other case, Miller, while the books showed that he was an individual stockholder, in fact held the stock as collateral security. In O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 529, 44 Pac. 227, and Abbott v. Jack, 136 Cal. 510, 69 Pac. 257, while the defendants claimed that they had never authorized the issuance of any stock in their names, they were nevertheless held estopped, by their conduct in dealing with the certificates issued, from asserting as against the creditors of the corporation that they were not stockholders.

It will be readily seen upon an examination of those cases that they have no application here. Respondent in the case at bar, as we have seen, neither authorized the issuance of the stock in question to him individually, nor did any act after it was erroneously issued which would estop him from showing that its issuance was unauthorized, and that in fact he never was a stockholder, or liable to the creditors of the corporation as such.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re ARNOLD'S ESTATE. (L. A. 1,719.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONTEST—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

In determining whether the evidence of contestants in a will contest is sufficient to require submission to the jury, the same rule applies as in ordinary civil cases, so that all the evidence in favor of contestants must be taken as true, and all contradictory evidence disregarded, and, if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove contestants' case, it must be submitted to the jury.

2. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a will contest, evidence of undue influence held sufficient to require submission of the case to the jury.

3. SAME—UNDUE INFLUENCE—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—IGNORANCE OF FALSITY.

Where false representations were made to induce the cancellation of will and the making of a new one more favorable to the person making the representations, the fact that he believed some of the representations to be true did not render the will so procured valid.

4. APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—EVIDENCE NOT OBJECTED TO.

On appeal the admissibility of evidence admitted without objection will not be considered.

5. WILLS—CONTEST—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a will contest, it was claimed that the execution of the will and the revocation of a former one was induced by false representations that one of contestants who was the general business manager and trustee for testatrix had abused the trust reposed in him, evidence by contestants of the extent and character of testatrix's estate in charge of contestant, of the general nature of the business transacted by him for her, and of the causes which led her to give him a power of attorney, was admissible.

6. SAME.

Evidence that the contestant in question had told the person who made the alleged false representations of the state of the business affairs of testatrix and of contestants' doings as her agent was also admissible.

7. SAME—MENTAL CAPACITY.

Evidence as to the reasons for testatrix's custom of having contestant as attorney in fact sign her checks was admissible to show her mental or business capacity.

8. SAME—PHYSICAL CONDITION.

Evidence of complaints by testatrix of failing eyesight and other bodily ailments, made as long as three years before the will was executed, was not too remote, but was admissible to show her physical condition and her dependence on others.

9. SAME—MOTIVE OF PERSON EXERCISING UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Evidence of the feelings of the person alleged to have made the false representations toward the contestant, and other facts and circumstances tending to show a motive inducing a desire for a new will, was relevant on the issue of fraud and undue influence.

10. SAME—FORMER WILLS.

Evidence that two former wills were substantially the same, and that shortly before the execution of the contested will testatrix had an unabated interest in two charitable institutions, for which she had provided in the two former wills and which she disregarded in the last one, was proper.

11. SAME—DECLARATIONS OF TESTATOR.

Whenever the declarations of the testator constitute narratives of the exercise of the undue influence, or of the effect of such influence upon him, they are inadmissible for that purpose, whether made before or after the execution of the will, but, if made at the time of its execution, they may be admissible, if they are so made as to constitute part of the res gestæ; and, if they are of such character that they also reveal his condition of mind, they may be admissible for that purpose, though not of the res gestæ, but their effect must be carefully limited to the question of his condition of mind, and they must not be considered as narrations of the exercise or effect of the undue influence.

12. EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OF DEPONENT.

Where the stenographer who took a deposition was called to testify to deponent's statements, it was error to refuse to allow her to testify to the questions in answer to which the statements of deponent were made.

13. SAME—EVIDENCE OF CONVERSATION.

Where, in a will contest, a witness testified to a conversation between himself and testatrix, it was error to refuse to allow him to give the statements made by him, and to confine him to what was said by testatrix.

14. SAME—DEPOSITIONS—PAROL PROOF—EFFECT.

Where the declarations made by a deponent, who was a party to the suit and was examined by the opposite party, were proved by the testimony of the stenographer who took the deposition, which was not itself introduced, the statements of deponent did not have the effect of testimony, but merely of declarations against interest.

15. WILLS—CONTESTS—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS TO TESTATRIX—PROOF.

Where, in a will contest, it was claimed that the execution of the will and the revocation of a former one were induced by false representations that one of contestants, who was the general business manager and trustee for testatrix, had abused the trust reposed in him, evidence by contestants that a deed to certain property from testatrix to contestant was made absolute in form because a person negotiating for the purchase of the property objected to a deed from a trustee was admissible to show the good faith of contestant.

16. SAME—KNOWLEDGE OF FALSITY.

There having been evidence that the person making the alleged false representations had told testatrix that a third person had stated that testatrix could not get the trust deed to contestant revoked without contestant's consent, testimony that the third person had made no such statement was admissible.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Proceedings by William H. Leonard and others to probate the will of Harriet M. Arnold, deceased, in which Alfred F. Rosenheim and others appeared as contestants. From a judgment granting a nonsuit and dismissing the proceedings in opposition to the probate of a will, contestants appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied September 29, 1905.

C. H. Rippey, Daney & Lewis, and Hunsaker & Britt, for appellants. Stearns & Sweet and W. J. Mossholder, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The contestants of the will of Harriet M. Arnold, deceased, appeal from a judgment of the court below granting a nonsuit and dismissing the proceedings in opposition to the probate of the will of the deceased executed April 25, 1903, and from the subsequent orders admitting said will to probate and appointing executors. The appellants assign as errors the granting of the motion for nonsuit and a number of rulings excluding and admitting evidence.

We think the judgment of nonsuit was erroneous. In determining whether or not, in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by the contestants is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury, the same rules apply as in civil cases. Every favorable influence fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the contestants. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the contestants. All the evidence in favor of the contestants must be taken as true, and if contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of the contestants all the facts necessary to make out their case, they are entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits. Vermont, etc., Co. v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143; Freese v. H. S. & L. Soc. 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; Hanley v. California, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 237, 59 Pac. 577, 47 L. R. A. 597; Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 522, 59 Pac. 937; Goldstone v. Merchants', etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; Pac. M. L. I. Co. v. Fisher, 109 Cal. 566, 42 Pac. 154; O'Connor v. Hooper, 102 Cal. 528, 36 Pac. 939; 2 Deering's Dig. p. 2105.

The petition for the probate of the will and for letters testamentary was filed by Wm. H. Leonard, Charles W. Buker, and C. A. Scott, who are the persons named in the will as executors. The testatrix died childless at the age of over 80 years, leaving surviving as her next of kin her sisters, Mrs. Buker, aged 78 years, Mrs. Wetterson, aged 75 years, and Mrs. Wheelock, aged 68 years, and two children of a deceased brother, namely, Wm. H. Leonard and Frank T. Leonard. Mrs. Wetterson has no child. Mrs. Buker has but one child, namely, the proponent Charles W. Buker. Mrs. Wheelock has two children, Frances W. Rosenheim and Benjamin A. Wheelock. Alfred F. Rosenheim is the husband of Frances W. Rosenheim. The estate of the deceased testatrix is conceded to be worth at least $140,000, and practically all of it was derived by her from the estate of her deceased husband, Benjamin R. Arnold, who died in 1898, a resident of San Diego county. The proposed will left seven-eighths of the stock in Pratt, Read & Company, a corporation, which comprised the principal part of the estate, to William H. Leonard, as sole trustee, in trust for the use of the three sisters and a nephew, Frank T. Leonard, during their respective lives, with remainder absolutely to certain named relatives. Under a former will, executed on April 7, 1902, similar trusts had been declared, but the property was to be converted into money and Alfred F. Rosenheim named as trustee and as coexecutor and co-trustee with Charles W. Buker. The former will also gave small specific bequests to Alfred F. Rosenheim and a legacy of $1000 to Alice C. Westgate in trust for charitable uses. A contest of the proposed will was filed by Alfred F. Rosenheim, Frances W. Rosenheim, and Louise A. Wheelock jointly, and Alice C. Westgate intervened and filed a separate contest. The principal grounds of opposition to the probate of the will were that its execution was procured by means of the undue influence of William H. Leonard, exercised over the testatrix for that purpose, and by means of fraud practiced on her by him.

It is not necessary to state at length the various circumstances tending to prove the undue influence and fraud charged. The direct and circumstantial evidence, together with the inferences and presumptions arising therefrom in favor of the contestants, tended to prove that the contestant Alfred F. Rosenheim, after the death of Mrs. Arnold's husband, and until the visit to her by Leonard in February, 1903, had been her trusted business manager, in charge of her affairs, and had possession of and title to nearly all her property, in trust for her use and for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of her last will after her death; that he was consulted about the making of the will of 1900, and the later will, dated April 7, 1902, above mentioned, which, in addition to the provisions above stated, also gave a legacy of $1,000 to the Young Men's Christian Association; that her feelings toward Rosenheim and his wife were very cordial and friendly, and she reposed in him the utmost confidence, and that he was entirely worthy of her trust and confidence, and faithful to her interests in all his dealings with her property in his charge; that Mr. Leonard, during his visit to her, extending from February 4, 1903, to early in May of that year, upon discovering the existence of the trusts committed to Rosenheim and the will of 1902, immediately began to instill into her mind suspicions of the good faith and trustworthiness of Rosenheim, and false impressions as to the legal effect of the several instruments creating the trusts under which Rosenheim held the property, finally causing her to believe that Rosenheim had actually deprived her of all her property, that she had nothing left of all the large estate received from the estate of her deceased husband, that he was dishonest and had deceived her, and was unworthy of her trust or confidence; and that under the influence of this unfounded belief she had executed the will of April 24, 1903, in which she did not mention Mr. Rosenheim at all, and by which she made Leonard an executor and sole trustee, and practically substituted him in the position of trust that by the former will was to be occupied by Rosenheim and Buker, and also omitted the charitable legacies to Alice C. Westgate and the Young Men's Christian Association contained in the prior will. There were circumstances from which it might have been inferred that Leonard had by these means obtained great control over the mind and actions of the testatrix, and that he was acting in bad faith for the purpose of procuring the new will to be made, in order to supplant Rosenheim and promote his own advantage. Some of the evidence, it is true, was capable of a different construction, and there was little, if any, direct evidence as to the motives of Leonard, or as to the actual operation of the undue influence. If a jury, upon the evidence given, had found in favor of the disputed will, we might not be disposed to disturb the verdict. Questions involving motives and inferences to be deduced from circumstances are, within reasonable bounds, exclusively within the province of the jury, or the trial court when sitting without a jury, and under the rules regarding the granting of a nonsuit they must all be resolved, so far as possible, in favor of the contestants. It would not be unreasonable to conclude, upon all the facts and evidence before the jury, that the will in question was not the natural result of the uncontrolled will of Mrs. Arnold, but the direct result of the fears exerted, false beliefs engendered, and sinister influence exercised over her to that end by William H. Leonard. Upon such a case it is error to grant a nonsuit.

It is asserted that Leonard himself believed that the legal effect of the instruments creating the trusts in Rosenheim was as he represented it to be. Even if he did believe this to be the true construction, it would not necessarily alter the case. If he was acting in bad faith for the purpose of procuring the execution of the new will, the fact that he actually believed to be true some of the false representations by which he obtained the undue influence required would not make the transaction an innocent one, nor render a will so procured valid.

Before the trial the contestants caused the deposition of William H. Leonard to be taken in the cause before a notary public in San Diego, who was also a stenographer and took down the deposition in shorthand, afterwards transcribing it into typewriting. At the time of the trial Leonard was present, and the deposition was duly signed, certified, and on file. The contestants did not call him as a witness, nor read the deposition, or any part thereof, in evidence. They pursued the somewhat unusual course of producing the notary as a witness and causing her to testify before the jury to certain parts of the testimony of Leonard contained in the deposition, refreshing her memory from her shorthand manuscript. Counsel for the proponents insist that such evidence is incompetent; that upon a proceeding to contest a will the several proponents, or one of several legatees or devisees, are not jointly interested, so as to make the declarations or admissions of one competent evidence against the others; and that one named as executor, who also petitions for the probate of the will, does not represent the legatees or devisees to the extent that his declarations can be proven to show that the will was procured by undue influence or fraud, although he is also the party charged with the fraud and undue influence, and to some extent benefited by the disputed will. The question is argued by both parties, and counsel for contestants especially urge a decision thereon, because it will arise upon another trial of the case. The authorities are very conflicting on the question, and many of the decisions seem to have been not well considered. Mr. Underhill says that the majority of the cases reject such evidence. 2 Underhill on Wills, § 163. There is some doubt as to the accuracy of this statement. See 49 Cent. Dig. cols. 488–490. It is not necessary for us to decide the question, and we express no opinion concerning it. Proponents did not object to the testimony, and it was allowed to go to the jury, and was considered by the court in deciding the motion for a nonsuit. If timely objection had been made at the trial, the contestants, upon a decision against them, could have introduced in evidence the deposition, or such parts thereof as they deemed material, or could have called Leonard as a witness. The admission of the testimony made it unnecessary for them to do so. Under such circumstances, upon an appeal from the judgment of nonsuit, the proponents cannot be heard to say that the evidence was incompetent, and should not be considered by this court in determining whether or not the nonsuit was properly granted. Wright v. Roseberry, 81 Cal. 91, 22 Pac. 336. Upon another trial, if similar testimony is not permitted, and the contestants are unwilling to risk their case upon the proposition that such testimony is admissible, they may either examine Leonard as a witness or resort to the deposition on file.

Complaint is made of the exclusion by the court, upon objections by the proponents, of evidence of a number of other facts and circumstances which it is claimed would also tend to prove the undue influence and fraud alleged. In many instances these complaints are well founded, and in view of the probability of another trial it becomes necessary to notice these exceptions and point out the proper course to be pursued in the further progress of the case. We do not mean to be understood to declare with respect to some of these rulings that, if taken alone, they would be so injurious as to justify a reversal.

The court should have allowed the testimony offered by the contestants to show the extent and character of the estate of Mrs. Arnold, committed to the charge of Mr. Rosenheim, as agent and trustee, prior to the making of the disputed will, together with the causes which led her to give him the power of attorney, and the general nature and character of the business done by him for her after her husband's death and prior to the revocation of the power in April, 1903, including her consultations with him as late as March, 1903. The decision of the questions at issue depended largely on the degree of confidence and trust reposed in Rosenheim by Mrs. Arnold prior to the advent of Mr. Leonard, and upon the faithfulness and good faith of Rosenheim as steward of her affairs, and whether or not he was deserving of her confidence and trust, or was "crooked," as Leonard suggested to her, and also whether or not she was accustomed to attend to her business herself, or was capable of it without assistance, and on her affection and disposition toward Rosenheim. This evidence would have assisted in arriving at the truth on these subjects, and, if favorable to Rosenheim, would have been material to the case of the contestants; and after the court permitted the proponents, apparently for the purpose of showing Rosenheim's bad faith in receiving more than his services were worth, to introduce evidence that she had given him a large amount of valuable stock as compensation for his services aforesaid, the evidence of the character and value of the property and of the services named became proper to rebut the imputation of bad faith and dishonesty on his part. Too much detail need not have been allowed, but the court should have permitted sufficient evidence on the subject to put the jury in a position to judge fairly of the previously existing conditions. These propositions embrace a large number of the rulings complained of.

The evidence that Rosenheim, in the fall of 1902 and on previous occasions, informed Leonard of the state of Mrs. Arnold's affairs and of his doings as her agent, should have been admitted. It would tend in some degree to show Leonard's knowledge of the conditions existing when he arrived at her residence in 1903, and enable the jury to judge more intelligently concerning his actions and motives.

The reasons for Mrs. Arnold's custom, of having Rosenheim prepare and sign, as her attorney in fact, the checks used by her to pay her current bills, as stated by her at the time she began the custom, would tend to prove her mental condition or business capacity at the time, and proof of such statements by her should have been allowed. Evidence of her complaints of failing eyesight and other bodily ailments as far back as the year 1900 was not too remote, and should have been admitted to show her physical condition and dependence on others. Donnelly v. Rees, 141 Cal. 63, 74 Pac. 433.

The feelings of Leonard toward Rosenheim and the testatrix, and other facts and circumstances tending to show a motive inducing him to desire the execution of the new will, or that he was acting in bad faith in creating suspicion of Rosenheim in the mind of the testatrix, were relevant on the issue of fraud and undue influence, although such motive and bad faith would not of themselves be sufficient proof thereof. Estate of Betts, 113 Iowa, 111, 84 N. W. 975; Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 657, 24 South. 459; McLaughlin v. McDevitt, 63 N. Y. 219; 1 Wigmore on Ev. § 396. For these reasons the court should not have stricken out the evidence that Leonard knew that Mr. Rippey had been Mrs. Arnold's legal advisor at the time he called in another attorney, and should have allowed the testimony showing his refusal to answer the question whether or not, after he had obtained control of Mrs. Arnold's money, he had appropriated $400 of it to his own use by her direction, and his statements in regard to the monthly allowance made to him by the testatrix, his issuings of checks upon her account in favor of his own family, after he became her attorney in fact, his activity in instituting proceedings against Rosenheim, immediately after the last will was made, his declarations to his sister-in-law that he would break any will of Mrs. Arnold that did not provide for him, and the evidence that in 1901 Mrs. Arnold made a gift to him of $4,000, and that at Rosenheim's suggestion she made Leonard a monthly allowance of $75, beginning in 1901 and continuing up to April 1903, in connection with the letter written by Rosenheim in December, 1902, informing Leonard of the fact of his agency in the matter. The evidence of his use of her funds soon after the new will was made would also tend to prove his influence over her, if made with her knowledge, and his intentions if she was not informed thereof.

It was proper to show that the will of 1900 was substantially the same as that of 1902, and to explain the changes made by the latter. This would tend to show a more permanent and fixed state of mind of the testatrix with regard to her general plan for the disposition and administration of her estate as declared by those wills, prior to the execution of the disputed will, and bring out in a stronger light the significance of any changes therefrom in the will of 1903 in controversy, and to raise a greater probability that the latter was the product of fraud and undue influence. For the same purpose the contestants should have been permitted to show that shortly before the time of making the last will the testatrix was still as much interested and as favorably disposed as formerly toward the children's home carried on by Mrs. Westgate, and toward the Young Men's Christian Association. Both of these institutions were given legacies by the will of 1902, and neither was mentioned in the will in dispute.

It is claimed by the proponents that the declarations and acts of the testatrix, not constituting a part of the res gestæ and not made at the very time of the execution of the will in dispute, are not admissible to prove the exercise of the undue influence or the fraud charged. This proposition may be conceded to be correct. There is, however, a distinction between the effect of such declarations and acts to prove the undue influence and fraud and their effect to prove the state of mind of the testatrix. The distinction is clearly stated in the case of In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 301, 44 Pac. 577. The court say: "The external facts constituting the exercise of undue influence must be established by other evidence than the declarations of the testator. His declarations are incompetent to show either that the influence was exercised, or that it affected his actions, and are inadmissible, except as they may illustrate his mental state and give a picture of the condition of his mind contemporaneous with the declarations themselves. Whenever the condition of the mind is a fact which it is desirable to prove, it may be established by such evidence as is competent for that purpose. The mental condition of the individual is made manifest to others by his statements, declarations, conversations, as well as by his conduct, and, when the state of a testator's mind at the time of executing the will is the fact to be shown, his contemporaneous declarations or statements furnish the most satisfactory evidence of that fact." The question is also carefully considered by Mr. Wigmore in his work on Evidence (volume 1, § 230; volume 3, § 1738). Whenever the declarations of the testator constitute narratives of the exercise of the undue influence or of the effect of such influence upon him, they are inadmissible for that purpose, whether made before or after the execution of the will. If made at the time of its execution, they may be admissible, if they are so made as to constitute a part of the res gestæ; but, if not, although made at the time, they are no more competent than if made subsequently. If they are of such character that they also reveal his condition of mind, they may be admissible for that purpose, though not of the res gestæ; but their effect must be carefully limited to the question of his condition of mind, and they must not be considered as narrations of the exercise or effect of the undue influence. In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 26, 30 Pac. 101; Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 396, 73 Pac. 1081; Estate of James, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008; Estate of Gregory, 133 Cal. 137, 65 Pac. 315; Haines v. Hayden, 95 Mich. 347, 54 N. W. 911, 35 Am. St. Rep. 566; Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 664, 24 South. 459; Tyler v. Gardiner, 35 N. Y. 576.

Minnie Schaffnett, the stenographer who testified to portions of the examination of Leonard at the time he gave his deposition before referred to, was not allowed to testify to the questions put to Leonard by the attorney who conducted the examination, but was required to confine her testimony to the answers made by Leonard. C. H. Rippey also testified as a witness concerning the conversations between himself and Mrs. Arnold, the testatrix. He was not allowed to give the statements made by him to Mrs. Arnold in the course of the conversation, and his testimony was confined to the replies made by Mrs. Arnold. These rulings were erroneous. Occasionally it may happen, in a conversation or upon the examination of a witness, that a declaration by one party to the conversation, or the answer to a question put to a witness, may be so complete in itself that its full meaning can be understood without the aid of the remarks or of the question, as the case may be, to which it is addressed; but this is not usually the case, and the question or previous remarks should always be admitted in evidence, unless the court, having knowledge not disclosed to the jury, can see that the answer alone shows its full meaning.

The declarations of Leonard, made in his answers to the questions put to him in taking the deposition above mentioned, were, as we have stated, not introduced in the form of a deposition, but were proven by secondary evidence, consisting of the testimony of the stenographer who took them down in shorthand. Therefore, though they were made under oath, they did not have effect and were not admitted as the testimony of Leonard, but as his mere declarations or admissions against his interest. Consequently they were incompetent evidence of statements made by Mrs. Buker in regard to the execution of a trust deed by Mrs. Arnold and Rosenheim, or of any independent facts in his own favor, brought out in his cross-examination of Miss Schaffnett or afterward, and not connected with his declarations introduced by the contestants on her examination in chief. The objections of the contestants to the evidence of such declarations should have been sustained.

The evidence that the deed of Mrs. Arnold to Rosenheim and his declaration of trust in her favor were read over to her at the time they were executed on April 14, 1902, and her statements at that time as to their purpose and effect, were competent and relevant to show her failing memory and weakness of intellect in April, 1903, when she seemed to have forgotten them entirely and appeared to be unable to comprehend them when they were again read to her.

The contestants should have been allowed to prove, if they could, that the deed to Rosenheim was made absolute in form because of the fact that a person negotiating with Mr. Scott for the purchase of some of the San Diego real estate had expressed an objection to accepting a deed executed by an attorney in fact. This circumstance was pertinent to show the good faith of Rosenheim, and to repel any inference of an improper motive on his part with respect to the execution of the deed to her absolute in form. They should also have been allowed to show that Mr. Rippey had not told Leonard or Mrs. Arnold that she could not get the trust deed revoked without Rosenheim's consent. Testimony had been given to the effect that Leonard had indirectly stated to Mrs. Arnold that Mr. Rippey had declared this to be the law with respect to the deed. Evidence to the contrary would have shown that Leonard was making false statements to her concerning the effect of the deed.

A number of other rulings are complained of upon which we express no opinion. They may not occur upon another trial, and the evidence excluded or admitted thereby was not of serious importance.

The judgment and orders appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

KENNEDY v. LEE. (S. F. 2,848.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1905.)

1. SALES—CONSTRUCTION—CONSIDERATION OF INSTRUMENT AS A WHOLE.

Where a contract of sale is not in form a unilateral bill of sale, but an agreement executed by the two parties, and containing covenants by each, the meaning of the parties and the legal effect of the contract are such as are disclosed by the whole instrument.

2. CORPORATIONS — SALES OF STOCK—CONDITIONAL SALE—NONPERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS.

A contract for the sale of corporate stock, which recites that the seller sells to the buyer, on the condition that the latter shall pay a specified sum therefor, on the happening of the conditions that the buyer shall obtain control of the corporation and shall within four years realize, by a sale of the property or earnings from a mine thereon, a designated sum, is a contract for the conditional sale of the stock, and on the failure of the buyer to obtain control of the corporation, or to realize the sum designated within four years, the contract will cease, and the ownership of the stock will remain in the seller.

3. SAME—NEW AGREEMENT—CONSIDERATION.

Where a contract for the sale of corporate stock was made on the condition that the buyer should obtain control of the corporation, and realize from the property or from a mine thereon a specified sum within four years, the execution of a new agreement, before the expiration of the four years, whereby the buyer agreed to pay for the stock whenever he secured the specified sum from a sale of the property, or from the mine thereon, was supported by a sufficient consideration, as it gave the buyer the right to continue to possess the stock, and the right to extend his opportunity to make a sale of the property or work the mine thereon.

4. CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION GIVEN BY PARTIES—EFFECT.

The construction which the parties give to a contract prevails, where the language used will reasonably allow such construction.

5. SAME — CONSIDERATION — PRESUMPTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 1614, a written contract is presumptively supported by a consideration, and hence the party asserting a want of consideration has the burden of proving it.

6. WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT—CONVICTION OF CRIME—FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

7. CONTRACT—ACTION ON—CONSTRUCTION BY PARTIES.

In an action on a written agreement, evidence that defendant construed the agreement as plaintiff did was admissible.

8. SALE — CORPORATE STOCK — CONDITIONS — BUYER'S USE OF STOCK.

The right of a seller of corporate stock, under contract stipulating that the sale was made on condition that the buyer should obtain control of the corporation, to recover the purchase price, was unaffected by the manner in which the buyer used the stock or manipulated other stock to obtain control of the corporation, where the rights of third persons were not involved.

Beatty, C. J., and Shaw and Angellotti, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Louise G. Kennedy against John Lee. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied September 29, 1905.

Jesse W. Lilienthal and Garret W. McEnerney, for appellant. Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, Mrs. Louise G. Kennedy, to recover of defendant $10,000 alleged to be due her upon two certain written agreements. The verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff in the trial court for the amount claimed, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On February 2, 1889, the plaintiff was the owner of 25,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation called the Big Canyon Gold Mining & Milling Company, being one-fourth of the entire capital stock of said corporation. On that day the plaintiff and defendant executed the first agreement here involved; plaintiff being the party of the first part and the defendant the party of the second part. In this instrument it is stated that plaintiff is the owner of said stock, and has "agreed to sell" the same to the defendant, and that defendant has "agreed to buy" the same from plaintiff "upon the conditions following: that the party of the second part shall pay to the party of the first part the sum of $10,000 in United States gold coin therefor, upon the happening of the following conditions." Then follow two main conditions, which are repeated in the latter part of the instrument, and are hereinafter quoted. The instrument then proceeds to state that for the consideration before mentioned, and $1, the party of the first part "sells to the party of the second part all her right, title, and interest in" the said 25,000 shares of stock, upon condition "that defendant shall pay to plaintiff $10,000," upon the happening of the following conditions: "First. That the party of the second part shall obtain control of the majority of the capital stock of said corporation, either by holding certificates of the shares of the capital stock of said corporation in his own name, or by holding proxies from the owners of any certificates of stock of said corporation, from the owners thereof, or by having the support of any of its stockholders of said corporation in obtaining a control of the majority of the shares of said corporation and controlling its management. Second. That the mining property of said corporation shall, within four years from the date of the execution of this agreement, realize, either by sale of said property, or by the earnings from the mine upon said property after the payment of all expenses and debts incurred in the working and development of said property and the mines therein, the sum of $45,000 in United States gold coin, and that said sum of $10,000 shall be payable to the party of the first part by the party of the second part only upon the happening of the two conditions last mentioned."

The certificate of the said stock went into the possession of defendant at the time of the agreement, and he did obtain control of a majority of the capital stock. But during the four years after the date of the agreement the said mining property did not realize, either by sale or by its earnings, the said sum of $45,000; but it is averred in the complaint that in January, 1893—before the expiration of the four years mentioned in said first agreement—the said parties entered into a second written agreement, by which the terms and conditions of the first contract concerning the time of the payment of said $10,000 were changed, and by which defendant agreed that he would pay said sum of money whenever he secured the $45,000 from operating said mine, or from the sale thereof or of the capital stock of said corporation, notwithstanding anything in the first contract to the contrary as to the time he should get said $45,000. This averment is denied by defendant; but the evidence on that issue, although to some extent conflicting, was clearly sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that such written contract was made as alleged. It is averred and admitted that afterwards defendant did sell the said mine and receive as the purchase price therefor $75,000, and that at the time of the commencement of this action he had received of said purchase money at least more than $45,000. If this second contract was a valid one, plaintiff has clearly the right to recover the $10,000, and the judgment is right.

But appellant contends that there was no consideration whatever for the second contract, and that therefore it was void. This contention rests upon the propositions that by the first agreement the whole title to the stock passed absolutely and unconditionally from respondent to appellant; that thereafter she had no further interest in it to transfer, or which could be the subject of a contract, or in relation to which appellant could receive from respondent any benefit which he did not already possess; that if appellant during the four years mentioned in the first contract should, by working the mine or by selling it, realize $45,000, respondent would be entitled to receive the $10,000, and if he did not, although he might have done so the next day, then respondent was to get nothing; that, in any event, appellant continued to be the absolute owner of the stock after the expiration of the four years; and that, therefore, there was no consideration for the second contract, and his promise therein was wholly gratuitous. In support of this view, appellant asked the court to instruct the jury "that by virtue of the agreement of February 2, 1889, the defendant in this case became the absolute owner of all the right, title, and interest that the plaintiff, Louise G. Kennedy had in the 25,000 shares"; and counsel for appellant say in their brief that "the said agreement as to the ownership of the shares constituted a present sale." We do not think that these propositions can be maintained.

If the contention above stated is maintainable, it must be upon the ground that the word "sells," used in the first agreement, does itself, by virtue of its technical legal significance, necessarily operate to completely and absolutely transfer the whole legal title to the property, and that this inevitable result is beyond the reach of any modification by any other language of the instrument; but the effect of an instrument is not always determined by any one of its words or phrases. The document in question here is not, in form, a unilateral conveyance, or assignment, or bill of sale. It is—as designated on its face—an "agreement" executed by two parties, and containing covenants by each; and in such case the meaning of the parties and the legal effect of the instrument are such as are disclosed by the whole instrument. Perkins v. Mettler, 126 Cal. 105, 58 Pac. 384; Rodgers v. Bachman, 109 Cal. 552, 42 Pac. 448. This rule of construction is well illustrated in Herryford v. Davis, 102 U. S. 235, 26 L. Ed. 160. In that case the question was whether, by the written instrument there involved, certain railroad cars were merely leased to a railroad company, or whether the title to the cars passed to the latter; and it was held that, considering the whole instrument, the title passed, the court saying: "Although the instrument industriously and repeatedly spoke of loaning the cars for hire, for four months, and delivering them for use for hire, it is manifest that no mere bailment for hire was intended." And in answer to the question what the true construction of the contract is the court said: "The answer to the question is not to be found in any name which the parties may give to the instrument, and not alone in any particular provision it contains disconnected from all others, but in the ruling intention of the parties, gathered from all the language they have used. It is the legal effect of the whole which is to be sought for. The form of the instrument is of little account." And so in the case at bar the answer to the question whether by the instrument here involved there was an absolute or only a conditional sale the intention of the parties "must be gathered from all the language they have used."

In Benj. Sales (7th Ed.) par. 320, the third rule for determining whether or not a sale is only conditional is stated as follows: "Where the buyer is bound by the contract to do anything as a condition either precedent or concurrent on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition is fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer." In the case at bar the buyer was certainly to do something before the title would pass. The language is that the party of the first part "sells" to the appellant "upon condition that the party of the first part shall pay," etc. The sale was therefore upon condition, clearly a conditional, and not an absolute, sale; and the title did not pass, and was not to pass, until the fulfillment of the conditions. And what were the conditions? Considering the contract as a whole, we think that the intentions of the parties, as expressed therein, were that the appellant was to have possession of the stock to assist him in getting control of the corporation and the mine; that, if he should succeed in doing so, then within four years he should realize out of the property by mining or by selling it $45,000, if he could accomplish that result, and pay to respondent $10,000, in which event the title to the stock would pass to him; and that, if he should fail to accomplish these results, or either of them, within the four years, then the contract would end, and the ownership of the stock would be where it was before the contract was made. It was based on the probability of these results being accomplished. The contract was executory and conditional, and the general rule as to such a contract is that the parties have the right to change it at any time during its life. But at all events in the case at bar there was clearly a consideration for the second contract in the fact that by it appellant was given the right to continue to possess and control the stock, and to extend his opportunity to make a profitable sale of the property, or to succeed in profitably working the mine. Moreover, this was the construction which the parties themselves evidently put on the first contract, for, in addition to the fact of the making of the second one, the preponderance of evidence shows that after the second contract appellant continued to recognize the interests of respondent in the stock; and the construction which the parties give to a contract prevails where the language used will reasonably allow such construction. Keith v. Electrical En. Co., 136 Cal. 181, 68 Pac. 598. Again, a consideration is presumed from the fact that a contract is in form a "written instrument" (Civ. Code, § 1614); and, while such presumption is often easily overcome, still the burden of doing so in the case at bar was on appellant, and we do not think that he has shown a want of consideration.

If the foregoing views are right—that is, if our construction as above stated of the first contract is correct—then the numerous exceptions of appellant to rulings of the court in the matters of instructing the jury, passing upon admissibility of evidence, etc., are easily disposed of. The court fully instructed the jury that plaintiff could not recover unless the second contract was in writing, and no error was committed in instructing or refusing to instruct on that subject.

There was no error in refusing to admit in evidence a record of a certain judgment rendered in a court of the state of New York, which was offered by appellant for the purpose of impeaching respondent's witness J. P. Kennedy. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the judgment was properly authenticated, it was inadmissible because it did not show a conviction of a felony.

The other objections were mainly to questions asked by respondent of witnesses bearing upon the issue of the execution of the second contract; and we think that the questions objected to were pertinent to that issue, and therefore admissible. It was proper for respondent to show the conduct of appellant, both before and after the second contract, as evidence that he understood that respondent had an interest in the stock under the first contract, which he could secure by the second contract, and that, after the date of the alleged second contract, he recognized her rights. All this tended to show that he construed the first contract as respondent did, and increased the probability that he executed the second contract. Neither are respondent's rights in the premises lessened or affected by the manner in which appellant used her stock, or manipulated other stock, in order to get control of the corporation. She gave him possession of her stock for the intended purpose, and there are no rights of third parties involved. There are no other points calling for special notice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1 Cal. App. 367

BUTLER v. DELAFIELD et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. PLEADING—ANSWER — INCONSISTENT DEFENSES.

The answer in an action on contract may deny the making of it as alleged, and in separate defenses admit its execution.

2. PARTNERSHIP—ACTION AGAINST PARTNERS —DESIGNATION AS "DEFENDANTS."

Where the complaint in its caption designates the parties defendant by their individual names, describing them also as copartners under the firm name given, and in its body alleges they are copartners, but thereafter refers to them as defendants, and the answer pursues the same course, the word "defendants" will be understood to refer to the parties defendant in their alleged relation to each other.

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—DEMURRER.

The improper overruling of demurrers to the answer for uncertainty and ambiguity, not having prejudiced any substantial right of plaintiff, is not ground for reversal of the judgment for defendants.

4. SAME—CONFLICT IN FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR.

There being no conflict in the findings as to the counterclaim on which defendants were given judgment, it is not ground for reversal that there was conflict in findings, by reason of the court finding certain paragraphs of the complaint untrue and certain paragraphs of the separate defenses to be true; the plaintiff having offered no evidence, so that it was the court's duty to find against him, and findings as to the defenses interposed as a bar being unnecessary after plaintiff's failure to offer proof of his allegations.

5. COUNTERCLAIM — CLAIM IN PARTNERSHIP CAPACITY.

Defendants, sued as partners, are properly allowed their counterclaim, a judgment against plaintiff in an action on a cause of action accruing to them in their partnership capacity, though in that action the individual members of the firm were plaintiffs.

6. JUDGMENT—PAYMENT—BURDEN OF PROOF —HARMLESS ERROR.

In a suit on a judgment, there being no evidence to rebut the presumption of nonpayment, so that proof of nonpayment is unnecessary, admission of improper evidence to prove nonpayment is harmless.

Rehearing denied August 22, 1905.

CHIPMAN, J. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Fresno county in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The complaint demands damages for the breach of a contract to take 30 car loads of dried prunes and advance thereon 75 per cent. of their market value, and to sell the same for a commission of 2½ per cent., and account for the proceeds received from the sale of the prunes, less advances, expenses, and commissions. It is alleged that plaintiff shipped the 30 car loads of dried prunes to defendants, and that defendants received and made the agreed advances on 15 car loads, but refused to receive or sell or make advances on the remaining 15 car loads, but left them uncared for, whereby they deteriorated in value, and plaintiff was compelled to employ other persons to sell the same, to his damage in the sum of $5,500.

In their supplemental and amended answer defendants deny making any agreement "that they would take and receive, or take or receive, 30 car loads of dried prunes on commission, or advance to the plaintiff 75 per cent. of the market value thereof, or care for or sell said prunes at the best or any market prices obtainable therefor, * * * less any actual expenses, * * * and the advances made to plaintiff on account thereof, and a commission of 2½ per cent. of the amount received therefor, and deny that said 2½ per cent. was to be retained by said defendants as full or any compensation for the services of said defendants in caring for and selling said prunes"; deny that plaintiff shipped to defendants "the 30 car loads of dried prunes in accordance with the contract set forth in said complaint," and that "as to the other 15 car loads of said prunes" deny that defendants refused to honor or accept or pay plaintiff's drafts for advances of "75 per cent. of the market value thereof," or that defendants refused "to receive or take, or accept or care for or sell the same, or permitted or allowed said 15 car loads of prunes" to remain uncared for until they were damaged, or that plaintiff suffered damage thereby. For a second defense, and in bar of the action, the answer alleges that defendants sued plaintiff in New York for $1,351.31, being the balance alleged to be due them for moneys advanced and paid for services performed by them for plaintiff, "under and in pursuance of the contract set forth in the complaint in this action," and that in the New York action plaintiff set up as a counterclaim "the same cause of action" against the defendants herein "as is alleged against them in the complaint in the present action," and that judgment was rendered in the New York action in favor of defendants herein (plaintiffs therein) and that said judgment has become final. For a "third defense" the answer sets up as a counterclaim the judgment in the New York action, and alleges that "no part thereof has been paid." The pleadings are verified.

The present plaintiff demurred generally to the answer, and to certain portions thereof he demurred on the further grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty. The demurrer was overruled, and the cause was tried by the court without a jury. Plaintiff offered no evidence in support of his complaint, whereupon defendants introduced in evidence an authenticated copy of the judgment roll and the judgment rendered in their favor in the New York action, and the deposition of the defendant McGovern as to the nonpayment of the New York judgment. The court gave judgment in favor of the present defendants for the amount of the New York judgment set up in the counterclaim. To the New York judgment, or to its validity, no objection was made when introduced, and no attack is made upon it in plaintiff's brief. Objection to McGovern's deposition was made, as will be hereafter noticed.

In its findings the court found the true name of John Doe Carey to be Frederick F., and that defendants "are, and at all and singular the times mentioned in the pleadings herein have been, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Delafield, McGovern & Co.," as alleged in the complaint and the answer; that "all and singular the allegations contained in paragraph 2 and 3 of the plaintiff's complaint are, and each of them is, untrue"; "that all and singular the allegations contained in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the defendants' supplemental and amended answer are, and each of them is, true." As conclusions of law the court found that defendants were entitled to judgment for the sum of $2,160.40, and costs, and that judgment be entered accordingly.

1. It is claimed that the demurrer should have been sustained, because the answer was ambiguous and uncertain, as it did not deny all of the specific averments of the verified complaint, but was only a denial of their literal truth. In some particulars this is true, but in others the denials were sufficiently specific. It was permissible to deny the making of the contract as alleged, and in the separate defenses admit its execution; for inconsistent defenses may be made, even where the pleadings are verified. Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935. There is no ambiguity in respect of the parties defendant. The complaint, in its caption, designates them by their individual names, describing them also as copartners under the firm name given, and the complaint contains an allegation that these individuals were copartners, but thereafter refers to them as defendants. The answer pursues the same course. The word "defendants" must be understood to refer to their alleged relation to each other. Hawley Bros. Hardware Co. v. Brownstone, 123 Cal. 643, 56 Pac. 468, cited by appellant, does not sustain their contention. In that case it was held that, where several defendants are sued by their individual names, and described as partners, they may be referred to as defendants. But the court held that in such case an allegation that "the defendant" had not paid certain notes sued on was an insufficient allegation of nonpayment as to all the defendants. Demurrers for uncertainty and ambiguity, when improperly overruled, do not always work a reversal of the judgment, and will not do so when it appears that the matters complained of by demurrer have not affected any substantial right of the demurrant. Gassen v. Bower, 72 Cal. 555, 14 Pac. 206; Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 532, 38 Pac. 410; Hawley Bros. Hardware Co. v. Brownstone, 123 Cal. 643, 56 Pac. 468; Stephenson v. Deuel, 125 Cal. 656, 58 Pac. 258; Williams v. Casebeer, 126 Cal. 77, 58 Pac. 380. In Stephenson v. Deuel, the court said: "The ruling upon demurrer to defendant's amended answer on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity cannot now avail plaintiff. The pleadings are verified, and defendants' answer is deemed controverted. Where there is an answer and trial on the merits, the court will not reverse the judgment for ambiguity and uncertainty, unless it clearly appears that demurrant was prejudiced by the alleged infirmity in the pleading." In the present case plaintiff could not have been misled by the denials in the answer, and as to the affirmative defenses pleaded, which were independent of and separate from, and might well be inconsistent with, the denials of plaintiff's complaint, the allegations were free from ambiguity or uncertainty. Plaintiff made no attempt by evidence either to support his complaint or to controvert the evidence in support of the separate defenses. Conceding more or less ambiguity in the denials of the answer, it is quite clear that plaintiff was not prejudiced by the overruling of his demurrer.

2. It is also contended that the findings are conflicting and uncertain. This contention arises from the fact that the court found certain paragraphs of the complaint to be untrue, and certain paragraphs of the separate defenses set forth in the answer to be true. Remembering that the plaintiff offered no evidence in support of his complaint, it was the duty of the court to find against him. The second defense was interposed as a bar to plaintiff's action, and no finding was necessary thereon after plaintiff's failure to offer any proof of his allegations. Coming to the findings on the counterclaim, arising out of the New York judgment, there is no claim of any conflict. Conceding certain conflict, as claimed by plaintiff, in respect of other findings, the findings sustain the judgment as rendered; for it rests on the counterclaim. Looking to the findings in their entirety, as we may do to support the judgment, we think them sufficient.

3. It is also contended that the findings are contrary to and not sustained by the evidence, because the court found that the firm of Delafield, McGovern & Co. was given judgment upon the New York judgment, while the judgment offered in evidence was in an action wherein the individual members of the firm were plaintiffs. The evidence shows that the cause of action sued upon in New York accrued in the partnership capacity of the then plaintiffs. They, as defendants in the present action, are sued in like capacity, and judgment is likewise given. There is no mistaking the fact that the defendants here and the plaintiffs in New York were the same.

4. Proof of nonpayment of the judgment, after the judgment had been duly proved, was not necessary. The burden of proof of payment was then upon plaintiff. 1 Jones on Evidence, §§ 52, 53, 176; Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142. The deposition of defendant McGovern was taken at Seattle and was admitted and read over the objection of plaintiff. His evidence was taken for the single purpose of proving nonpayment of the New York judgment. He testified that up to the time he left New York, in August, 1902 (long after the present action was brought), the judgment pleaded had not been paid. His testimony was competent as far as it went, but, of course, was insufficient to show nonpayment at any subsequent date. His statements that the judgment had not been paid since he left New York were hearsay and inadmissible. But nonpayment, we have seen, was presumed, and no evidence was offered to rebut that presumption. The error in admitting McGovern's deposition, if error, was harmless.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ALBERY v. GEIS.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

PARTNERSHIP—ACCOUNTING.

The judgment for plaintiff, in a suit between partners for an accounting, cannot be sustained because of failure to show a complete winding up of the firm's affairs; the finding merely being that plaintiff has received from moneys due the firm, in excess of expenditures made for it, a certain sum, and that defendant has received a certain greater sum, and there being no showing as to outstanding indebtedness of the firm, or as to any other claims or assets of the firm.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Chas. M. Head, Judge.

Wm. M. Finch, for appellant. Donohoe & Freeman, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. These parties are lawyers residing at the town of Willows, and on January 1, 1899, entered into a copartnership to practice law. The said copartnership was mutually dissolved January 1, 1903. The complaint herein alleges that the defendant has collected sums of money belonging to the late firm which he has not paid over. At the time of the dissolution there was no accounting nor disposition made of the assets of the firm, nor of the debts due the firm; but the parties did enter into an agreement whereby each should collect the debts due the firm, make statements thereof, and pay over to the other what might be due him. The complaint further alleges that the defendant has collected about $3,500, which he has not accounted for, and has not paid over to plaintiff his share, and then demands an accounting and judgment for whatever may be found due. The defendant admits, alleges, and also demands an accounting and judgment for whatever may be found due him from plaintiff. The judgment was a personal judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $200.39, and this appeal comes here upon the judgment roll alone.

Findings were made, and the only finding that there was any kind of an accounting of the partnership affairs is found in finding No. 4, as follows: "That during the term of said copartnership, and since the dissolution thereof, plaintiff has received from moneys due said firm the sum of $1,358.83, and has paid out on account of expenses of said firm the sum of $5.87, being $1,352.76 over and above what he has expended; that during said time the defendant has received from moneys due said firm the sum of $2,253.55, and paid out on account of expenses of said firm the sum of $500, being $1,753.55 over and above what he has expended, and being $400.79 in excess of that received by plaintiff." As conclusion of law the court finds that plaintiff is entitled to a decree, first, "for an accounting between plaintiff and defendant, which has now been had in the action." If anything is due either party in this action, it must be determined after a full and complete accounting of the copartnership affairs. The recitals of the finding do not show that any account has been taken of outstanding indebtedness the firm might be owing to any other person, nor of any claims the firm may have had against any person, nor of any firm assets, other than those mentioned in said finding, and no statement or finding that all the assets had been exhausted. An accounting means that there is to be a complete winding up of the affairs of the partnership.

Upon the authority of Clark v. Hewitt, 136 Cal. 77, 68 Pac. 303, the judgment herein must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. Justices of the Peace—Notice of Trial.
A defendant, who has been served with summons and who has appeared by attorney, is sufficiently notified by the justice of the time and place of trial, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 850, where the notice is given his attorney as such and the attorney notifies him.

2. Writ of Review.
Even if notice of trial served on a defendant in a justice suit is technically insufficient, he, having known of the judgment within two days of its rendition, so that he could have appealed, is not entitled to writ of review allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, when there is no appeal, nor any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Writ of review by William Grant and another against the justice's court of Second township, county of Tuolumne, and James G. Fallon, justice of said court. From a judgment dismissing the writ as to said William Grant, he appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Carlin and O. K. Cushing, for appellant. J. C. Webster, for respondents.

BUCKLES, J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of Tuolumne county dismissing a writ of review sued out in said court to review the judgment of the justice's court of Second township, of said county. There is no bill or statement, and the appeal will be heard on the judgment roll alone. The writ of certiorari was issued, and when the matter came on to be heard on the return the defendant moved to dismiss the writ, on the ground that the petition or record does not show facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the writ. It was thereupon stipulated in open court by the respective parties that the said motion to dismiss and the said cause be heard and submitted together.

The court found, among other things: "(2) That on or about the 27th day of June, 1903, an action was commenced by one Louis Lepape against the above-named plaintiffs and one Chas. E. Grant in the said justice's court, which said action is entitled 'Louis Lepape, Plaintiff, v. William Grant, George F. Grant, and Charles E. Grant, Defendants,' * * * brought to recover the sum of $106 and costs," for services performed, etc. In the fourth finding is the following: "That on the 22d day of July, 1903, a legal summons therein was duly served on said defendant William Grant in said county of Tuolumne; that thereafter, on July 30, 1903, Charles E. Grant, one of said defendants, appeared in court before the said justice, and on behalf of himself and William Grant and George F. Grant, his brothers and codefendants, made a verbal answer denying generally and specifically each and every allegation contained in said complaint of plaintiff; that said defendant William Grant had orally requested said Charles E. Grant to so appear and answer for him, and the said Charles E. Grant, in pursuance of said oral request and not otherwise, did appear and enter said answer as aforesaid, but said defendant George F. Grant had not authorized said Charles E. Grant to appear for him, nor had said George F. Grant been served with summons in said action." In the fifth finding is the following: "That on October 20, 1903, the cause was duly set for trial by the court for October 31, 1903, at 10 o'clock a. m., and notice of the time and place of trial issued in due form as required by section 850 of the Code of Civil Procedure, directed to the defendants above named and to Charles E. Grant, their attorney, which said notice of the time set for said trial was duly served upon Charles E. Grant as attorney for said defendants, and the proper return of service made thereon on October 20, 1903," by the constable. In the sixth finding there is the following: "That said William Grant, prior to the date of the trial of said action, received information from Charles E. Grant by telephone of the date fixed by said court for the trial of said action, and on October 27, 1903, said William Grant wrote a letter to said justice of the peace, and which said letter was received by said justice," wherein he calls attention to the fact of the said suit pending, that his brother Charles had been legally notified that the case was set for trial, and that he and his brother George F. knew it only by hearsay, calling the justice's attention to section 850, Code of Civil Procedure, and declared the case was set without consulting his convenience, and, as that date was not convenient to him, he would stand on his legal rights, and informing the justice, "I will be in Tuolumne county next week, and will then see counsel and arrange for a day of hearing that will be mutually satisfactory." It is further found by the court "that no request was made by defendant William Grant for a continuance of the trial of said action from October 31, 1903, to any other date." Finding seventh: "That on the 31st day of October, 1903, after receiving said letter, said cause came regularly on for trial, J. C. Webster, Esq., appearing as attorney for plaintiff, and Charles E. Grant, who had made answer for the defendants, as aforesaid, appeared and announced that he did not consider himself the attorney for the defendants, William Grant or George F. Grant; that no other appearance was made at said trial for said William Grant or George F. Grant, whose default for not appearing at the trial of said cause was entered. Evidence was adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, and, upon the evidence adduced, the court rendered its judgment therein in favor of said plaintiff, Louis Lepape, and against defendants William Grant and George F. Grant, for the sum of $106 and costs of suit, allowed at $6.50. The said Charles E. Grant testified and was dismissed as a defendant in said action." The eighth finding is that the said William Grant had notice of said judgment, and on the 2d day of November, 1903, telegraphed the said justice that "the judgment against me and my brother George is void, and you and your bondsmen are liable if same is enforced. See Elder v. Justice's Court, 136 Cal. 364, 68 Pac. 1022." The justice probably did see Elder's Case, but, if he did, must have concluded it had no application, for he proceeded to enforce said judgment by issuing execution, notwithstanding William's threat. I have quoted enough of the findings to determine whether the findings would warrant the judgment which the court made. It might be well to state, further, that the court found that the said judgment rendered by said justice was an appealable judgment, and that neither William Grant nor George F. Grant had appealed from the same nor any part thereof, and that more than 30 days had elapsed since the rendition and entry of said judgment, and before the filing of the petition for the writ of review herein.

As conclusions of law the court found: "That the petitioners are entitled to a judgment annulling the judgment entered by the justice of the peace of the Second township of Tuolumne county in favor of Louis Lepape and against Geo. F. Grant, and all subsequent proceedings upon said judgment as against said Geo. F. Grant; that all the proceedings had and taken in said justice's court in said action in favor of said Louis Lepape against said William Grant are hereby affirmed, and judgment accordingly so ordered; that the facts are not sufficient to support the writ of certiorari heretofore issued, as to William Grant, and defendants are entitled to a dismissal of the said writ, as to said William Grant." The superior court thereupon rendered its judgment annulling the judgment and subsequent proceedings of the justice as to the said George F. Grant, and affirming the judgment of said justice in said action in favor of said Louis Lepape and against said William Grant, and dismissing the said writ of review.

We think the findings support the judgment. The only question in the case of any importance is whether William Grant's notice that the case was set for trial in the justice's court was sufficient. and we think it was. While not a resident of Tuolumne county, he was served with a summons in that county, directed his brother to appear and answer for him, which his brother did, his brother was served as his attorney with the notice required under section 850, Code of Civil Procedure, stating the time and place of trial of the action, and his said brother notified him. If his notice was technically insufficient, he did know the trial was set to take place on a certain day, and he did know within two days after the judgment was rendered that it had been rendered, and he could have appealed, and we think that was his remedy for any error he complains of.

It is suggested that no presumption be indulged in in favor of the justice's court. There is no occasion to indulge in any presumptions in this case, for the record of the justice is before us in one of the findings of the court. We think, under all the circumstances of this case and appearing in the court's findings, the notice the appellant had of the time set for the trial in the justice's court was sufficient. In Jones v. Justice's Court, 97 Cal. 524, 32 Pac. 575, cited by appellant, the defendants had no notice that the case pending in the justice's court had been set for trial. In Elder v. Justice's Court, 136 Cal. 366, 68 Pac. 1022, relied on by the appellant, the party seeking the writ had no notice, or, in other words, the justice called his attorney up on the 'phone and stated to him that the attorneys on the other side desired to have the case set for trial on May 3, 1899, at 10 a. m. The attorney had but little recollection of the case, as the answer had been filed four years before, but replied that he did not know where the defendant was, but it was all right—to go ahead. Neither attorney nor defendant appeared at the trial. There was no showing, and no return of notice having been served. In Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 296, 50 Pac. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234, there was a return made that the service was made on the attorney; but the attorney was permitted before the superior court to testify that he did not know who signed the acknowledgment of service, and, in fact, he had never received notice of the time set for hearing, and upon this the lower court, on a writ of review, annulled the judgment of the justice's court. The supreme court reversed this judgment, holding that Dunn could not testify in a proceeding of this kind to impeach the service, and held there was evidence of notice having been served, just as there was in this case. So far as we have been able to ascertain, in all these cases where the writ of review has been held to be the remedy, it has been where there was no power of appeal, or where the time for appeal had gone by without fault of the petitioner. In fact, looking at the statute, we find the writ may issue where there can be no appeal, or when, in the judgment of the court, there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.

In this case the justice did not proceed to try the case without having first set the case for trial and notified the parties, and his record, which was certified up to the superior court, shows that notice of the time and place of trial was served upon the attorney of appellant, and it shows the evidence on which the justice acted in holding that notice was served as required under section 850, Code of Civil Procedure. There is no question but William Grant could have taken an appeal; for, as has appeared, he knew of the justice's judgment within two days after it was rendered. No litigant should be permitted the use of the writ of review where he has the right of appeal. Nor should he be allowed the writ where he slumbers on his right of appeal until the time in which he might take such appeal has gone by.

1 Cal. App. 349

W. & P. NICHOLLS v. MAPES.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1905.)

1. PROPERTY—TITLE.

Where H., being indebted to plaintiff, contracted to deliver to it 186 head of cattle on or before a certain date, and thereafter he purchased cattle for plaintiff with money advanced by it as plaintiff's agent on a salary of $50 per month, and that any profits made on the resale of such cattle should be credited on the balance due plaintiff on H.'s indebtedness, and that after payment of such indebtedness in full, with interest, the contract should terminate, cattle purchased by H. after the date for the delivery of the 186 head, and which were not a part of such amount, belonged to plaintiff as against the creditors of H., though he held possession and did not disclose his agency at the time he purchased the cattle.

2. CONVERSION—DAMAGES.

Civ. Code, § 2336, providing that the detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be, among other things, a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in the pursuit of the property, does not authorize the recovery of attorney's fees, either as damages or as costs in the action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trover and Conversion, § 258.]

3. SAME—DEPOSITIONS—DISBURSEMENTS.

An expenditure for depositions forms no part of the damages as such, but should be allowed in the cost bill.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelly, Judge.

Garoutte & Goodwin, for appellant. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover the value of certain six head of cows alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendant on April 26, 1901, at the county of Lassen. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment for the value of the cattle, with interest from the date of conversion, and for $25 "as compensation for the time and money expended by plaintiff in the pursuit of the property." Defendant appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

The court found as facts: That plaintiffs are copartners, doing business as bankers, in the town of Dutch Flat, Placer county; that on the date above named "plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to the possession of the six cows described in the complaint," and said defendant wrongfully converted them to his own use; that plaintiff has expended $25 in pursuit of said property.

1. Appellant challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that plaintiff was the owner of the property, and thus presents the principal question in the case. It appears that the cattle in question were in the possession of one E. H. Hamlin, and were attached at the suit of the present defendant against said Hamlin, and were purchased at execution sale by said Mapes, who now claims title through such purchase. Plaintiff claims that Hamlin was acting as its agent when he purchased the cattle, and hence its claim of ownership. Hamlin testified: "I was working for W. & P. Nicholls under a written contract." Again he testified: "Whatever purchase I made of those cattle was made in accordance with this contract—supposed to be." We think there is sufficient evidence to show that this contract was in force when the cattle were purchased by Hamlin, and the question of ownership must be determined from an examination of its terms and from such surrounding circumstances as may properly be considered in arriving at the intention of the parties to it. It is dated May 16, 1900, and reads as follows:

"This agreement, made this 16th day of May, nineteen hundred, between W. & P. Nicholls, parties of the first part, and E. H. Hamlin, Jr., party of the second part, is as follows: Whereas, the parties of the first part have advanced to the party of the second part divers sums of money from time to time to purchase cattle and pay the expenses of keeping the same, and for other purposes, and thereby the party of the second part has become indebted to the parties of the first part, and by a statement this day made, the party of the second part should have on hand 186 head of cattle: Now, for the purpose of paying said indebtedness, the party of the second part does hereby assign, sell, and transfer to the parties of the first part all accounts and demands of every kind which may be due him at this date, and also all live stock which he may now own, or may have the right to the possession of, or may have pledged for debt, or may have contracted to buy. The party of the second part hereby agrees and promises to deliver to the parties of the first part 186 head of cattle on or before January 1st, 1901, and the same, when delivered, shall be the property of the parties of the first part, and the proceeds arising from the sale of the same shall be paid to the parties of the first part, and credited to the accounts of the party of the second part, and applied upon the said indebtedness. And the parties of the first part shall have the right to collect all book accounts now due the said party of the second part, and the same, when collected, shall be applied upon said indebtedness. And for the purpose of paying said indebtedness, the party of the second part agrees to devote his undivided time, skill, and labor to the buying and selling of cattle, and for that purpose the parties of the first part will advance to him from time to time such sums as may seem to them reasonable for the purpose of buying stock and paying expenses connected with the keeping and selling of the same.

"The parties of the first part hereby employ the party of the second part to act as their agent and employé, and not otherwise, in the buying and selling of cattle, and agree to pay to him for said services the sum of fifty dollars ($50) per month, and his reasonable personal expenses; such employment to be continued for such length of time as may be agreeable to the parties of the first part. A statement shall be kept of all accounts from this date, and for that purpose a new account shall be opened between the parties hereto, and the amount of indebtedness existing at this date shall be charged on said account to the second party, and the amount realized from the sale of said 186 head of stock and the collection of book accounts now due him shall be charged against the same, and, if there shall remain a balance due the said parties of the first part, all the profits arising from the conduct of said business from this time forward shall be applied upon the payment of the amount due, and interest thereon at nine per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and, if not so paid, to be added to the principal and bear a like rate of interest, until the same is fully paid, and when the same is fully paid this contract shall cease. All stock shall be purchased and sold in the name of the parties of the first part, and the expenses of caring for, purchasing, driving, transporting, and selling of said stock, and the personal expenses of second party, and his said wages of fifty dollars ($50) per month, and interest at the rate of nine per cent. per annum, payable June 30th and December 31st of each year, and, if not so paid, to be added to the principal and bear a like rate of interest, on all advances, shall be first deducted from the proceeds of sales, and the balance, if any, shall be applied upon the said indebtedness.

"E. H. Hamlin, Jr.
"W. & P. Nicholls."

It appears that Hamlin had been engaged in the business of buying cattle in Lassen county and became indebted to plaintiff for advances of money. Hamlin had some cattle, and the contract recites that he "should have on hand 186 head." It was "for the purpose of paying" his "indebtedness" to plaintiff that the contract was entered into. Hamlin transferred to plaintiff all his interest in the cattle he then (May 16, 1900) owned and all accounts due him at that time, and undertook to deliver these 186 head of cattle to plaintiff on or before January 1, 1901, to be plaintiff's property when delivered; but the proceeds of their sale and of the book accounts were to be applied to Hamlin's indebtedness existing at that time. It may be inferred from the contract, as well as from the testimony, that these cattle and the book accounts were not deemed sufficient to pay the indebtedness of Hamlin to plaintiff, and it was therefore further agreed that Hamlin should continue the purchase of cattle, devoting his time exclusively to that business, and "for that purpose the parties of the first part will advance to him from time to time such sums as may to them seem reasonable for the purpose of buying stock and selling of the same." And to fix the relation the parties were to sustain to each other in this future business the contract next provides: "The parties of the first part hereby employ the party of the second part to act as their agent and employé, and not otherwise, in the buying and selling of cattle, and agree to pay him for his services the sum of $50 per month and his reasonable personal expenses," the "employment to be continued" as long as "agreeable to the parties," except that it was provided that upon plaintiff being fully paid "this contract shall cease." It was further expressly provided that "all stock shall be purchased and sold in the name of the parties of the first part," and "the expenses of caring for, transporting, and selling of said stock, and the personal expenses of second party, and his said wages of $50 per month, and interest * * * shall be first deducted from the proceeds of sales, and the balance, if any, shall be applied upon the said indebtedness." The evidence was that the 6 head of cattle were purchased by Hamlin and constituted no part of the 186 head, that he paid for them by check upon plaintiff, and that at that time he was still indebted to plaintiff. Both of the members of the plaintiff bank testified that they paid for and were the owners of the 6 head of cattle in dispute, and that Hamlin was in its employment, on wages. Hamlin testified that, when he purchased these 6 head of cattle, he said nothing to the vendor as to whom they were purchased for; that he sometimes bought cattle and sold them to butchers, stating that they belonged to plaintiff, and that he collected the money for plaintiff; at other times he sold to other butchers and collected the money without informing them who owned the cattle, and all this money was used in the business; that at times he used some of his own money for expenses, which he charged to plaintiff; and that plaintiff's books show the number of cattle purchased by him under this employment.

Defendant urges several considerations as showing that the court should have found from the evidence that the cattle belong to him. It is said that they were attached in Hamlin's possession which constituted prima facie evidence of title; that plaintiff failed to explain this possession because, as is claimed, plaintiff failed to show that the contract above referred to was in force when the cattle were purchased. It is true that the cattle in question were not purchased until after January 1, 1901, by which time Hamlin had agreed to turn over the 186 head. But it appeared that the business was continued after that date. Whether or not these 186 head were delivered to plaintiff does not appear, but it does appear that Hamlin was still in plaintiff's debt, and his checks were being honored under his employment. Hamlin's possession was explained by the contract and by the testimony. But, conceding this, appellant contends that it is not possible "to get out of the contract a construction which makes plaintiff the owner of the cattle." Considering the circumstances which to appellant's mind make this construction seems impossible, we see no particular significance in the fact that Hamlin did not explain to his vendor of the 6 head of cattle that he was buying them for plaintiff. If the vendor were the attaching creditor, he might urge the circumstances attending the sale as showing that Hamlin was the owner, without looking to Hamlin's principal, which latter he might also do. Civ. Codes, § 2336. But the vendor was paid by check on plaintiff, and Hamlin was not called upon to make any explanations, and plaintiff's rights cannot suffer because Hamlin did not disclose his principal. Nor do we see that the fact that plaintiff is to have interest for the use of its money, and Hamlin to have all the profits applied to paying his indebtedness to plaintiff, is inconsistent with the idea of plaintiff's ownership of the cattle. There were no profits in excess of the indebtedness, and we need not concern ourselves with the question of their disposition, had there been any such; for the contract provided that as soon as the indebtedness was paid the contract was to terminate.

It is contended that the contract was one for plaintiff's security, and that the cattle could not become a security until delivered to plaintiff. This may be true of the 186 head, for the contract provided that as to them they were to belong to plaintiff when delivered, their proceeds when sold to be applied to Hamlin's indebtedness. But as to the purchase of cattle in the future it was expressly provided that Hamlin should act as plaintiff's agent, should use plaintiff's money in making purchases for plaintiff, and, if there were any profits above the money so laid out and interest thereon, it was to be applied to Hamlin's indebtedness existing at the time the contract was made, and not to any new indebtedness; for none was to be created. and Hamlin's only obligations were such as arose out of the relation of principal and agent. It seems to us that the transaction was the not unusual arrangement by which the principal employs an agent to purchase and sell goods for him, the agent to be compensated out of the profits. In the present case the compensation or profits, if any, were to be applied to pay the agent's debt to the principal. It is quite true that the actual relation of the parties to each other must be judged from a fair construction of the entire contract and all the circumstances, and that the court is not bound to assume that there was the relation of principal and agent from the mere fact that the parties so described themselves. Stockton Sav. & L. Soc. v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 Pac. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210. Looking to all the provisions of the contract and the attending circumstances, we think it clear that the cattle in question were purchased by Hamlin as the agent of plaintiff, and that plaintiff was the owner at the time they were attached and sold to defendant. It does not appear upon what indebtedness the cattle were attached, nor under what circumstances nor when the indebtedness accrued. There is no evidence that defendant was in any way deceived by Hamlin in contracting the indebtedness for which the cattle were attached, nor that it had any connection with Hamlin's actual or ostensible relation with plaintiff, either in the purchase of cattle or otherwise; nor was there any concealment of the relation sustained by Hamlin and plaintiff, for the contract was duly recorded in the county where Hamlin bought the cattle, and on occasions he stated that he was buying for plaintiff, and it does not appear that he ever purposely concealed the fact of his agency. An agent is one who represents another, called the "principal," in dealing with third persons (Civ. Code, § 2295), and may be authorized to do any acts which his principal might do (Id. § 2304). In Loomis v. Barker, 69 Ill. 360, the proof was that certain horses belonged to appellee, and that at the time they were levied upon they were in the possession of one Cook as the general agent of appellee, who was authorized to sell them for appellee, and was required to account to him for the proceeds of sale. The court said: "This did not invest Cook with any title to the horses, so as to render them liable to be seized on execution or attached against him and sold for the payment of his debts." The case of Stockton Sav. & L. Soc. v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 236, 44 Pac. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210, relied on by appellant, is not, in its facts, sufficiently similar to the present case to make the principles there enunciated applicable. In that case the plaintiff was the owner of land, and made a secret oral agreement with his tenant that the tenant should pay a cash rental for the land, and that the title to the crops grown on the land should remain in plaintiff, and, when harvested, should be delivered to the nearest warehouse and stored in the name of plaintiff, and from the sale of the crops plaintiff should receive as rent the sum stipulated, and the overplus, if any, should go to the tenant. The growing crop was attached by the creditor of the tenant, and the action was against the sheriff by plaintiff. The court held that, in effect, the contract was "an attempt to obtain the advantages of a chattel mortgage without complying with the provisions of the statute upon that subject." In the case here the purpose was not to secure the money advanced to purchase cattle. It was to make an arrangement or investment whereby Hamlin could pay a debt he owed plaintiff. It was to furnish means whereby the result of his labor alone would discharge this debt. If he so managed, by his skill and labor in the use of plaintiff's money, as to yield a profit in the business, this profit should be his reward, and when it was sufficient to pay his debt the agency was to cease. But in the cattle he was to purchase he had no interest whatever. The case seems to us quite different from the case above cited.

2. It is further contended that the findings and judgment for $25, as compensation for the pursuit of the property, are unsupported by the evidence. The only testimony on the point was that of John Nicholls, one of plaintiffs, who testified that plaintiff paid at different times "consultation fees" to its attorney at Auburn $25; that he "made three trips to Auburn in the matter, for which a legitimate proportion" of his "expense there is $5"; that he paid $10 "in expenses of Charles Tuttle in coming to Dutch Flat to take the depositions"; that he paid "about $5 notary's fees—making in all the sum of $50." Attorney's fees are not recoverable as damages, under section 3336, Civ. Code, nor as costs in the action. Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 62 Pac. 395. Aside from payments for attorney's fees, the evidence does not show for what purpose the witness made a trip to Auburn, though probably to consult his attorney; nor does it appear for what he paid the notary. It may have been for taking the depositions. The payment to Charles Tuttle is not sufficiently explained to enable us to judge in what capacity he served in taking the depositions. The expenditure for depositions, however, should be determined in the cost bill, and forms no part of the damages as such.

The judgment is modified by striking out the item of $25, as compensation for the pursuit of the property, and otherwise the judgment is affirmed.

DEEDS—ESCROWS—DELIVERY AFTER GRANTOR'S DEATH.

Where the owner of land signed and acknowledged a deed and delivered it to a third person, with instructions to deliver it to the grantee on the grantor's death, but it was expressly agreed that, in case either the grantor or his wife repaid to the grantee certain advancements, they should be entitled to a surrender of the deed, the grantor did not part with all his dominion over the deed, and there was therefore no valid delivery thereof sufficient to pass title to the grantee.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Keyes and another against John B. Meyers, to annul a deed. From a decree in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. A. Dower (Nicol & Orr, of counsel), for appellants. Ira Hill Reed (Robert C. Owens, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff Mary A. Keyes sued the defendant to annul a deed executed to defendant by John M. Lindsay, purporting to convey to him certain real property, and to quiet her title thereto. W. B. Keyes is joined as plaintiff solely because he is the husband of his coplaintiff. Defendant in his answer prayed that he be adjudged the owner of the property. The court made its findings and gave judgment for the defendant. Plaintiffs appeal, and present the evidence by a bill of exceptions; the appeal having been taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment.

The case presents the question whether or not the deed of Lindsay to the defendant was ever effectively delivered to him. In substance, the facts as found by the court are as follows: On January 15, 1895, Lindsay, being the owner of the real property and being indebted to Meyers, in consideration of said indebtedness made, signed, and duly acknowledged the execution of a deed purporting to convey to Meyers the said property, and deposited said deed with W. H. Steffler, with verbal instructions from both Lindsay and Meyers, made at the time, that Steffler should not deliver the same to either party during their lifetime without an order from the other, and that after the death of Lindsay he should deliver it to Meyers. Afterwards, on January 21, 1895, the two parties made and executed the following written agreement: "This agreement, made this 21st day of January, 1895, between John B. Meyers, of Angels Camp, Calaveras county, state of California, and John Lindsay, of the same place, witnesseth: That whereas, the said John Lindsay has executed a deed, now in escrow, and deposited January 15th, 1895, in the hands of William Steffler, county treasurer of Calaveras county, to one-third of that certain quartz mine situated in the Angels mining district, Calaveras county, state of California: Now, therefore, the said J. B. Meyers hereby agrees to provide food, clothing, and proper medical attendance and medicine in case of sickness, and in case of death to pay all funeral expenses, caused by the death of said John Lindsay, and to pay all the necessary expenses the said Lindsay may incur as long as he, the said John Lindsay, may live. Provided, however, that upon the payment of all legal claims held by the said John B. Meyers against him, he, the said John Lindsay, shall have the right to demand and repossess the said deed above referred to from William Steffler, without any costs whatever. It is further agreed that payment of all demands in favor of John B. Meyers may be paid either to him or to Mrs. J. B. Meyers, his wife." On September 25, 1898, Lindsay wrote to Steffler a letter, which Steffler received, which was as follows: "That deed that is placed in your hands in escrow, between J. B. Meyers and J. M. Lindsay, of Angels Camp, I will ask you as a friend to hold it and not to allow it to be opened by Meyers or any one, without my consent. As it is a life contract, I feel safer with it in your hands than any man I know of in Calaveras county. [Signed] J. M. Lindsay." On November 12, 1900, the day of his death, Lindsay executed a deed purporting to convey the same property to the plaintiff Mary A. Keyes for the consideration of $50. On November 13, 1900, Steffler delivered to Meyers the deed deposited with him by Lindsay and Meyers on January 15, 1895. Meyers did not pay the funeral expenses of Lindsay, nor has he been asked or requested to do so; but he has been always ready to do so, upon being informed of the amount. He furnished goods and supplies for the maintenance and support of Lindsay, and paid his living expenses at all times when called upon or requested to do so. On October 19, 1897, Lindsay had become indebted to Meyers, apparently on this account, in the sum of $1,000, which he never paid.

We think there was no legal or effectual delivery of the deed. The essential requisites of a valid delivery in cases of the class here presented were carefully considered and settled by this court in Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, and Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 57 Pac. 772. In Bury v. Young it was held that, where the owner of land signs and acknowledges a deed and delivers it to a third person, with instructions not to record it, but to deliver it to the grantees upon the grantor's death, the grantor thereupon parting with all dominion over the deed, and reserving no right to recall it or alter its provisions, or to have any further interest in the property except to hold the use until his death, the delivery by such third person after the grantor's death is valid, and that such conveyance passes the title upon the first delivery, subject to the grantor's life estate. The court, distinguishing the case from others of contrary import, says: "In every case where the deed has been declared invalid by reason of failure of delivery, it will be found that the grantor reserved some rights over the instrument; that he failed to part with all control and dominion over it; that, upon the happening of some event or contingency or condition, he had the right, if so disposed, to reach out and take it from the possession of the depositary. * * * The essential requisite to the validity of a deed transferred under circumstances as indicated in this case is that, when it is placed in the hands of the third party, it has passed beyond the control of the grantor for all time. That question is determined by the grantor's intention in the matter, and his intention in making the delivery is a question of fact, to be solved by the light of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction." In Kenney v. Parks the deed was held invalid. A husband and wife each owned separate real property, and each executed to the other a deed of his and her property, respectively, and delivered the same simultaneously to a third person, with directions that upon the death of either, leaving the other surviving, the deed executed by the deceased spouse should be duly recorded for the benefit of the survivor, and with the understanding that the deed of the survivor should thereupon become ineffectual and should be returned to the grantor therein. The husband died, and the wife claimed his property under the deed executed by him. The court held that the deeds, though designated by the parties as escrows, were in no legal sense escrows, there being nothing to be performed by either grantee as a condition precedent to the delivery and taking effect of the deed (Civ. Code, § 1057), but that they were either direct grants or no deeds whatever, and that "the all-controlling fact in this case, which defeats plaintiff's claim, is that when the deeds were made and delivered to the cashier of the bank the respective grantors did not absolutely part with all future dominion and control over them, but, upon the contrary, the actual intention and understanding of each grantor was that upon the death of the other the survivor should take back his own deed, and that no title should vest under it." Page 150 of 125 Cal., and page 773 of 57 Pac. See, further, Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 6, 42 Pac. 300; Howlin v. Castro, 136 Cal.

Applying these principles to the case at bar, it is clear that there was no delivery of the deed. Even under the verbal instructions given to Steffler at the date of the deed Lindsay did not absolutely part with all dominion over the deed or the title. Upon procuring an order from Meyers, he still retained the right to withdraw the deed. If any title whatever was to be vested in Meyers prior to such withdrawal, it could not be revested in Lindsay by the mere redelivery of the deed to him, or otherwise than by a grant from Meyers. Civ. Code, § 1058. Hence, although they did not say so in terms, the intention of both parties manifestly was that upon the order of Meyers the deed might be withdrawn by Lindsay, and in that event should be of no force whatever, and that the title was then to be in Lindsay, complete and perfect, without any reconveyance by Meyers. This state of the title would have continued down to the moment of Lindsay's death. It follows that there could have been no intention that the deed was to have any present effect on the title so long as it was subject to this contingency; that is to say, during Lindsay's life. In that view of the case, Steffler in holding the deed must be considered as the mere agent of Lindsay to deliver it after his death, if not otherwise disposed of in his lifetime; and such agency would be revoked by Lindsay's death. Devol v. Dye, 123 Ind. 326, 24 N. E. 246, 7 L. R. A. 439.

But it is immaterial to the decision of the case what would be the effect of the original agreement and instructions to Steffler. It may be conceded that, if the effect of such original agreement was, as contended by appellants, to divest Lindsay of all future control over the deed, it could not be changed without Meyers' consent, and possibly not without his consent in writing. But this limitation is fully met and obviated by the agreement of January 21, 1895. That agreement was in writing, and was executed by Meyers; and consequently it was as effectual to qualify his title or right to the property as any other instrument in writing, and the effect of the agreement made at that time was precisely the same upon the deed and upon the title as if it had been made at the time the deed was originally deposited. This agreement specifically declares that Lindsay should have the right to withdraw the deed at any time upon payment of all legal claims held against him by Meyers. No provision is made in that event for a reconveyance by Meyers. Evidently none was considered necessary, and the intention was that the deed should not take effect as a present conveyance. Lindsay, therefore, did not part with all control either over the deed or the title, and the case comes within the rule established in Kenney v. Parks, supra.

The letter of September 25, 1898, does not in the least change the legal effect of the former transaction. The rule prevailing in some jurisdictions that where a grantor who retains power to regain possession of the deed dies without doing so, and the deed is delivered in pursuance of the original directions accompanying its deposit, such delivery upon the grantor's death is valid and effectual to pass the title, has not been followed in this state. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Canale v. Copello, supra. The judgment is not supported by the findings or by the evidence in the case.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied. We do not intend, by anything said in the opinion, to declare that upon the going down of the remittitur the court below may not permit the defendant to amend his pleadings by filing a cross-complaint to have his debt against the deceased, John M. Lindsay, declared a lien on the property, or to amend his answer to show the want of equity in plaintiff until the debt due defendant, if any, be paid.

(L. A. 1,338.)

RAILROADS — OVERHEAD CROSSINGS — WARNINGS—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Civ. Code, § 486, providing that a bell must be rung or whistle sounded at least 80 rods from the place where a railroad crosses any street, road, or highway, does not apply alone to grade crossings, but is applicable where the railroad crosses the highway on a bridge over the same.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; William S. Day, Judge.

Rehearing denied October 2, 1905.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought to recover damages for the death of Katherine S. Johnson, wife of the plaintiff Frank W. Johnson, and mother of the other plaintiffs, who are minors, alleged to have been occasioned through the negligence of defendant. The second amended complaint, after stating the corporate existence of defendant, and the maintenance and operation by it of a railroad on July 25, 1901, alleges, as the facts upon which the cause of action for negligence is predicated, that said railroad, "about five miles west of the city of Santa Barbara, crosses obliquely the county road known as 'Hollister Avenue,' about 90 yards east of the place where the road known as the 'Modoc Road' enters said Hollister avenue, the acute angle formed thereby being of about 30 degrees; that the said crossing is an overhead one, the track being upon a bridge over said road, and the public road excavated so as to pass under the bridge, and being flanked by the sides of the cut on each side; that said bridge is supported by three abutments, one on each side of the county road and one in the middle; that the space between said abutments is about 20 feet, and said abutments are about 80 feet in length; that by reason of trees and other obstacles the view up and down the track is very much obstructed, so that persons driving along Hollister avenue cannot see approaching trains; that by reason of the said construction of said crossing the same is a dangerous one to persons driving to and fro along Hollister avenue; that on the 25th day of July, 1901, Katherine S. Johnson * * * was driving from plaintiff's home, near Goleta, along Hollister avenue, towards the city of Santa Barbara, and as she approached said crossing defendant caused one of its locomotives, with a train of cars attached thereto, to approach said crossing at a high rate of speed, and in so doing disregarded its duty to give signal of such approach, but, on the contrary, caused said train to approach negligently and carelessly and without signaling, either by blowing a whistle or ringing a bell, or giving any other signal whatsoever, and without giving any signal by flag or otherwise; that the said Katherine S. Johnson, hearing no signal, was unaware of the approach of said train, and just as her horse and wagon were under said bridge said train passed over the same, negligently and carelessly, as aforesaid; that in consequence of the dangerous character of said crossing as maintained by defendant, and of the failure on its part, by reason of its negligence and carelessness, to give the proper signal as its train approached said crossing, the horse of said Katherine S. Johnson was frightened and ran away, and she was thrown violently out of the wagon and killed." A demurrer to the complaint on the ground that these alleged facts did not constitute a cause of action was sustained, and, plaintiffs declining to further amend, judgment was rendered against them. This appeal is taken from said judgment to test the validity of the order sustaining said demurrer.

It is contended by appellants that the judgment should be reversed on two grounds: First, because they insist that the complaint shows that the crossing was a peculiarly dangerous one, and therefore it became the duty of defendant to take commensurate precautions, and the extent of these precautions was a matter to be left to the jury; second, that it was the duty, under the statute, of the defendant's train to have signaled, either by bell or whistle, before reaching the crossing, and that, having failed to do so, defendant is liable for the damage that ensued.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the first proposition advanced by appellant, that the allegations of the complaint were sufficient to constitute negligence on the part of the defendant at common law in failing to give warning of the approach of its train to the highway crossing referred to in the complaint, because we are satisfied that the complaint, in alleging that the defendant failed and neglected to give such warning of the approach of its train, as provided by section 486 of the Civil Code, sufficiently stated a cause of action. The lower court, in sustaining the demurrer, necessarily took the view, which is also insisted on here by respondent, that the section above referred to has application only where a railroad crosses a highway at grade—upon the same level as the highway. We cannot agree with this construction of the statute, and find no warrant in its language for this limitation placed upon its meaning. The section provides that a bell must be rung, or whistle sounded, at least 80 rods from the place where the "railroad crosses any street, road, or highway." There is certainly nothing in this language which limits the giving of signals of approach to any particular crossings. The language of the section is plain and unambiguous, and applies in general terms to all crossings. By it the duty is enjoined upon the railroad to signal at a prescribed distance from "where the railroad crosses any street, road, or highway." This is broad enough to apply to any crossing of a highway by a railroad, whether it is super, sub, or level grade. Nothing is said in the section about signaling only when the railroad crosses a highway at level grade. Nor is there anything in the section which would warrant so construing it. In fact, the language is so plain as not to be subject to construction at all. If the Legislature had intended that the railroad should only be required to give signals when crossing highways at grade, it would, as has been done in other states, have readily and clearly expressed that intention. It could not, however, have used more general language than is employed in the section under consideration to express the intention that the required signal should be given at all crossings of highways, whether above, below, or at grade. To construe this language as applying only to grade crossings, when nothing is said about grades, would be to judicially legislate into the section an exemption which its plain and comprehensive language clearly excludes. Nothing is said in the section about crossing at grade; but it is simply provided that signals shall be given whenever the railroad crosses any street, road, or highway. In the case at bar it is alleged that the railroad crosses Hollister avenue, a public highway, upon a bridge. The fact that it crossed it upon a bridge did not make it any the less a crossing within the terms of the statute. It was a crossing at supergrade, but still a crossing. People

v. New York Central R. R., 13 N. Y. 78; Id., 25 Barb. 199.

It is, however, insisted by respondent that, while the language of the section may be broad enough to include all crossings, yet that, when the object sought to be accomplished by requiring such warnings at crossings is taken into consideration, it is evident that the Legislature intended to use the phrase "when the railroad crosses any street, road, or highway" in a restricted sense, as applying only to grade crossings. In this connection it is urged that, as the primary object of requiring warning is to guard against the danger of collision at the crossings of highways by railroads, which can only occur at grade, the statute was only intended to apply to prevent such collisions, that this was the object in view in the legislative mind when the section was enacted, and, as such collisions are rendered impossible by overhead crossings, the section was not intended to apply where such crossings existed. While it is true that the primary object of requiring signals at crossings is to prevent collisions, still this was not the only purpose the Legislature had in view. It recognized other dangers, and the more general purpose was that, by giving such signals, travelers upon the public highway near the crossing might be warned of the approach of the train, and be afforded an opportunity to guard themselves against any harm or danger by reason of its approach. The construction of an overhead bridge across a highway obviates, it is true, the danger of collision; but it does not remove the danger to persons driving upon the highway, at or near the crossing, which may arise from the sudden and unannounced approach of the train to the bridge, and the consequent frightening of their teams. The liability of horses to become frightened at sudden and unusual noises is matter of common knowledge, and, while the giving of such signals may not remove all danger therefrom, yet when given at the proper time and place, as provided by the statute, they at least tend to lessen the danger, by putting the traveler approaching the crossing upon his guard, and giving him an opportunity to remain at a safe distance with his team, or to take such precautionary measures with reference to it as may be necessary for his and their safety. As said by the court in People v. N. Y. Central R. R., 25 Barb. 203, confirmed by the Supreme Court of New York in 13 N. Y. 81, in speaking of the objects to be attained under a section of the New York statute identical with our section under consideration: "The hazards to be provided against were twofold: (1) The danger of actual collision at the crossing; and (2) that of damage by the frightening of teams traveling upon the public highway. And to guard against the latter peril it was as important to provide for a proper warning when the railroad passed over the highway at an elevation, which allowed a passage upon the highway underneath, as when it passed upon the same level, to enable those passing upon the highway to place their teams in such positions of security as would best guard against injury from their fright. But, whatever may have been the reason, it is sufficient that the Legislature have deemed the performance of this duty, which is not onerous upon the company, sufficiently beneficial to the public to secure its performance by the imposition of a penalty"—a penalty which our statute also imposes. Upon this same subject it is said by the Supreme Court of Kentucky, in Rupard v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. R. Co., 88 Ky. 284, 11 S. W. 70, 7 L. R. A. 316: "Injury may occur to the traveler at the crossing in two ways, namely, by collision with him, or by scaring the horse that he is riding or driving whereby he is injured. It is the duty of the appellee [the railroad], in approaching a crossing, if danger to the traveler in either of the ways above mentioned may be reasonably apprehended, to give timely notice of its approach, in order that a traveler may not only be warned not to come in collision with the train, but secure himself from injury by his frightened horse. By the trains crossing the highway on a trestle, there is no danger of a collision with the traveler on a highway; but, if he should be under the trestle with his horse while the train is passing over it, the danger is increased, for it is well known that a horse is more likely to scare at a sound made over his head than when the same sound is made on the ground."

It is suggested by counsel for respondent that there is no more reason why signals should be given at crossings of the character here involved than when the railroad and the public road run parallel to each other. Aside from the fact that the language of the statute requires these signals at all crossings, it is, we think, quite obvious that a greater reason exists for them in the one case than in the other. It is never absolutely necessary that a public highway, in any case, should parallel a railroad at an unsafe distance. On the other hand, in the very nature of things, there must be points at which public highways and railroads must necessarily intersect each other, and where danger to travelers by team is much more likely to arise than upon the highway paralleling the railroad; and, realizing the greater danger which must exist from the necessity of having highways crossed by railroads, the Legislature has provided for greater precautionary measures to meet the danger which this necessity creates. It is apparent, therefore, from what has been said that the purpose of the statute is not alone to require warnings so as to prevent collisions, but also to guard against injury to travelers from the frightening of their teams, and to afford as much security as possible against accidents at or on such crossings, by requiring notice to travelers of the approach of the train. If the restricted construction which respondent claims for it should be placed on the section of the Code, this security to the public would be taken away. On the other hand, reading the language as it is plainly written, there is extended to the public all the practical protection which can be afforded against the danger at such crossings, and which it is clear the statute was intended to secure. There have been but few authorities cited upon either side bearing directly upon the points we have been discussing. The New York statute, considered in the cases from the courts of that state to which we have referred, is in its essential particulars the same as the provisions of our Code section. It uses the same plain and comprehensive language, requiring warning by whistle or bell to be given when the railroad "shall cross any traveled public road or street," and it was determined by the courts of that state that under this provision, as the language used in the statute was broad enough to include all crossings, it was required thereby that the railroad give the statutory signals, even when the crossing of the highway by the railroad was overhead. The Kentucky case referred to, and the case of Penn. R. R. Co. v. Barnett, 59 Pa. 259, 98 Am. Dec. 346, cited by appellant, while not involving the construction of any statute upon the subject, very clearly state the necessity for and reasons why warnings for the protection of travelers with teams at the crossing should be given by a railroad of the approach of its train, where the track crosses the highway above or below grade—reasons which doubtless the Legislature of this state bore in mind when it provided in general terms that such warning should be given at all crossings, without limitation as to grade.

In support of its claim that the sections of the statute should be given the restricted meaning it contends for—that it only applies to grade crossings—respondent relies upon the cases of Favor v. Boston & Lowell R. R. Co., 114 Mass. 351, 19 Am. Rep. 364; Jenson v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 86 Wis. 589, 57 N. W. 359, 22 L. R. A. 680; Mo., Kan. & Tex. Ry. Co. v. Thomas et al., 87 Tex. 282, 28 S. W. 343, and McElroy v. Ga. C. & N. Ry. Co., 98 Ga. 257, 25 S. E. 439. All these cases involved the question whether the statutes of the several states in which the cases were determined provided for the giving of warnings at crossings above or below grade. It was held that they did not, and this conclusion was reached from a particular examination of the statute in each state. An examination of the section of the statute referred to in the opinion in the Massachusetts case shows that it provides for signals "80 rods from the place where the road crosses a highway * * * upon the same level therewith." The court held that the statute required signals only at crossings on grade, which, of course, is what the statute plainly says. In the Wisconsin case the attorney for respondent (plaintiff in the court below) conceded in his argument, and it is so intimated in the opinion, that the statute of that said state did not require a warning to be given at the overhead crossing where the accident occurred. In the Texas case, while the statute did not say that the warning should be given at grade crossings, the court, construing the language, held that it must refer only to grade crossings, because it provided that the train should come to a full stop under certain conditions, which could only apply to grade crossings. The Georgia court reached a similar conclusion, based upon a construction of the language of the statute of that state, which provided that the engineer should commence giving warning at a certain distance from the crossing, and simultaneously commence checking and keep checking the speed of the locomotive, "so as to stop in time should any person or thing be crossing said track or said road." The court held that, in requiring a slacking of speed, so as to readily stop if any one was crossing the track, the section could only apply to grade crossings, and that there could be no occasion for stopping the train for the protection of persons not on, or about to go upon, the track itself. It will be observed that, in all these cases cited by respondent, either the sections of the statute under examination expressly applied to grade crossings only, or, when carefully examined, showed from their phraseology that they were only meant to be applied to grade crossings. Our section, however, is, as we have said, so plain in its language as not to be open to construction. It says nothing about any particular kind of crossing, but speaks of crossings generally. To say that, when it so speaks of crossings generally, it means crossings at grade only, would be to place a limitation upon the section by construction which can find no warrant from anything in the language of the section itself.

We are satisfied that the demurrer was improperly sustained, and the judgment is accordingly reversed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J; HENSHAW, J.

147 Cal. 707

QUINT v. DIMOND et al. (Sac. 1,164.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1905.)

1. EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF EMPLOYÉS—RES GESTÆ.

In an action for damages caused by fire alleged to have been negligently set out by defendant's harvesting engine, a statement by defendant's foreman, on the day succeeding the fire, that he would never take the engine back into the field unless she was fixed so she would not throw sparks, was not a part of the res gestæ.

2. TRIAL — DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for loss of plaintiff's grain by fire set out by sparks from defendant's harvesting engine, defendant claimed that the engine was properly guarded by spark arresters, and three different screens were before the jury for inspection, and one of them was admitted in evidence, an instruction that the screens were not in evidence and were not to be considered was prejudicial error.

3. NEGLIGENCE—INCONSISTENT INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court charged that, though the jury should find that the fire in question was caused by sparks from defendants' engine, still defendants were not liable, if they had used due care and had used ordinary care in procuring for the engine a good and safe spark arrester and such as were mostly used and approved by experienced mechanics, and they would not be required to use any greater care in respect to the spark arrester used by them, a further instruction that if a traction engine, properly constructed and fitted with a proper spark arrester, would not throw sparks which would start fires when the engine was otherwise properly operated, and the fire by which plaintiff's property was destroyed was set out by defendants' engine, then the jury should find that the engine was not properly operated, and that ordinary care was not used, was contradictory and erroneous.

4. TRIAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for damages from fire set out by defendants' harvesting engine, there was no evidence that the engine had ever before set fire to anything on the ground, but there was evidence that light wood had been used to generate steam, and there was a conflict of evidence as to whether that kind of wood was more likely to emit sparks, and that on one or two occasions there had been a small fire on a canvas appliance on the harvester, an instruction that plaintiff was not bound to prove with absolute certainty that the fire was caused by fire escaping from the engine, but was only bound to prove that immediately before the breaking out of the fire defendants' traction engine, burning light wood, was in operation in close proximity to the place where the fire broke out, and that the engine had on previous occasions set fire to the canvas appliance by sparks escaping, and was so operated with reference to the place where the fire started that sparks escaping could have set the fire, etc., was prejudicially erroneous as a charge on the weight of evidence.

5. DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

Where plaintiff's wheat, if it had not been burned by fire alleged to have been communicated from defendant's traction engine, would have been ready for market in a very short time, plaintiff was entitled to prove the market value of wheat in the nearest market at the time of the fire, on the issue of damages.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Oval Pirkey, Judge.

Action by Fred Quint against Dennis S. Dimond and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Reversed.

C. W. Lynch, F. G. Drury, and W. M. Finch, for appellants. Frank Freeman and Charles L. Donohoe, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages for the burning and destruction of certain wheat and fences growing and being on land of plaintiff. At the time of the fire which destroyed plaintiff's said property defendants were operating a combined harvester propelled by a traction engine on land of one Jenkins, adjoining that of plaintiff, and it is averred that a fire was caused on this adjoining land by sparks from said engine; that this fire, in spite of all efforts to suppress it, spread onto plaintiff's land and destroyed his said wheat and fences; and that the fire was caused by the imperfect construction of the engine and its careless management by defendants. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

There was no direct evidence that the fire was started by sparks from the defendants' engine. It was first discovered at a point where the engine had been about 15 or 20 minutes before the discovery, and at that time the engine was about a quarter of a mile away from the place of the fire. It is argued by respondent that there was evidence of certain circumstances and conditions which warranted the jury in inferring that the fire was caused by the engine. Defendants contend that this evidence was insufficient to warrant this inference, and that the jury, if they had been left to exercise their own judgment, would probably have reached a different conclusion, and they particularly contend that the instructions of the court deal mainly with questions of evidence and facts; that they told the jury what weight they should and should not give to certain evidence, and what inferences of fact they should draw therefrom; that they constituted an argument in favor of plaintiff, and were plainly violative of the constitutional provision that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." Before discussing this general contention, we will notice two or three particular rulings which, in our opinion, were erroneous, and so prejudicial to defendants as to call for a reversal of the judgment and order appealed from.

There were two main questions in the case: First, was there evidence sufficient to show that the fire was actually caused by defendants' engine? and, second, if it was so caused, was it the result of defendants' want of due care in its construction and management? The fire occurred about 2 o'clock on the afternoon of June 20, 1900, and plaintiff's witness Breuss was permitted, over the objection and exception of defendants, to testify that on the next day he heard defendants' foreman, Laurensen, say: "I will never take the engine back into the field, unless she is fixed so that she will not throw sparks." This was clearly erroneous. The statement of the foreman made the next day was no part of the res gestæ, and was not properly admissible upon any conceivable ground. See Luman v. G. A. C. M. Co., 140 Cal., commencing at page 709, 74 Pac. 311, and cases there cited. It was averred in the complaint that the fire was caused "by sparks and fire thrown out and permitted to escape from and by the aforesaid described traction engine," and that they were "thrown out and escaped as aforesaid therefrom by the defective construction of said engine"; and this unauthorized declaration of Laurensen went directly to establish these averments.

The main contention of plaintiff was that the fire was caused by sparks from the smokestack of the engine, which, as is claimed, was not properly guarded by screens, etc., to prevent sparks and fire from the engine flying out in the field. The smokestack itself was offered and received in evidence, and, as tending to show that it was properly guarded by an arrester of sparks, the defendants brought into court and exhibited to the jury three screens by which they claimed the smokestack had been surrounded, so as to prevent the escape of sparks. These screens remained a long time in the presence of the jury. One of them was formally introduced and admitted in evidence. Another was formally offered in evidence, but an objection to it by plaintiff was sustained on the ground that the witness testifying to it could not fully identify it as one actually used on the smokestack, although he said that it was similar in character; and, although defendants excepted to this ruling, they do not make it a point in their briefs. As to the third screen, while it remained before the jury for inspection, it does not appear that it was formally offered in evidence or that any ruling was made as to its admissibility. Under these circumstances the court gave the following instruction, to which defendants excepted, and which they contend was erroneous: "In the course of the trial of this case certain screens were brought into court and placed before the jury, and remained there, subject to more or less inspection on the part of the jury. These screens were presented on the part of the defendants as part of their case, but on objection on the part of plaintiff they were by the court excluded from being considered as evidence in this case; and the jury are therefore instructed that, in considering the verdict in this case, they must not take into consideration said screens as presented to you at all, as the same were not admitted in evidence, and no impression received by the jury from said inspection must be considered in this case, as the same have nothing to do with the evidence admitted here whatever." This instruction was, in our opinion, erroneous and prejudicial. Certainly it was proper and highly important for defendants to show, if they could, that the smokestack was properly protected by spark arresters, and it is difficult to conceive of evidence more pertinent to that end than the means, the appliances, the screens, by which it was claimed the purpose of arresting the sparks was accomplished. And, even if we do not consider the screen which was subject to the inspection of the jury without objection or ruling, and the other one which was excluded upon objection, certainly the one which was formally introduced and admitted was a proper matter for the consideration of the jury. And it is no answer to say that the instruction must be held to apply only to the two which were not formally admitted in evidence. The instruction clearly included all the screens. Its language is: "Certain screens were brought into court and placed before the jury, and remained there subject to more or less inspection on the part of the jury." And it clearly referred to all the screens which were brought into court, etc., and the statement that they were all excluded as evidence was incorrect.

The court in general terms correctly instructed the jury that, although they should find that the fire was caused by sparks from defendants' engine, still defendants were not liable if they had used due care in its construction and management, and that: "If this jury finds from the evidence that the defendants used ordinary skill in procuring, and did procure for the engine in question, a good and safe spark catcher and arrester, and such as were at the time of the accident most in use and approved by experienced mechanics, they (said defendants) would not be required to use any other or greater care or skill in respect to the spark catcher or arrester used by them; and, if the jury find that the defendants were not guilty of negligence in any other particular, plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for defendants." But on this subject the court also instructed the jury as follows: "If from the evidence you shall find that a traction engine, properly constructed and fitted with the proper spark arrester or means of preventing the escape of sparks, would not throw sparks which will start fires when the said engine is otherwise properly operated, and you shall further find that the fire by which the property of the plaintiff was destroyed was set by the said traction engine of defendants, then and in that case you should find that the said engine at that time was not properly operated, and that ordinary care was not exercised in its operation." This instruction is clearly inconsistent with the other instructions on the subject of defendants' negligence, and is erroneous and prejudicial. Although the jury had been told in various forms that the defendants were not liable if they had used due care and diligence in managing the engine and preventing sparks from escaping from it to the ground, still they are told by this last instruction that if sparks did escape and caused the fire they were absolutely liable, notwithstanding they had not been guilty of any negligence whatever, and that the fact that the fire was caused by their engine was conclusive proof that they had been negligent. It substantially took away from the jury all consideration of defendants' carelessness, and it made all the other instructions on the subject of care or negligence absolutely meaningless and of no consequence.

For the errors above noticed, there must be a reversal. We think, also, that defendants' contention that the charge was erroneous, because argumentative and dealing with questions of evidence and facts entirely within the province of the jury, must be sustained. The charge consisted entirely of written instructions presented by the parties and given at their request. If the matters contained in those given at the request of plaintiff had been argued by his counsel to the jury, as they no doubt were argued, they would have constituted legitimate argument by counsel, and they might have been answered, as no doubt they were answered, by counsel for defendants as best they could. These arguments of respective counsel, pointing out the weight which they thought should be given to certain evidence, no doubt assisted the jury in coming to a conclusion; the jury, however, knowing that they were merely the arguments of interested counsel, not binding on them, and to be considered, contrasted, and weighed by the jury and given the significance and force to which the jury considered them entitled. But, when the arguments of either side as to questions of fact are injected into the charge of the court, there is no answer to them, and the jury naturally take them as conclusive. And we think that in the case at bar the instructions given at plaintiff's request consisted mainly of argument in favor of plaintiff upon questions of fact. To show this characteristic of these instructions, it is not necessary to quote all of them here. It will be sufficient to quote a part of instruction No. 2. And to explain this part of the instruction it is necessary to state two or three items of evidence. There was no evidence that the engine had ever before set fire to grain or anything upon the ground, but there was evidence that light sycamore wood had been used in generating steam, and there was a conflict of testimony as to whether or not that kind of wood was more likely than hard wood to emit dangerous sparks. There was also, as a part of the harvester, an appliance called a "dog house." This was made of canvas, and was near the smokestack, and was used as a "header draper." Chaff sometimes collected on this dog house, and it was shown that upon one or two occasions there had been a small fire either in the chaff or the canvas, which was easily extinguished. Of course, there were also the "general conditions of the property and surrounding circumstances," consisting of the facts that an engine propelled by steam generated by fire was being operated in a grain field. The foregoing facts were specially called to the attention of the jury by the instructions, and the part of instruction No. 2 above referred to is as follows: "In this connection you are instructed that the plaintiff is not bound to prove with absolute certainty that the fire was caused by a spark or sparks escaping from the said traction engine of defendants. The plaintiff is only bound to prove by a preponderance of the evidence of that fact, and prove to the effect that immediately before the breaking out of the fire the said traction engine of the defendants, burning light wood for the purpose of generating steam, was in operation by and immediately in close proximity to the place where the fire broke out, and that said traction engine had on previous occasions set fire to the dog house thereof by sparks escaping therefrom, and the said traction engine was so operated with relation to the place where the fire started that a spark or sparks escaping therefrom could have set fire; and the condition of the property and surrounding circumstances, being such as to warrant a belief on your part that the fire was more likely brought about by another cause, would be such reasonable evidence, and would prima facie establish that the fire had been caused by the said traction engine, and would warrant a finding upon your part to that effect, in the absence of evidence that the fire arose from some other cause." We do not see in this instruction any proposition of law, nor anything other than an instruction that the jury should draw certain inferences from certain evidence and facts. It was substantially an argument to the jury in favor of plaintiff upon questions of fact. Indeed, the latter part of it appears to tell the jury that, although they may believe that the fire was "more likely brought about by another cause," still the facts thereinbefore referred to would prima facie establish that the fire had been caused by the said traction engine; and, although plaintiff argues that apparently there was a word missing from the instruction, still the language is, at best, confusing and misleading. Whether or not it would be wiser to allow judges to instruct juries as to matters of evidence and fact, and thus influence their verdicts as to such matters, as is permitted in some jurisdictions, is not a question to be here considered. Our Constitution expressly prohibits it. "To tell the jury what weight to give or not to give any particular evidence is to express an opinion upon a matter of fact" (People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 181, 31 Pac. 45); "to weigh the evidence and find the facts is, in this state, the exclusive province of the jury, and with the performance of this duty the judge cannot interfere without a palpable violation of the organic law" (People v. Dick, 34 Cal. 663); and "the court has no right to dictate or suggest the process of reasoning by which the evidence shall be judged" (Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 417, 29 Pac. 1101, 1104. See, also, Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 282, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135; McNeil v. Barney, 51 Cal. 603; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 169, 20 Pac. 396). The language of the instruction above quoted and other parts of the instructions are clearly erroneous, within the law as declared in the cases above cited. In Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. v. S. P. Co., 125 Cal. 434, 58 Pac. 55, cited by appellant, the only part of the instruction there considered that was directly condoned was that which told the jury that, if "you find it more probable that the fire was caused by sparks escaping from the swing engine than from any other cause, your finding on that point, to wit, the origin of the fire, should be accordingly." But this does not, by any means, cover all that was said in the instructions in the case at bar.

We do not think that, on the question of the amount of damages, it was error to allow plaintiff to prove the market value of wheat in the nearest market at the time of the fire. It was some evidence tending to show value. The wheat, if it had not been burned, would have been ready for market in a very short time, and if the market had fallen before that time such fact could have been shown by defendants.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

HELLMAN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

(L. A. 1,346.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — TAXES — PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST—STATUTES.

Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1889, p. 471, c. 1) § 46, declares that the manner of collecting municipal taxes shall substantially be the same as that for the collection of city and county taxes. Pol. Code, pt. 3, tit. 9, entitled "Revenue," contains the assessment and tax scheme of the state, including section 3819, which, as amended by St. 1895, p. 335, c. 218, authorizes the payment of taxes under protest and declares that, when so paid, the payment shall in no case be regarded as a voluntary payment and in case of suit may be "recovered back." Held, that such section applied to the collection of municipal taxes of Los Angeles, though section 46 of the charter went into effect before the amendment of section 3819.

2. SAME—ASSESSMENT—IMPROPER ITEMS.

Where an assessment of city taxes contained assessments for general public school and water bonds, and it appeared that no such bonds had ever been issued as designated, and also that proceedings for their issuance had been declared illegal by the Supreme Court, the assessment was invalid as to such items.

3. SAME—DESIGNATION OF FUND—SURPLUSAGE.

Where an assessment of municipal taxes was made for the payment of "public school improvement bonds (1899)," the designation of the year was essential in particularizing the fund, under a charter provision requiring the city council to make a levy for each fund, and could not be treated as surplusage for the purpose of sustaining the levy to pay public school improvement bonds of 1889.

Action by I. W. Hellman against the city of Los Angeles. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the city appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Mathews, for appellant. Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the city of Los Angeles the sum of $479.60, with interest, on account of taxes paid by him to the city under protest, which taxes he claims were illegal and void. In September, 1900, the council of the city of Los Angeles passed an ordinance fixing the tax levy for municipal purposes for the year 1900–01. This tax levy embraced the following items:

	Cents.
For general public school bonds (1899)…………	.06.46
For waterworks bonds (1899)…………………	.00 69
For public school improvement bonds (1899)……	.02.36

Plaintiff was the owner of property in the city of Los Angeles subject to taxation, and paid the taxes for these three items, accompanying his payment with a written protest. The facts being matters of record, there was no dispute over them, and the trial was had substantially to determine the conclusions of law which should be drawn from these facts. The court adjudged the items above set forth to be illegal and void, and rendered its judgment accordingly. The city of Los Angeles appeals.

The city first contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action, in failing to show that the taxes sought to be recovered were paid involuntarily and under protest, contending that the payment was a voluntary payment, under the authority of Maxwell v. San Luis Obispo, 71 Cal. 466, 12 Pac. 484, Bank of Santa Rosa v. Chalfant, 52 Cal. 170, and Phelan v. San Francisco, 120 Cal. 1, 52 Pac. 38. We think, however, that this contention cannot be sustained. Under the peculiar condition of the revenue law of the city of Los Angeles, the cases above cited are not applicable to the question involved. Pol.

Code, part 3, tit. 9, is entitled "Revenue," and contains the assessment and tax scheme of the state. Chapters 7 and 8 of that title deal with the collection of property taxes, and section 3819 is one of the sections of these chapters. In 1895 the Legislature, revising the subject of the revenue and taxes of the state (St. 1895, p. 335, c. 218), amended section 3819 of the Political Code, providing for the payment of taxes under protest, to read, "and when so paid under protest the payment shall in no case be regarded as voluntary payment," and in case of suit may be "recovered back." The charter of the city of Los Angeles, in section 46, declares: "The mode and manner of collecting such municipal taxes * * * shall substantially be the same as the mode and manner * * * for the collecting of state and county taxes." Charter of Los Angeles, St. 1889, p. 471, c. 1. It is quite plain that section 3819, found in chapter 7 of the Political Code, under the subject or title of "Collection of Property Taxes," is a part of the "mode and manner" of collecting state and county taxes, and is none the less a part of that mode and manner in that it deals with the right of the taxpayer to pay under protest. It would be absurd to say that the mode and manner of collecting taxes was limited solely to the right of the state and its tax collectors, and had reference only to the duties of the taxpayer, and no pertinency whatever to the taxpayer's correlative rights. It is a provision definitely declaring a certain mode and manner in which the taxpayer may pay his taxes and preserve his rights, in case the assessment and levy should be found void. The statute is in derogation of the general common-law rule as to voluntary payments, and is befitting to this more enlightened age. Nor can the argument of appellant that, as section 46 of the charter of Los Angeles went into effect before the amendment of section 3819 in 1895, and therefore the amendment of section 3819 should not be held to apply in the collection of municipal taxes, be accorded much weight, first, because the language of the charter of Los Angeles is general, and does not limit the mode and manner of collecting municipal taxes to the then existing mode and manner of collecting state and county taxes; and, second, because, the charter of Los Angeles prescribing that the mode and manner of collecting municipal taxes shall be substantially the same as the mode and manner for the collection of state and county taxes, the council of Los Angeles, acting within the scope of the power and authority vested in them by section 46 of their charter, and evidently to set at rest any question that might exist upon the subject, by Ordinance No. 2848 (N. S.) § 55, enacted and adopted section 3819 of the Political Code in the following language: "And when so paid under protest the payment shall in no case be regarded as voluntary, and such owner may at any time within six months after such payment, bring an action against the city * * * to recover back the taxes so paid under protest." Plaintiff's action was brought within the time prescribed, and sufficiently states a cause of action.

Of the three contested items, the second is for taxes on waterworks bonds. The complaint alleged that no waterworks bonds had been issued. The answer raised no issue on that allegation, and the agreed statement upon which trial was had recited a judicial determination in Barrows v. City of Los Angeles, "whereby it was adjudged that the proceedings taken at the instance of the council of the city of Los Angeles, with reference to the issue of the bonds known as the 'Waterworks Bonds (1889)' * * * were null and void." No other evidence was offered on this item, and no specification is made against the judgment of the court below as to the item, and upon the evidence under the stipulation the judgment was correct.

The first item is for general public school bonds (1889), $329.93. As to this the complaint contains the same allegation, and no issue was raised by the answer, and in the agreed statement there is a recital of an adjudication of the invalidity of this pretended bond issue in the judgment of City of Los Angeles v. Hance, 130 Cal. 279, 62 Pac. 484. There was thus sufficient evidence before the court upon this item, and the judgment in regard to it was correct.

The last item, for public school improvement bonds (1889), is the one most seriously contested. The complaint alleged that no such bonds existed. The answer admitted that no such bonds existed of the year 1899, but there did exist bonds of the year 1889. The agreed stipulation shows that the tax levy was for the public school improvement bonds of the year 1899, and "that at the time of said levy there had not been voted, authorized, or issued any bonds entitled 'Public School Improvement Bonds (1899).'" There were existing and outstanding bonds of the city of Los Angeles known and designated as "Public School Improvement Bonds (1889)." The point in controversy turns upon this variance. In the court below plaintiff admitted the truth of the facts set up in the answer, subject, however, to his objection to the admissibility of such facts, as seeking to vary by parol the terms of an ordinance, which not only was a written instrument, but proceedings under which were, as to the plaintiff taxpayer, in invitum, and therefore the more subject to strict construction. The trial court held with the respondent upon this contention, and, finding that there were no public school improvement bonds of 1899 to which the levy could be addressed, declared it to be void. In this we think the court was correct. Under the charter of Los Angeles the tax ordinance was necessary. The city auditor was required to make an estimate for each fund. Charter of Los Angeles, St. 1889, p. 466, c. 1, § 43. The city council in its ordinance was required to make a levy for each fund. Ordinance No. 2848 (N. S.) § 23; Pol. Code, §§ 3714, 3737. The situation, therefore, presented is that, with the requirement that the estimate and levy must be made for each fund, there was an estimate and levy made for a nonexisting fund and to meet a nonexisting liability; for no presumption of intention that is not distinctly expressed in a tax ordinance can be indulged by the court, and every construction must be in favor of the taxpayer and against the government. Merced Co. v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159, 36 Pac. 399. The designation "1899" cannot be regarded as surplusage. It was essential, within the requirements of the charter and of the Code above cited, in particularizing the fund. Not only can the figures "1899" not be regarded as surplusage, but their elimination by a court would be equally unwarranted. It would leave the levy without proper description, and compel the court to assume and usurp the power of the executive department of the government by deciding whether there were any other bonds to which the levy could apply, or what, in any event, should become of the money. As said in Clunie v. Siebe, 112 Cal. 597, 44 Pac. 1064: "The assessment of property for the purposes of taxation is a function of the executive department of the government, but the proceeding contemplated by the petition herein would transfer that function to the judicial department of the government." Moreover, by eliminating "1899," the reference to any particular bonds, and, in consequence, to any particular fund, would be so indefinite, ambiguous, and uncertain as itself to render the assessment void. Falkner v. Hunt, 16 Cal. 167; Harvey v. Meyer, 117 Cal. 62, 48 Pac. 1014; People v. Flint, 39 Cal. 670; Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 302, 82 Am. Dec. 738; Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 609; Maxcy v. Clabaugh, 1 Gilman (Ill.) 26. It follows, therefore, that it would be an unwarranted departure from the accepted rules of interpretation, and an infringement upon the taxpayer's well-settled rights to a strict construction of the levies and assessments under which he is compelled to pay his taxes, to consider the ordinance levying the tax otherwise than is plainly imported from its reading.

This case is not at all like that presented in Burch v. Newbury, 10 N. Y. 374, where, in the construction of a statute, the Supreme Court of New York reiterated the well-accepted rule that, where words or phrases are obscure or doubtful, the intention of the Legislature is to be resorted to in order to find the meaning. There is no ambiguity, nor are there words of doubtful import, upon the face of this levy. Equally dissimilar is this case from that of Burlington, etc., v. Cass County (Neb.) 19 N. W. 700, relied upon by appellant. There the objection made to a tax was that its levy was for "the insane fund." The answer showed that it was levied for the purpose of paying the indebtedness of the county to the state, as its proportion of caring for the insane at the hospital, according to the certificate of the auditor. Here the court pointed out that the law did not designate any name for the fund to which this tax would belong, and said: "The mere fact that this tax was named or designated the 'insane fund' does not change its character or vitiate the tax; and especially is this true in a case like this, where the law does not attach to it any name." But in this case a specific name has been given, and the appellant city is not willing to stand upon the sufficiency of the description, but asks that the name be so changed as to make the levy apply to a fund entirely different from that which was expressly designated. The inapplicability of this case, therefore, becomes apparent.

Ex parte HAYDEN. (Cr. 1,233.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1905.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PERSONAL LIBERTY—POLICE POWER—FRUIT LABELS.

St. 1903, p. 338, c. 251, § 1, providing that all fruits, green and dried, contained in packages to be shipped or offered for shipment, shall have stamped on the outside of every such package, in legible letters of certain dimensions, a statement truly and correctly designating the county and immediate locality in which such fruit was grown, and providing a penalty of fine and imprisonment for violation, was not a proper exercise of the state's police power, but was invalid as an unlawful invasion of personal liberty.

In Bank. Application by Charles E. Hayden for writ of habeas corpus to determine the legality of his incarceration for violation of St. 1903, p. 338, c. 251, § 1, requiring location labels on fruit packed for shipment. Writ granted. Petitioner discharged.

Wright & Wright, for petitioner. Benjamin K. Knight, Dist. Atty. of Santa Cruz County, for the sheriff.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner was convicted and sentenced to punishment for a violation of the provisions of a state statute, which provides as follows: "All fruit, green and dried, contained in boxes, barrels or packages, which shall hereafter be shipped or offered for shipment in this state by any person, firm or corporation, shall have stamped, branded, stenciled or labeled in a conspicuous place on the outside of every such box, barrel or package, in clearly legible letters, at least one-quarter of an inch in height, a statement truly and correctly designating the county and immediate locality in which such fruit was grown." St. 1903, p. 338, c. 251, § 1. For a violation of this act he was sentenced to pay a fine of $300, with the alternative of imprisonment, and sued for and obtained a writ of habeas corpus.

He contends that the penal statute in question is violative of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and of article 1, § 1, of the Constitution of this state, and that the statute in question works an unwarranted invasion of his liberty. It has come to be well recognized that the liberty and the pursuit of happiness, in which the individual is protected by the Constitution of the United States and of the state, apply as fully to his right of contract, his right to follow a legitimate vocation untrammeled by unnecessary regulations, as it does to the freedom of arrest or restraint of his person. This subject has received recent consideration by this court, and it is unnecessary to do more than refer to Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 77 Pac. 924, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82. Putting out of contemplation, therefore, the fundamental right of the government to subject private property to taxation and to take such property in time of public calamity and peril, the right of the state to impose burdens upon such property where the business is legitimate and innocuous, in other words, to regulate harmless vocations, is found in the police power alone. Young v. Commonwealth (Va.) 45 S. E. 327; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780. The police power, deriving its existence from the rule that the safety of the people is the supreme law, justifies legislation upon matters pertaining to the public welfare, the public health, or the public morals. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 837; Ruhstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 57 N. E. 41, 49 L. R. A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30.

But the Legislature, under the guise of police regulations, cannot enact laws which do not pertain to one or the other of these objects, and which impose onerous and unnecessary burdens upon business and property. By this court it has been said (Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152): "But it is not true that, when this power is exerted for the purpose of regulating a business or occupation which in itself is recognized as innocent and useful to the community, the Legislature is the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to pursue such business or profession. As the right of a citizen to engage in such a business or follow such a profession is protected by the Constitution, it is always a judicial question whether any particular regulation of such right is a valid exercise of legislative power. * * * This principle is stated very forcibly in the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205, in the following language: 'The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretense. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the Legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution.'" The propositions here enunciated have received the sanction of all the courts, and may not be gainsaid. Indeed, respondent upon this appeal does not dispute them, but undertakes to show that the act in question is a legitimate exercise of the police power, in that its object and purpose is to preserve and promote public health and public welfare. His reasoning in this regard is that from time to time the Legislature has passed and this court has approved statutes providing for the quarantining of infected fruit, for the destruction of diseased fruit and fruit trees, and for the compulsory care and preservation against disease of orchards; and it quotes this court's statement in County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 673, 59 Pac. 203, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217, to the following effect: "It is known that the existence of the fruit industry in this state depends upon the suppression and destruction of the pests mentioned in the statute. The act in question is therefore a proper exercise of the police power, which the Legislature has under section 1, art. 19, of the Constitution, to subject property to such reasonable restraints and burdens as will secure and maintain the general welfare and prosperity of the state." From this respondent argues that the effect of the act is (e. g.) that when apples are shipped to the markets of this state, properly labeled, "Apples Grown in Santa Cruz County," because of their known cleanliness and freedom from disease, such apples are permitted to pass local boards of commissioners, while at the same time, if apples are shipped from San Mateo county into Santa Cruz county bearing the label, the county of Santa Cruz can protect itself against the diseased fruit from the neighboring county. Still further it is argued that the act would prevent the false labeling of fruit, and that the prevention of a general fraud is legitimately within the scope of the police power.

But the difficulty with this argument is that the act clearly is not designed to accomplish any of these purposes, and is wholly inadequate to their accomplishment. The scope, the meaning, and intent of an act must be gathered from its title and from its body. There is nothing in either the title or the body of this act which deals or pretends to deal with any of the difficulties which respondent mentions. If it is a question, as respondent contends, of the shipping of diseased apples, it would be simple enough for the Legislature, and quite within its powers, to regulate or prohibit the transportation of such diseased fruit. If it were a question merely of deception in the label, the direct and efficacious method would be for the Legislature to prohibit false labeling. None of these things, as we have said, does this act do or pretend to do. It requires merely that every shipment of every package of fruit, whether it be from the small farmers with few trees or vines, or whether it be from the large producer, must in every instance bear a label naming the county and immediate locality in which the fruit was grown. It is a matter of common knowledge that this requirement would work the absolute destruction of certain important branches of industry. Dried fruit, such as prunes, peaches, and apricots, are gathered in establishments in enormous quantities from the state over. These fruits, when dried, are assorted by grade and quality, and, thus assorted and packed, are shipped to the uttermost parts of the earth. It would absolutely prohibit this industry, if these fruit driers were compelled to label each package with the names of the localities from which the fruit came, and, if it did not absolutely prohibit it, it would render their business so onerous, complicated, and expensive as seriously to imperil its existence. It is plain, therefore, that the act was not designed to prevent either false labeling or the shipping of diseased fruit, and, if so designed, it is both meaningless for this purpose and burdensome for all others. It seems quite apparent that the true purpose of the act was to obtain for the fruit raisers of some well advertised and favored localities an advantage in the disposition of their own fruit. But this, for reasons well and elaborately set forth in People v. Hawkins, 157 N. Y. 1, 51 N. E. 257, 42 L. R. A. 490, 68 Am. St. Rep. 736, forms no part of the police power, and is wholly beyond the prerogative of the Legislature.

It follows, therefore, that the act in question works an unconstitutional invasion of the prisoner's liberty; and it is ordered that he be discharged.

(L. A. 1,341.)

1. Landlord and Tenant—Cancellation of Lease—Fraud—Complaint—Knowledge of Assignee.

Where the assignor of a lease procured the same from plaintiff by fraud and false representations, and then assigned the lease to defendants, a complaint for the cancellation of the lease for such fraud, failing to allege that the assignees took with knowledge or notice of the fraud, was fatally defective.

2. Same—Use of Leased Property—Statutes—Application.

Civ. Code, § 1930, providing that when a thing is let for a particular purpose the hirer must not use it for any other purpose, and, if he does, the letter may hold him responsible for its use or treat the contract as rescinded, is applicable to the hiring of real property.

3. Minerals—Oil—Realty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, §§ 134, 201, 202.]

4. Landlord and Tenant—Removal of Oil—Waste.

The unauthorized severance and removal of oil by a tenant constitutes waste.

5. Same—Lease—Construction.

Where defendant's assignor leased certain oil land for three years, with privilege of renewal for five, on the representation that he wished the premises to erect a tenement building thereon, at an annual rental of $100, with permission of the lessee to remove at the termination of the lease such buildings as he might have erected, the lease was a grant of the use merely of the superficies of the soil, and, the lessee and his assignees having drawn oil therefrom, plaintiff was entitled to cancel the lease under Civ. Code, § 1930, authorizing such cancellation for an unauthorized use of the leased premises.

6. Same—Cancellation of Lease—Return of Rent Paid.

Where a lease was for a term of three years, with the privilege of renewal for five years at an annual rental of $100, and at the expiration of two years the lessor canceled the same because the lessee and his assigns had used the property for an unauthorized purpose, the contract should be considered as executed with reference to the expired period, so that the lessor was not required to return the rent paid therefor as a condition to the exercise of her right of cancellation.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. F. Fitzgerald, Judge.

See 74 Pac. 294.

Rehearing denied October 5, 1905.

Edwin A. Meserve (Jeff Paul Chandler of counsel), for appellants. Works, Lee & Works and Stephens & Stephens, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, the owner of a certain piece of land in the city of Los Angeles, sued defendant, as assignee of her lessee, to have canceled and annulled a lease under which it was holding, and for damages for its unlawful extraction of oil from her land. She alleged that she was in an Eastern state, and in ignorance of the condition of her property and of the surrounding property, and in ignorance of the fact that the land lay in an oil belt or district within the city of Los Angeles; that Book, her lessee, by letter represented to her that he wished to lease the premises for the purpose of erecting a tenement building thereon, and concealed from her the fact that oil existed upon the premises; that in fact Book had already entered upon the land and was at that time by a well extracting oil therefrom; that she executed to Book a lease for the term of three years, with the privilege of a renewal of five years, for the annual rental of $100, payable quarterly in advance, with permission to the lessee to remove, at the termination of the lease, such buildings as he might have erected. It is then alleged that the defendant took an assignment of this lease from Book, and entered into possession of the property under the lease "with knowledge of the terms thereof." Then follow allegations of the discovery of the true condition and of the fraud of Book after two years had expired and two years' rent had been paid, the service of notice upon Book and upon the defendant receiver, and vacation of the lease because of its fraudulent procurement and the continued pumping of oil by the defendant after such notice. Trial was had before the court without a jury. The court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, decreed a cancellation and annulment of the lease, gave damages to plaintiff in the sum of $4,070, and enjoined defendant from operating the oil well and removing therefrom any of the tubing, machinery, tanks, and other appliances.

Treating that phase of the action which deals with the rescission and cancellation of the lease for the fraud of Book, the complaint is radically defective in failing to allege that the defendant took with knowledge or notice of the fraud. It is not sufficient, as respondent argues upon this point, that the evidence in the case shows constructive knowledge on the part of defendant through notice and knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent person upon inquiry. The difficulty is in the complaint itself, which nowhere avers such notice or knowledge. So far as the pleadings go, plaintiff by her absence of averment has placed the defendant in the position of an innocent purchaser without notice, and the fraud of its assignor, therefore, cannot be made a ground for the avoidance of the lease which it had thus innocently and for value acquired. Deputy v. Stapleford, 19 Cal. 302; Conn. Co. v. McCormick, 45 Cal. 583; Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 Pac. 1053. It follows, therefore, that plaintiff was not entitled to a cancellation of the lease against this defendant for the fraud of Book, to which it was not a party and with knowledge of which it was not charged.

But section 1930 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "When a thing is let for a particular purpose the hirer must not use it for any other purpose, and if he does the letter may hold him responsible for its safety during such use in all events, or may treat the contract as thereby rescinded." This provision is found in chapter 1, under the title of "Hiring in General," chapter 2, providing for the hiring of real property, and chapter 3, for the hiring of personal property. It is therefore applicable to the hiring of real property. When the Code speaks of the letting for a particular purpose, it is, of course, not limited to a single purpose. It means that when property is used for a purpose other than that or those for which it has been let. And if, in fact, the land here leased was used for a purpose other than that legitimately contemplated by the lease, the section is applicable. That it was so used admits of no doubt. Oil is a mineral, and as a mineral is part of the realty. Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229. It is recognized as a mineral in our mining laws. Corporations formed for the purpose of securing and marketing it come within the purview of the mining laws, and claims for oil-bearing lands are taken up as are claims for mineral lands. Like the precious metals, therefore, or coal, oil in place is a part of the freehold. Its severance and removal, except in proper cases, is waste. Stoughton's Appeal, 88 Pa. 198; Williamson v. Jones (W. Va.) 19 S. E. 436, 25 L. R. A. 222. It is likewise beyond peradventure that such a lease as here was executed, without any reference to minerals, mines, or quartz, is a lease merely of the superficies of the soil. Owings v. Emery, 6 Gill, 260. It follows, therefore, that, aside from any question of the fraud of Book, he had no right, under his lease, to commit waste by the removal of the oil; and as his assignee, the defendant herein, at best could only acquire by the assignment such rights as Book himself was legally entitled to exercise, it likewise follows that the defendant had no right to continue to extract this oil. Here, then, was a use of the thing let for a purpose not only foreign to the letting, but for a purpose which absolutely involved the impairment, and to a great extent the destruction, of the value of the freehold. While at common law against a tenant who committed waste the remedy was by an action for waste, and later by an action on the case for waste and for injunction, and while an action for forfeiture could not follow unless a right of re-entry was preserved in the lease, it would appear that section 1930 of our Civil Code has modified this common-law rule in distinctly declaring that the letter, under such circumstances, may treat the contract as thereby rescinded—rescinded, that is to say, by force of the wrongful act of the possessor in using the property for a purpose foreign to that for which it was let. The property in this case having been so used, all questions of fraud may be eliminated, and plaintiff's complaint is sufficient for a rescission under section 1930.

But against this it is urged that the plaintiff was not entitled to rescind for her failure to offer to restore the two annual payments of rent, amounting to $200, which admittedly she had received. In proper cases it is unquestionably true that restoration or offer to restore is essential to a rescission. Authority need not be cited in support of so elementary a proposition. But in this case it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to restore or to offer to restore all or any part of the money which she had accepted as rent. While for many purposes the term of lease is regarded as indivisible, and the rent likewise indivisible, and as applying to the whole term, in modern estates of leaseholds, where monthy rental or annual rental (as here) is specified, it is frequently necessary to divide the rent to cover the indicated period. Here Book and his assignee had had possession of the premises under the lease for the two years for which the rent had been paid, and were entitled with that possession to the enjoyment of the property for all legitimate purposes. This use of the property, and this withholding of it from the owner, constituted a sufficient consideration year by year for the yearly payments which were made. As to the payments which had been made for the time which had elapsed, the contract was not executory. It was executed. Defendant and its predecessor had received the full benefit for the money which had been paid, and a restoration of it was not necessary by plaintiff before commencing this action. The case in this respect is similar to that of Wilson v. Moriarty, 77 Cal. 596, 20 Pac. 134, and Whyte v. Rosecrantz, 123 Cal. 634, 56 Pac. 436, 69 Am. St. Rep. 90.

The evidence, which was admitted under objection and exception of defendant, touching the fraud of Book, in consideration of what has been said, becomes immaterial, and therefore the error, if error there were, could not have prejudiced the defendant. The evidence as to damage was sufficient to support the finding of the court.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

ISOM v. REX CRUDE OIL CO. et al. (L. A. 1,342.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1905.)

1. MINING CORPORATIONS — CONSOLIDATION — EFFECT.

Under Civ. Code, § 361, relating to mining companies, and declaring that no consolidation shall in any way relieve such companies or the stockholders thereof from any and all just liabilities, the consolidation of a mining company into a new company did not work a dissolution of the company consolidated; and hence the service of process after consolidation on its secretary, who still held office, except for the consolidation, was sufficient to confer jurisdiction of the corporation.

2. COURTS—CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—POSSESSION OF RECEIVER.

Where suit was brought in a federal court against the assignee of the lease alone to cancel the same, when the property was in the hands of a receiver appointed by a state court in a similar action, the receiver not being a party to the action in the federal court, it was no objection to that court's jurisdiction that the property was in the hands of such receiver and that leave had not been obtained from the state court to sue him.

3. SAME.

Where, after appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in a suit to cancel a lease, and the filing of a supersedeas, and the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property, plaintiff brought a similar suit for the same relief in a federal court, in which she recovered judgment by default and the court issued a writ of assistance, directing its marshal to put complainant in possession of the property, an order of the state court, on the application of the receiver for instructions, directing him to deliver the property to the marshal before the determination of the appeal, was an abuse of discretion

Action by S. McG. Isom against the Rex Crude Oil Company and another. From an order directing a receiver of the assets of the Rex Crude Oil Company to turn over to a United States marshal possession of certain real estate held by him under a lease assigned to the company, defendants, the Rex Crude Oil Company and the Union Consolidated Crude Oil Company, appeal. Reversed.

See 74 Pac. 294.

Edwin A. Meserve (Jeff Paul Chandler, of counsel), for appellants. Stephens & Stephens, A. W. Hutton, and Works, Lee & Works, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The plaintiff, Isom, had sued defendant the Rex Crude Oil Company in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, and had obtained a judgment for the annulment of a certain lease held by it, upon the ground that it was procured by fraud, and for damages. Subsequently the court appointed a receiver of the property, who was ordered to take possession of it and operate it; the land being oil-bearing land. This the receiver did, and the defendant the Rex Crude Oil Company took its appeal from the judgment, and with its appeal filed a supersedeas bond. Thereafter the Rex Crude Oil Company and two other corporations consolidated their assets, franchises, and property into the Union Consolidated Crude Oil Company. After this consolidation the plaintiff, Isom, filed her bill in the Circuit Court of the United States, Ninth Circuit, Southern District of California, against the Rex Crude Oil Company. Substantially the same allegations of fraud were made in this bill as were set forth in the complaint in the state court, and additionally it was alleged that the lease in question had expired by its terms. The bill further set forth the proceedings in the state court resulting in favor of the plaintiff, and the appointment of the receiver, and the possession of the property by the receiver. It was prayed that the lease be declared void and canceled, and that it be adjudged and decreed that the lease, if valid, had been terminated by its own provisions, and that plaintiff be decreed to be entitled to the possession of the property free from any claim on the part of the defendant. The Rex Crude Oil Company made no appearance in this action. Judgment passed for the plaintiff; the Circuit Court finding in accordance with the allegations, and decreeing in accordance with the prayer. To this action in the Circuit Court the receiver was not made a party. The Rex Crude Oil Company was the sole defendant. A writ of assistance was issued by the Circuit Court, directing the marshal to put the complainant in possession of the property. On the following day the receiver appointed by the state court filed his report, in which he alleged that the writ of assistance had been served on him by the United States marshal, and he submitted the writ and the facts above stated to the superior court, requesting the direction of that court as to the proper course for him to pursue. Following this, plaintiff, Isom, after due notice, moved the superior court for its order directing the receiver to turn over and deliver the possession of the property to the United States marshal. The superior court made its order in compliance with this motion, and it is from that order that this appeal is taken.

The Union Consolidated Crude Oil Company, claiming by consolidation to have succeeded to all the rights of the Rex Crude Oil Company, appears also as appellant herein. Objection is made that it has no standing in the matter; but the objection is immaterial and need not be considered, since all of its rights are fully protected by the appeal of the Rex Crude Oil Company.

As has been stated, the action in the Circuit Court was commenced, and service upon the secretary of the Rex Crude Oil Company was had, after the consolidation of the corporations into the Union Consolidated Crude Oil Company. In this regard the admission upon the record is that W. F. Armstrong had been the secretary of the Rex Crude Oil Company, and that he ceased to be secretary of that company only by virtue of its consolidation with the Union Consolidated Crude Oil Company, and not otherwise, by resignation or removal. Appellant's contention is that by the consolidation the Rex Crude Oil Company as a corporation ceased to exist, and consequently ceased to have any officers; that the attempted and pretended service upon W. F. Armstrong, as its secretary, was a nullity; and that the Circuit Court never acquired jurisdiction of defendant. The question thus presented is whether, under our laws, such consolidation works a dissolution of the constituent corporations. It is, of course, true that the consolidated corporation itself becomes a new and distinct entity, and such, indeed, has been decided in Market Street Railway Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 587, 42 Pac. 225. No decision in this state bears directly upon this question. In California Central Railway Co. v. Hooper, 76 Cal. 407, 18 Pac. 599, the court, discussing an Ohio case, which holds that under the Ohio statute a dissolution of the consolidating corporations results, says: "Whether the consolidated companies cease to exist for every purpose immediately upon consolidation, whether they did not continue separate as to their creditors (Civ. Code, § 473), is, perhaps, unimportant here." This language was used, having regard to the consolidation of railroad corporations, to which section 473 applied; but the consolidation in the case at bar was that of mining corporations, and upon that the language of section 361, Civ. Code, is so plain as to relieve from all doubt. It provides: "No such consolidation shall in any way relieve such companies, or the stockholders thereof, from any and all just liabilities." In the case of a railroad corporation, section 473, as amended in 1901, makes provision that a demand against a constituent company may be enforced against the consolidated corporation. No such provision is found in the act relative to the consolidation of mining corporations, and, if neither the companies nor their stockholders, by virtue of the consolidation, are to be relieved from any just liability, it would seem to require little argument upon the proposition that their corporate entities are preserved, to the end that they may be served with process and called upon to defend any action, arising either from contract or from tort, which may be brought against them. We conclude, therefore, that, notwithstanding the consolidation, the corporate existence of the Rex Crude Oil Company was preserved by law to the extent that in its corporate capacity it might be called upon in court to meet any and all just liabilities, and that the service upon its secretary Armstrong was sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the Circuit Court.

It is contended that the judgment of the Circuit Court was a nullity, in that the receiver was not made a party to that action, that he was a necessary party, and that permission to sue him had not been obtained from the state court. It is unquestionably true that a court will not entertain an action to recover property in the possession of a defendant as receiver of another court unless leave to sue its receiver has been obtained from that court (Ross v. Heckman [C. C.] 84 Fed. 6), and the want of power in the federal court to entertain such a suit is held to be jurisdictional. Peale v. Phipps, 14 How. 368, 14 L. Ed. 459; Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, 26 L. Ed. 672. But in this case the receiver was not made a party defendant. There was nothing, therefore, touching the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court—a question which could be raised only when the receiver had been made defendant without permission. Nor did the judgment as such affect, or pretend to affect, the rights of the receiver in possession. It was an adjudication, as between the owner of the property and the assignee of her lessee, that the lease under which the defendant was claiming its right to possession had terminated, and that as between the two the right to possession was in the plaintiff. No effort was made by this judgment to disturb the receiver in his possession, nor to impose upon the receiver any liability or responsibility of any kind. It is only so far as the rights of the receiver are involved that concern is here paid to the judgment of the Circuit Court.

The other propositions which appellant argues are not matters for consideration upon this appeal. What effect the Circuit Court might give to its judgment, how fully it could execute it, are not matters before us on this collateral attack, for the judgment certainly was not void upon its face. Wheelwright v. Canal Co. (C. C.) 50 Fed. 709.

We thus come, finally, to the direct consideration of the order of the state court directing its receiver to turn the property in question over to the United States marshal. There can be no doubt that a court having property in custody through its receiver may, in a proper case, direct that receiver to turn over the property to the federal court in aid of the enforcement of its writ. The matter is one of comity (Wheelwright v. Canal Co., supra); but it is equally true that in an improper case such an order by the state court is error; and erroneous we think the order was in this instance. The judgment for plaintiff in the state court which formed the basis and reason for the appointment of the receiver was not final, but was undetermined upon appeal. Appellant from that judgment had filed its supersedeas bond staying its execution, and had the right to insist that the status quo should be preserved until the final adjudication of the controversy upon its appeal.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

NICCOLLS v. RICE et al. (L. A. 1,401.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1905.)

CORPORATIONS — DIRECTORS — FUNDS — MISAPPROPRIATION — CREDITORS' SUIT — PARTIES IN INTEREST.

Where plaintiff, in a suit against the directors of an insolvent savings bank to recover for assets misappropriated, appeared only for himself and such other creditors "as would join with him," and it did not appear, prior to the dismissal of such suit under a compromise, that there were any creditors who did not join in the action, a creditor who did not join, and was not a party to the arrangement between the creditors for the bringing and maintaining the suit, and did not contribute thereto, was not entitled to recover any portion of the proceeds of the settlement.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by R. Niccolls against J. A. Rice and another. From a judgment granting a nonsuit, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Mannix, Geo. H. P. Shaw, and Edwin A. Wells, for appellant. C. H. Rippey and Withington & Carter, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment granting a nonsuit and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

In June, 1893, the Savings Bank of San Diego County closed its doors and suspended business. Thereafter, in 1895, proceedings were instituted by the Attorney General of the state of California, and said bank was thereupon declared insolvent and proceeded to liquidate. In December, 1895, certain depositors of said bank entered into an agreement, constituting a committee from their number, consisting of A. P. Meeker, T. J. Higgins, Joseph Winchester, George Fuller, and Isaac Smith, for the purpose of instituting proceedings against the directors of said bank, for the purpose of enforcing any and all legal liability calculated to result in the betterment of the claims of the parties who signed said agreement. They also by said agreement constituted Joseph Winchester trustee, and assigned their respective claims to him for the purpose of enforcement. Thereafter, in June, 1896, said Winchester, as said trustee of the depositors and creditors of said bank who had entered into said agreement, commenced an action in the superior court of San Diego county against Bryant Howard, Hiram Mabury, E. W. Morse, O S. Witherby, J. H. Barbour, John Ginty, Monroe Johnson, Medora H. Howard, and the said savings bank. It was declared in the complaint "that the plaintiff brings this action in behalf of himself and any other creditors or depositors of said institution who may join with him." Plaintiff herein never applied to be made a party to the action, and no order was ever made bringing him or any other person in as parties to the action. The savings bank defaulted in said action, and defendant Hiram Mabury filed a demurrer to the complaint of Winchester on various grounds, and thereafter, in June, 1899, the superior court of San Diego county sustained said demurrer and entered judgment in favor of Mabury. Winchester thereupon appealed from said judgment. Pending said appeal Winchester died, and thereupon the committee of depositors mentioned in said agreement nominated J. A. Rice as successor in said trust of Joseph Winchester, deceased, and upon an application the superior court of San Diego county appointed said Rice as such trustee in place of said Winchester, and he was thereafter, in October, 1900, substituted as plaintiff, as successor in interest, in place of said Winchester in said action against Bryant Howard and others; and in May, 1902, the Supreme Court, by order, substituted said Rice as plaintiff in place of said Winchester, and the action was thereupon continued in his name, as trustee in place of said Winchester, as plaintiff in said action against Bryant Howard and others. In this court, upon the hearing of said cause, the judgment of the lower court was reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer and allow the defendant reasonable time to answer. Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153. Thereafter, and for the purpose of ending said litigation, in the way of compromise, the said Mabury agreed to pay, and paid, through his attorney, the sum of $40,000 to D. L. Withington, as attorney for the plaintiff in said action, and certain other persons who had joined with the plaintiff, under the provisions of said agreement. Thereafter, upon stipulation of the parties to the action, the judgment of this court (136 Cal. 432, 448, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153) was vacated, and the appeal dismissed; the effect thereof being the affirmance of the judgment of the superior court. Subsequently the superior court action was dismissed as to the defendants other than Mabury. Thereafter, in July, 1902, this action was commenced against said Rice (the plaintiff in the former action), and said Savings Bank of San Diego County.

In the complaint herein it is alleged that the plaintiff deposited in the said Savings Bank of San Diego County $2,000, none of which sum has been paid, and that the same, with interest thereon, is due. It is further alleged in the complaint herein, among other things, that said Winchester and said Rice, respectively, assumed and claimed to represent, and did represent, all the creditors of said savings bank; and in fact said action was brought, prosecuted, maintained, and compromised for and on behalf of all the creditors and depositors of said bank as a body, and not for the exclusive benefit of any particular creditor or depositor, and said Hiram Mabury paid said sum of $40,000 in compromise of said cause of action of all of said creditors and depositors and for their use and benefit, to said Rice as the representative of all said creditors and depositors. The savings bank, one of the defendants, defaulted in this action, the same as in the former. In the answer of defendant Rice it is denied that in the action entitled "Joseph Winchester, Trustee, v. Bryant Howard et al.," and referred to in plaintiff's complaint, and throughout the prosecution, maintenance, and compromise thereof, or at all, the said Joseph Winchester and J. A. Rice, respectively, or at all, professed or claimed that said action was brought for the use and benefit of all the creditors and depositors of said bank; denies the fact to be that said action was brought, or prosecuted, or maintained, or compromised for and on behalf of all the creditors and depositors of said bank as a body; denies that said Hiram Mabury paid the sum of $40,000, or any sum, in compromise of said or any cause of action of all the creditors and depositors of said bank, and for their use and benefit; and denies that the said sum of $40,000, or any sum, was paid to said J. A. Rice as a representative of all the creditors and depositors of said bank. It is further denied that, in the compromise of the cause of action set forth in the complaint, said Hiram Mabury agreed to and did pay the sum of $40,000, or any sum, in order to carry into effect the agreement referred to in said complaint, or any agreement, to pay this plaintiff. On the contrary, it is averred that said sum of $40,000 was paid by said Hiram Mabury to D. L. Withington as the attorney of the plaintiff in said action and the persons who had joined with the plaintiff therein, and that the only part thereof which this defendant has received is the sum of $28,000, which sum was paid to him as the trustee of those persons only who, under and by the instrument set forth in the complaint, had assigned their claims against the said Savings Bank of San Diego County to said Joseph Winchester, and that said sum was so received by this defendant for the sole purpose of distributing the same to such persons or their assigns under the provision of said instrument.

The only evidence introduced on the trial of the cause was that offered on the part of the plaintiff, consisting in the deposition of S. F. Leib, who acted as the attorney of Hiram Mabury. Leib testifies that he is familiar with the action brought in Winchester v. Howard, and also with the previous case of Winchester v. Mabury, reported in 122 Cal. 522, 55 Pac. 393. He says: After the decision of this court reversing the judgment had in the court below in favor of Mabury, "I started to prepare and was preparing a petition for rehearing of the case, when the adjustment of the litigation and compromise of it was brought up, and negotiations were conducted exclusively on my side by myself and on the other side by Mr. Withington, and resulted finally in a compromise, by which a stipulation was signed, the precise terms of which I do not recall, but which will speak for itself; but the effect of it was that the order of the Supreme Court reversing the judgment below should be set aside, and such order, upon such stipulation, was in fact by the Supreme Court set aside, and a remittitur was issued affirming the judgment below in favor of Mr. Mabury, which judgment is now final and in full force in his favor." He was asked: "Who effected this settlement and compromise?" and answered: "It was effected between Mr. Withington and myself, the two of us. There was considerable negotiation before it was effected." He was asked: "What was the consideration for such payment?" and answered: "The settlement of the litigation. Q. For whose use and benefit was such payment made? A. For whomever Mr. Withington might legally represent in that action. Q. Did you know for whose use or benefit this payment was made? A. No further than what the complaint disclosed. Q. Are you able to state for whose use and benefit this payment was made? A. No further than I have answered. When I say the complaint, I mean the complaint in that action of 'Winchester, Trustee (Rice, Trustee, Substituted), v. Howard, Mabury et al.'—not in the complaint in the action in which I am giving this deposition." Further answering, he says: "In San Francisco, the day of the final culmination of the settlement, the day the order was made, and during the negotiations for settlement, the question occurred to me as to whether the parties who had specifically been named in the complaint, and who had not specifically applied to be joined as plaintiffs, might bring a subsequent action, and that matter was mentioned between Mr. Withington and myself, and it was, I think, agreed between us (at least I so understood it) that, not only would they be barred by the statute of limitations, should they do so, but that, under the decision of the court in the case as to all parties being represented by the plaintiffs in the case, whatever judgment was entered in that case would necessarily be a bar as to all such parties; but I do not mean by this to say that it was understood or agreed that these other parties, who had not applied to be made parties and had not contributed to the prosecution of the action, would be entitled to share in the proceeds of this settlement. I think Mr. Withington's idea was that they would not; but that was a question which it was not necessary for me to determine in making the settlement, so I did not pretend to do so, nor do I venture an opinion upon that matter now. That is a matter for them to determine in this litigation. Q. Did you know what disposition was to be made of this $40,000? A. I did not. I did not care anything about that proposition, because Mr. Withington had full power to settle that suit, and it did not become me to ask him what he was going to do with the money."

The controlling issue in the action is whether Winchester, and subsequently Rice, respectively, assumed to and did represent all the creditors and depositors of said Savings Bank of San Diego County in said action, so brought, prosecuted, and compromised as alleged in plaintiff's complaint herein, or whether said action was brought, prosecuted, and finally compromised for and on behalf of the creditors and depositors only who had joined in the said agreement. The answer, as already shown, specifically denies the allegation of the complaint that said action was brought for the use and benefit of all the creditors and depositors of said bank, or that the same was finally compromised for and on behalf of all the creditors, or that the said sum of money received from said Mabury was received in said compromise for and on behalf of all the creditors, or that said Rice entered into said stipulation of June 4th, attached to plaintiff's complaint herein, in order to carry into effect such agreement. On the contrary, the answer, as already shown, avers that said action was brought, prosecuted, and compromised for and on behalf of the persons who had joined with the plaintiff therein under the said agreement, and who had assigned their claims against said bank to the said trustee constituted in said agreement. The agreement in question is appended to the complaint therein and made a part thereof. By the terms of said agreement, as already shown, a committee composed of some of the subscribers was constituted to manage the contemplated prosecution of said suit on behalf of the subscribers to said agreement, and Winchester was appointed trustee in their behalf to conduct said litigation, and he was authorized to employ the law firms of Rippey & Nutt and Withington & Carter as counsel for the purpose of such suits and actions, and no compromise was to be made or any suit commenced, "founded upon the claims herein assigned, except with the consent of the assignors, whose claims aggregate the major part or amount of such claims." A bond was also required from the trustee, Winchester, in the sum of $10,000, with sureties, approved by the depositors' committee, and the subscribers agreed to pay the trustee according to a scale of assessments mentioned in the agreement, to be applied under the direction of the committee for payment of costs and expenses in the litigation. The plaintiff was not a party to the agreement, and neither Winchester nor Rice acted as trustee on his behalf, and he did not join in the employment of counsel or contribute to the expenses of the litigation. It will also be seen that the only evidence in support of the issue on the part of the plaintiff consisted of the deposition of Mr. Leib, the substance of which has already been given. It appears from this that, so far from supporting the allegation of the complaint on this material issue, it tends to support the contention in defendants' answer, to wit, that the action was compromised and settled with Mabury, and the sum by him paid over to the attorney of defendant Rice, for and on behalf of the parties who entered into the agreement constituting said Winchester, and subsequently said Rice, their trustee and representative for that purpose.

As shown in the foregoing opinion, there was no evidence warranting a conclusion that the $40,000 was paid upon any such agreement as would make Rice a trustee for creditors not parties to the trust agreement. It may be conceded that where, under section 3, art. 12, of the Constitution, a creditor brings an action, on behalf of himself and all other creditors, against the directors of the corporation, to recover for such creditors moneys misappropriated by such directors, such plaintiff creditor cannot, after putting himself in that position, effect a compromise of the suit and appropriate the money obtained by the compromise to his own use, or to the use of a part of the creditors, to the exclusion of others. A creditor, suing as plaintiff in such suit, occupies the position of a trustee for the benefit of all of the creditors, and he cannot maintain the action at all, unless he consents to be such trustee. Once he assumes that position, he is subject to the rules applicable to all trustees, and everything which he may obtain by means of the suit, whether by way of compromise or by a judgment regularly rendered, will be, in equity, the joint property of all the creditors, and, after deducting the just sum due the plaintiff for his services and expenses, must be divided pro rata among them all. But according to the evidence in this case the plaintiff in the suit against the directors never consented to stand as plaintiff for the benefit of all the creditors, and hence never became a trustee for all. In his complaint he expressly limited his trusteeship, and appeared only for himself and such other creditors as would join with him. The objection was made that this constituted a defect of parties. This court, in its decision (136 Cal. 447, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153), held that the complaint was not demurrable on that ground, as it did not on its face show that there were other creditors, but stated that, if it was made to appear that there were other creditors, the court should order them brought in as parties. There were in fact other creditors who did not join in that action, and who should have been brought in if the action were to be further prosecuted; but this fact never was made known to the court, and before any further steps were taken in the case after the decision of this court the plaintiff therein, while still limiting the beneficiaries of his suit to those creditors who should join with him, made the compromise in question, receiving therefor the $40,000, of which the present plaintiff claims a share. The plaintiff in the case at bar never joined in the former action, nor in any manner aided or assisted therein. Under these circumstances Rice, the plaintiff in the former action, never became a trustee for this plaintiff, nor for any others who did not act in concert to bring the former action; and consequently those parties not joining or assisting are not entitled to share in the money received in the compromise. See Hirshfeld v. Fitzgerald, 157 N. Y. 166–180, 51 N. E. 997, 46 L. R. A. 839.

The plaintiff clearly failed, on his own evidence, to make out a case, and the nonsuit was properly granted. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

BROWNLEE et al. v. REINER et al.

(Sac. 1,127.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 5, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Time.

An attempted appeal from a judgment, not taken within six months after the entry thereof, was too late.

2. Witnesses—Cross-Examination.

Where a witness in his testimony in chief had made certain statements showing that he dealt with R., as plaintiff's agent, questions asked on cross-examination relating to what he said on that subject were properly allowed.

3. Evidence—Materiality.

Where a contract relating to the sale of a mine contained a recital that plaintiffs were unable to sell the mine, a question, asked of one of the plaintiffs as a witness, as to why they could not sell the property, was objectionable as immaterial.

4. New Trial—Reception of Evidence.

Where plaintiffs testified as to the reason why R.'s act in taking a deed to a certain mine in his own name had been ratified, error in sustaining an objection to a question as to whether there was any other reason for such ratification was too unimportant to warrant a new trial.

5. Evidence—Secondary Evidence.

Where the addressees of a telegram sent them by plaintiffs were in court, and no demand was made for the production thereof, the offer of a copy of the telegram was objectionable as secondary evidence.

6. Appeal—Review.

Whether the judgment is the proper logical conclusion from the findings cannot be considered on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by A. G. Brownlee and another against George J. Reiner and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied October 5, 1905.

John H. Magoffey (J. C. McKinstry, of counsel), for appellants. R. S. Taylor and Gillis & Tapscott, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The transcript also shows an attempted appeal from the judgment; but said attempted appeal cannot be considered, because it was not taken within six months after the entry of the judgment.

The main purpose of the action was to obtain a judgment decreeing that the defendant George J. Reiner convey to plaintiffs certain mining property known as the "Schroeder Consolidated Quartz Mine." The Siskiyou County Bank is made a defendant for the purpose of restraining it from delivering to the said defendant Reiner a certain deed of said mine held in escrow by the bank; but this feature of the case is merely incidental to the main purpose. The court decided that plaintiffs were not entitled to a deed of conveyance of said mine from defendant Reiner; and, if that decision stands, there is no reason for disturbing any other part of the judgment. The most important parts of the argument of counsel for appellants go to points which cannot be considered on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial—as, for instance, that "the findings of the court do not support the judgment," and that "plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for the whole of the Schroeder mine." The only points available to appellants on the record here presented are that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the findings, and that there occurred at the trial, in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, errors of law of sufficient importance to warrant a reversal of the order denying a new trial. And as to the first point it is enough to say that there was sufficient evidence to support the findings.

In order to intelligently present and consider the question whether the court committed any error in ruling on the admissibility of evidence, and whether, if there was any such error, it was material and prejudicial, it is necessary, perhaps, to refer briefly to some of the numerous documents and transactions out of which this litigation arose. The Schroeder mine, the property here involved, belonged on April 26, 1899, to Henry Schroeder, and on that day he executed a written instrument by which he gave to plaintiffs here a 60-day option to buy said mine for $40,000. Afterwards, on May 19, 1899, the plaintiffs, having no interest in the mine other than said option, entered into a written contract with the defendant Reiner, by which plaintiffs agreed to sell said mine to Reiner, and the latter agreed to buy the same, for the sum of $100,000—$50,000 in 35 days, and the balance in certain deferred payments; a conveyance to be made by the plaintiffs to Reiner when he shall have paid all the purchase money, and Reiner to forfeit all rights if he should fail to make all of the payments. This contract was free from ambiguity. It was a usual contract for the sale and purchase of property, and by it Reiner promised to buy the mine for a certain sum due in certain payments, and plaintiffs promised to execute to him a deed of the mine upon his compliance with the terms. There was nothing in the contract about agency. The relation of the parties to it was simply that of vendor and vendee. But on the next day, May 20, 1899, the said parties entered into another written contract, which referred to the contract of May 19th, and changed some of its provisions, and, perhaps, entirely rescinds it, although whether it does so is not clear. This second contract of May 20th is the one upon which the plaintiffs found their present cause of action. This contract is to a considerable extent ambiguous, vague, and contradictory in its terms, although, perhaps, not entirely void for uncertainty. If its main purpose had been to create puzzling questions for lawyers and courts, it would have been a marked success. It first refers to and states at length the provisions of the previous contract of May 19th in which the relation of the parties was solely that of vendor and vendee, and does not, at that point, make any change in the said previous contract. But it then abruptly refers to the option which plaintiffs had to purchase the mine from Schroeder for $40,000. It then proceeds as follows: "And whereas, the party of the first part herein [plaintiffs] is unable to sell said property; and whereas, the party of the second part herein [Reiner] may be able to sell the same, and has agreed to endeavor to find a purchaser for the same, and is now engaged in the effort to find a purchaser therefor: Now, notwithstanding the execution of the agreement heretofore entered into between the parties hereto, it is by the parties hereto mutually agreed, * * * as follows, to wit: The said party of the second part hereby agrees to endeavor to find a purchaser for the property hereinbefore described, for such sum as he may see fit to take for such property, over and above the sum of $40,000." If this had ended the contract, it might be construed, perhaps, as entirely abrogating the first contract and putting in its place a mere power to Reiner to sell for plaintiffs for any price Reiner "may see fit to take" over $40,000—which practically means not less than $40,000, for a sale for a merely nominal sum more than $40,000 would satisfy the terms of the contract. But the contract proceeds as follows: "And the party of the first part agrees with the party of the second part that if he shall, on or before the 25th day of June, A. D. 1899, pay to the said party of the first part the sum of $40,000, the party of the first part will forthwith deliver to the party of the second part a good and sufficient conveyance of the hereinbefore described property, free of all incumbrances of any kind or character whatever, and the provisions of the agreement heretofore made by and between the parties hereto as to the payment of any other sum or sums of money, or the forfeiture of any rights of the party of the second part under this agreement, are hereby declared and agreed to be null and void." The language just quoted refers to the former contract, which was a pure agreement between the parties of sale and purchase, and seems to continue that contract with amounts, forfeiture, etc., changed. Moreover the language of the second contract, just quoted, itself, clearly gives to Reiner the right to himself become the purchaser for $40,000, and to receive a deed upon making payment. However, in subsequent parts of the contract it is provided that, if there be any surplus of the purchase price over $40,000, such surplus shall be equally divided between the parties. It is also provided that Reiner may, if he choose to do so, form a stock company to take the title to said mine, and that he shall have the right to accept in payment of the property "$40,000, or any sum in excess thereof that he may deem proper, and any amount of stock in such company as the balance of the selling price of said property, and that the stock so remaining may be treated as a surplus as aforesaid, and may be divided between the parties hereto, in the same manner as if it were money as aforesaid."

The foregoing are the main and material features of this confused and obscure contract upon which plaintiffs rely for the judgment which they pray for in this action. After this contract was made the parties immediately proceeded to do things which gave rise to more complications. The plaintiffs gave Reiner a letter of introduction to Schroeder. In this letter they say that Reiner is the man to whom they have "turned over our bond on the Schroeder Consolidated Mine"; but it may be said that there are other expressions in the letter tending to show that they had not relinquished to Reiner all their interest in the option. But Reiner then made an arrangement with Schroeder by which the latter made a deed of the mine directly to Reiner, and deposited it in the Siskiyou County Bank, defendant herein, to be held by the bank in escrow, to be delivered to Reiner upon his payment of $40,000. At that time Reiner had also made a written contract in his own name with two men residing at Montreal, Canada, named Chisholm and Bell, by which Reiner agreed to sell the mine to them for $100,000, to be paid in certain installments, and Chisholm and Bell agreed to pay that sum, and to forfeit whatever they should have paid if they failed to make all the payments at the times stipulated. This contract was also deposited in said bank, and it was agreed between Schroeder and Reiner that whatever payments Chisholm and Bell should make on their contract with Reiner should go to Schroeder on his contract with Reiner until $40,000 should have been paid, when the bank was to deliver Schroeder's deed to Reiner. Chisholm and Bell made two payments of $15,000 each and the $30,000 thus paid was received by Schroeder. Afterwards Reiner advanced to Schroeder the remaining $10,000, and under the terms of the contract Reiner was then entitled to receive the said deed from Schroeder. It is possible that this $10,000 advanced by Reiner was afterwards paid him by Chisholm and Bell; but the court found that there was no evidence to show that fact. At all events, Chisholm and Bell never paid, at most, any more than the $40,000, and, as the time for paying the balance of the $100,000 has expired, they have forfeited all their rights under their contract. Perhaps the above statement of the confusion which has followed the contracts and acts of the various parties might have been omitted. We have made it, however, not only as an interesting showing of the manner by which parties may needlessly complicate their affairs, but as necessary, perhaps, in passing upon the alleged errors of the court in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence. As to the equities of the parties, it is hard to tell where they lie. The plaintiffs have received $2,200 as one-half of the value of certain bullion taken out of the mine by Chisholm and Bell, and, according to the decree of the court, they may be entitled to receive some more money from Reiner. They never paid out any money whatever for the mine, and it is clear that the efforts of Reiner procured the $40,000 which was paid to Schroeder. It does not appear whether or not the mine is of any value. The only persons who appear to have lost anything are Chisholm and Bell.

There are a large number of exceptions to rulings made on objections to offered evidence. Many of them are about trivial matters. We will specially notice some of them.

Several exceptions are to rulings allowing questions asked Schroeder on cross-examination, which are asserted to be not proper as cross-examination. But these rulings were correct. The witness had made certain statements in his testimony in chief tending to show that he dealt with Reiner as agent of plaintiffs, and the questions on cross-examination clearly related to what he had said on that subject.

The contract of May 20th contains a recital that plaintiffs were unable to sell the Schroeder mine, and an objection to the question asked of one of the plaintiffs, when a witness, why they could not sell the property, was sustained; and this ruling constitutes one of the grounds of exception. This ruling was also correct, for it was immaterial why the plaintiffs could not make the sale.

Plaintiffs having ratified the act of Reiner in taking the deed from Schroeder in his own name, one of the plaintiffs when on the witness stand gave quite a long explanation of the reason why this was done, and was then asked if there was any other reason, to which question an objection was sustained, and this ruling constitutes another exception. Whether or not the ruling was in a strict sense erroneous, the matter under the circumstances was too unimportant to warrant a new trial.

Plaintiffs offered in evidence a copy of a telegram from plaintiffs to Reiner and his alleged partner, H. M. Herrin, and an objection that it was secondary evidence, immaterial, etc., was sustained and an exception taken. The ruling was correct. Reiner and Herrin were in court and no demand was made for the production of the telegram. The authorities cited by appellant are not in point. Moreover, the telegram is in the record, and we cannot see its materiality. Certainly the ruling excluding it, even if erroneous, was not of importance enough to warrant a new trial.

A large number of exceptions are founded upon rulings of the court sustaining objections to various items of evidence offered by plaintiffs, not as directly pertinent to any issue in the case, but for the purpose, as plaintiffs' counsel stated, of showing that the parties by certain of their acts had construed certain things that were in the contract of May 20th, and, indeed, other things that were not in it. We do not think it necessary to state here this mass of offered testimony. It is sufficient to say that it was irrelevant to any issue in the case, and could not properly have worked its way into the evidence under the garb of the general purpose indicated.

We do not deem it necessary to notice specially the other exceptions. There were either no errors in the rulings, or the matters involved were too unimportant to have been prejudicial to the appellants. There was also an objection that the court did not find upon all the issues; but, assuming for the purposes of this case that this point can be raised on this appeal, we think that the court found all the facts involved in the issues. Of course, as before stated, we cannot consider whether the judgment is the proper logical conclusion from the findings.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order appealed from is affirmed.

BELL v. THOMPSON. (L. A. 1,387.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1905.)

1. Mortgages — Foreclosure — Attorney's Fees—Executors and Administrators.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage against the executor of the mortgagor's estate, etc., the inclusion of a lien for counsel fees in the judgment operated to make such fees payable out of the mortgaged property and thereby released the general assets of the estate, and there was no claim that such addition of attorney's fees to the judgment lien interfered with the redemption, a special administratrix of the estate was not entitled to have the foreclosure judgment set aside therefor.

2. Same—Rent—Collection by Purchaser—Setting Aside Sale.

It is no ground for the setting aside of a foreclosure sale, on a bill by a special administratrix, that the purchaser under the foreclosure decree against the executor of the mortgagor's estate collected an installment of rent which fell due before the foreclosure sale; the remedy of the administratrix subsequently appointed being an action at law, either against the tenant to recover as for rent unpaid, or, if the rent had been paid to the executor, against him for misapplication thereof.

3. Same—Sufficiency of Bill.

In a suit by a special administratrix to set aside a foreclosure decree against the executor of the mortgagor for fraud, a bill failing to aver that plaintiff, or the estate, or any other parties, privy or interested, had a good and valid defense to the foreclosure suit on its merits, coupled with the facts establishing such defense, was fatally defective.

4. Pleading—Objections—Waiver.

An objection that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not waived by a failure to demur, and may be taken at any stage of the case, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

5. Same—Aider by Verdict.

Where a complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the omission was not cured by verdict or judgment.

Rehearing denied October 11, 1905.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Drown, Leicester & Drown, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by Teresa Bell, as special administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, to vacate and annul a decree of foreclosure of mortgage secured by defendant against property of the estate of Bell for alleged fraud in its procurement. The gravamen of the charge is that George Staacke, while executor under the will of the estate of Bell, deceased, was likewise the agent of Louisa J. Thompson, who owned and held a mortgage and mortgage note in the sum of $50,000 upon property of the estate of Bell, and that by collusive fraud upon the part of the two Staacke permitted the mortgage to be foreclosed and the property to be sold and purchased by the defendant Thompson. The asserted fraud, as set forth in appellant's brief, consisted in Staacke, while executor of the estate, assuming the position of agent for the defendant in the collection of the note and mortgage, and in defendant's profiting by the foreclosure suit against her own agent in acquiring the mortgaged premises, which the court found to be of value exceeding the amount due on the mortgage; also because of alleged collusion between the executor and defendant in the inception and prosecution of the foreclosure suit, and actual fraud committed upon the estate of Bell by Staacke, and the defendant in the proceedings by which the mortgaged premises were transferred to the defendant; and, finally, that the defendant, in prosecuting the foreclosure suit, was merely suing her own agent in charge of the collection of the note and mortgage—that is to say, the plaintiff was in the foreclosure suit practically plaintiff and defendant. Trial was had upon all these matters. The findings of the court were in favor of defendant, and these findings draw abundant support from the evidence. It is uncontested and incontestable that the mortgage debt was a bona fide debt, that the claim against the estate upon it had been duly presented and allowed, that the estate was in default, and that a suit upon the note and mortgage, regularly instituted and regularly prosecuted in a court of competent jurisdiction, was properly tried and properly decided by the court. Not this alone, but while it was incumbent upon the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit (defendant and respondent in this) to have sued only the executors, and thus while it was unnecessary for her to have made the heirs, devisees, and trustees under the will parties to the action (Bayly v. Muehe, 65 Cal. 345, 3 Pac. 467, 4 Pac. 486; Collins v. Scott, 100 Cal. 446, 34 Pac. 1085; Finger v. McCaughey, 119 Cal. 59, 51 Pac. 13), nevertheless she impleaded in her action the trustees of the trust created by the will, the devisees under the will, the children of the decedent, the tenants in possession of the mortgaged property, and the widow of the deceased, who, as special administratrix, here prosecutes this appeal. The case was duly brought to trial without the slightest irregularity in procedure or haste in time, and under these circumstances the judgment was rendered.

The evidence offered by appellant at the trial was wholly insufficient to charge the defendant or her attorneys with any misconduct or irregularity in obtaining the judgment, not $1 of which was in excess of the sum justly due. The only possible objection to the judgment is the contention that it made the counsel fees a lien upon the mortgaged property. This proposition is not even presented by the complaint; but, conceding that it is valid and that the judgment was erroneous in that particular, it does not follow that injury resulted to the Bell estate. Far less does it follow that the error arose from fraud. If the counsel fees had not been made a lien upon the mortgaged property, they would have been payable out of the general assets of the estate, which have thus been relieved to that extent from the charge to which they otherwise would have been subjected, and there is no pretense that this small addition to the judgment lien interfered with a redemption. As to the further complaint that Miss Thompson, after purchasing the estate at foreclosure sale, collected an installment of rent which fell due before the sale, conceding, without deciding, the correctness of appellant's contention that this was payable to the executors, and not to her, the remedy of the subsequently appointed administratrix (this plaintiff) was an action at law against the tenant for rent unpaid, or, if the tenant had paid and the misapplication lay with the executor, then against him. From no point of view was it a ground for setting aside either the sale or the judgment.

The decision of this case is wholly justified by the findings of the court to which we have adverted, and rests upon them. It may be pointed out in addition, however, that plaintiff's complaint fails utterly to state a cause of action, since there is a complete absence of averment that the plaintiff, or that the estate of Bell, or that any other parties, privy or interested, had any defense to the foreclosure suit upon its merits. The absence of this necessary averment doubtless arose from the fact that it was impossible for the pleader, under the facts, to make such an allegation. That such an averment, and not only such an averment, but such an averment coupled with the facts establishing the defense, are necessary to the sufficiency of such a complaint, is a proposition of law settled beyond the possibility of controversy. In 1859, in this state, the rule was stated in Riddle v. Baker, 13 Cal. 295, as follows: "He must show that he was defrauded of his opportunity to defend, and that his defense, which, but for the practices of his adversary, would have been effectual, was by such practices rendered unavailing." In Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 138, 73 Am. Dec. 639, it is said: "Nor is it charged that the defendant had any defense to the note which was the foundation of the action; but, on the contrary, there is evidence that the defendant owed the debt, and that it is still due. The case, then, on the pleadings and proofs resolves itself into this proposition of law: Can a defendant having no defense to an action enjoin a judgment by default, obtained on a return by the sheriff of service of process, upon the ground that the return is false, and that in fact he had no notice of the proceeding? It is difficult to see upon what principle chancery would interfere in any such case in favor of such a defendant. * * * A court of equity would not take a legal advantage away in favor of a party who comes into equity acknowledging that he owes the money, and claims only the barren right of being permitted to defend against a claim to which he has no defense." In Whitney v. Kelly, 94 Cal. 153, 29 Pac. 626, 15 L. R. A. 813, 28 Am. St. Rep. 106, it is said: "In an action to set aside a judgment for fraud, the plaintiff must not only show by his complaint the facts constituting the fraud which gives him his right to the relief, but must also show that he has a defense to the original action upon the merits, and that he is able to present to the court the evidence constituting that defense. It is not sufficient to merely allege these matters as ultimate facts, or to aver them in the form of an affidavit of merits, but the facts themselves — those constituting the fraud, those constituting his defense, and those constituting his ability to present them to the court—must be incorporated into his complaint, so that the court may determine that, if his allegations are admitted by the other party, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a judgment in his favor in the original action." And, without further multiplying quotations, reference is made to Harnish v. Bramer, 71 Cal. 155, 11 Pac. 888; Davis v. Chalfant, 81 Cal. 627, 22 Pac. 972; Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 344, 28 Pac. 563, 16 L. R. A. 361, 27 Am. St. Rep. 143; Collins v. Scott, 100 Cal. 446, 34 Pac. 1085; Painter v. J. B. Painter Co., 133 Cal. 129, 65 Pac. 311; Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Cochran, 141 Cal. 656, 75 Pac. 315; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 417, 77 Pac. 1007; White v. Crow, 110 U. S. 187, 4 Sup. Ct. 71, 28 L. Ed. 113.

This objection that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not waived by failure to demur, and may be taken at any stage of the case. Code Civ. Proc. § 434. Nor is the omission cured by verdict or judgment. Buckman v. Hatch, 139 Cal. 53, 72 Pac. 445.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MILLARD v. KERN COUNTY. (L. A. 1,547.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1905.)

1. Counties—Claims—Presentation.

Where a claim against a county was wholly rejected on its first and only presentation to the board of supervisors, it was unnecessary for the claimant to present it again before suing thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Counties, §§ 329, 342, 343.]

2. Justices of the Peace—Fees—Statutes—Constitutionality.

The county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 536, c. 277) provided that justices of the peace in K. county in townships having a population of 4,000 should receive a monthly salary of $125 in full for all services, and that justices in townships of less than 4,000 should receive "fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law." In townships of from 900 to 4,000 inhabitants it was provided that a justice should receive not more than $100 a month for work in criminal cases, and in other townships they were entitled to receive $3 in each criminal case, not exceeding $40 in any one month. St. 1901, p. 749, c. 234, amended the county government act by classifying townships in K. county, and changed the township in which plaintiff was a justice so as to give him a fixed salary of $125 per month. Held, that such act as so amended was in violation of the constitutional provision requiring the compensation of officers to be fixed "in proportion to duties."

3. Counties—Action for Fees—Complaint.

Where a complaint of a justice of the peace against a county to recover fees alleged that on a specified date plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors for allowance and filed with the clerk of the board his claim for services as a justice of the peace of a certain township, which claim was duly itemized and was by the oath of the plaintiff certified to be correct, and that the amount claimed was then justly due, and that such claim was presented within a year after the last item therein set out accrued, a copy of which was annexed and marked an exhibit and made a part of the complaint, it contained a sufficient statement of the steps taken by plaintiff in presenting his claim to the board of supervisors, and stated a cause of action.

Van Dyke and Shaw, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' Decision.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by W. S. Millard against Kern County. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. W. P. Laird, Dist. Atty., for appellant. C. L. Claflin, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The action was brought to recover from defendant county $405 alleged to be due plaintiff as justice of the peace on 135 criminal actions and proceedings heard before him during the month of September, 1903. The plaintiff had judgment for the amount claimed, and the defendant county appeals therefrom.

1. Appellant's first contention is that the complaint fails to show that the claim was presented twice to the board of supervisors, and is therefore defective. It appears that the claim was wholly rejected on its first and only presentation to the board. It was therefore unnecessary to present it again. San Diego v. Riverside, 125 Cal. 499, 58 Pac. 81.

2. The vital question in the case relates to the constitutionality of the county government act of 1897 as amended in 1901. In 1897 (St. 1897, p. 536, c. 277) it was provided that justices of the peace in Kern county in townships having a population of 4,000 should receive a monthly salary of $125 in full compensation of all services in both civil and criminal cases. Under the same section justices of the peace in townships of less than 4,000 inhabitants were to receive the "fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law." In townships of from 900 to 4,000 inhabitants it was provided that a justice of the peace should receive not more than $100 in one month for work in criminal cases. In other townships they were to receive $3 in each criminal case, not exceeding $40 in any one month. In 1901 (St. 1901, p. 749, c. 234) the townships of Kern county were classified "for the purpose of regulating the salaries of justices of the peace and constables." This was intended as an amendment to the act of 1897 above referred to. Under the provisions of the act of 1897, as amended by the classification of townships in 1901, the township in which plaintiff was a justice of the peace was of the first class, which by the amendment was raised to a population of 5,000 and upwards, and the total compensation of the said justice by the terms of the statute was to be a fixed salary of $125 per month. We are of opinion, however, that the act as amended in 1901 does not regulate the compensation of justices of the peace "in proportion to duties," and is therefore in conflict with the Constitution. The late case of Tucker v. Barnum, 144 Cal. 266, 77 Pac. 919 is decisive of the question before us, and we quote its language as applicable here: "The objection, therefore, to the section under consideration, comes, not from the fact that it so classifies townships, but from the fact that within this classification there is a violation of the constitutional provision that the Legislature shall regulate the compensation of all officers 'in proportion to duties.' If two justices of the peace in townships of different population shall each dispose of 50 criminal cases in one month, they have rendered identical service; and that one, because he is a justice in a township of a smaller population than another, shall receive less compensation for identical services than shall the other justice, residing in a township of larger population, is a manifest violation of the constitutional provisions to which we have adverted. The law under consideration falls, therefore, not because it classifies townships by population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of township officers, but because, within the classification so made, it does not regulate the compensation 'in proportion to duties.'" The law of 1897, as amended in 1901, being unconstitutional, it follows that plaintiff is still entitled to $3 in each criminal case, just as he was before the passage of that act.

3. The complaint contained the following allegation: "That on the 6th day of October, 1903, plaintiff duly presented to the board of supervisors of said county for allowance, and filed with the clerk of said board, his claim for his services performed and rendered in the said actions and proceedings as justice of the peace of said township, which said claim was duly itemized, giving names, dates, and particular services rendered, and was by the oath of plaintiff duly verified to be correct, and that the amount claimed was then justly due, and that said claim was presented within a year after the last item of the account therein set out accrued. A copy of said claim is hereunto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this complaint." There was attached to the complaint as an exhibit a copy of the duly verified itemized claim. In the foregoing allegation the complaint contained a sufficient statement of the steps taken by plaintiff in presenting his claim to the board of supervisors. The complaint stated a cause of action.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

I dissent: VAN DYKE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I concur. There is no express authorization in the Constitution for a classification of the townships of a class of counties by population, for the purpose of fixing the compensation of township officers. The Constitution expressly provides only for a classification of counties by population. In the case of townships, therefore, a classification by population is not founded on any constitutional distinction, and must find its justification in other reasons. But it is recognized that a substantial difference in the population of the several townships of a class of counties will be ordinarily attended with a corresponding difference in the duties of the officers, and it has therefore been held that the Legislature may classify the townships of a class of counties by population for the purpose of fixing the compensation of the township officers. It is, however, not because of any constitutional distinction that this is permissible, but simply because a substantial natural reason exists for the creation of such classes, viz., that the duties in a class of townships having a larger population will be greater in amount than those of a class of townships having a smaller population. This is the only conceivable natural reason justifying such a classification, and it requires the fixing of the compensation upon a scale proportioned to the population of the different classes of townships. If the compensation be not so fixed, it is not "in proportion to duties," if the population is to be the measure of the duties, and it is only upon the theory that the population is such measure that such classification of townships is permissible.

Where it is apparent from the face of the act that the compensation in the different classes of townships of the class of counties, based solely upon differences in population, has not been fixed upon a scale proportioned to their respective populations, it seems very clear to me that the act of the Legislature is in violation of the constitutional provision requiring the compensation to be in proportion to duties. Under the decision in Tucker v. Barnum, 144 Cal. 266, 77 Pac. 919, the provisions as to limitations upon the respective amount of fees to be allowed justices of the peace in criminal cases in townships of the second, third, and fourth classes of Kern county are void. This being so, the provision as to the compensation by salary of justices of townships of the first class of townships of said county must also fall, for that salary was necessarily fixed with reference to the compensation prescribed for the other classes. It could only be upon the theory that the amounts prescribed for the other classes were to be received by the officers thereof that the salary of $125 per month for justices of the first class was fixed upon as a proper proportionate compensation for them. The respective provisions are so interwoven and interdependent that one cannot stand without the others.

As the Constitution expressly warrants the classification of counties by population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of all township and county officers in proportion to duties, what is here said in no way affects the question as to the right of the Legislature to fix the compensation of the county and township officers of the various classes of counties, otherwise than in proportion to the population of the various classes. The classification being a proper one, because expressly authorized by the Constitution, it has been held that the Legislature may take into consideration other matters besides population in determining what is a compensation in proportion to duties (see Longan v. County of Solano, 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. 463), and its conclusions on the question are conclusive on the courts.

SHAW, J. I dissent. In Tucker v. Barnum, 144 Cal. 266, 77 Pac. 919, the court decided that the constitutional requirement to fix the compensation of township officers in proportion to duties was violated in every case where it was so fixed in different classes of townships that in any particular month it might happen that the officers of the class of townships, or of a single township of the class, under consideration, would be paid at a rate in greater or less proportion to duties performed than the officers of some other class or township whose pay was fixed by a different act, or a different section or clause of the same act, and, in effect, that such a law would be void, although as matter of fact the compensation so received for such month in the class or township involved was in proper and just proportion to duties. The same rule is followed here with a wider application. The flat rate of $125 a month in the class of townships here considered is declared invalid, because it is not the same as that given in other townships of different population, although in those other townships the rate is fixed upon an entirely different plan or basis, having no relation to, and furnishing no means of comparison with, the rate in question in the class involved. And this is again done without deciding or inquiring whether the rate in either of the classes referred to is or is not in just proportion to duties.

Although it is put on an entirely different ground, the facts show that the decision really is that the rate in different classes of townships is contrary to the constitutional mandate in question, unless the different rates are graduated to a scale so as to make them proportional to population, rather than in proportion to duties—a proposition expressly repudiated in the leading case on the subject, namely, Longan v. Solano Co., 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. 463, which has been considered the rule of legislative action for the last 20 years. If this is not the correct rule in respect to counties, I can perceive no just ground for holding it a correct rule for townships; both being subject to the same constitutional injunction. Unless that case is to be overruled, with the result that until the Legislature makes further provision the compensation of officers will be regulated entirely by the fee bill of 1895, I do not think the decision of this court in this case can be logically sustained. It may be added that in Green v. Fresno Co., 95 Cal. 329, 30 Pac. 544, it was decided that the question whether or not the compensation of county and township officers was in due proportion to duties was for the Legislature, and not for the courts, and that the legislative judgment on the subject is conclusive. The same proposition was, in effect, held in Longan v. Solano Co., supra, but it was not expressly stated. The argument in that case covered the entire county government act, which presented as great a lack of uniformity of compensation, as compared either to population of the respective counties or to the duties required, as could well be conceived, and yet it was held not to be a violation of the constitutional command to fix the compensation in proportion to duties.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 11, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Conflicting Evidence—Review.

Where, in an action for injuries caused by a defective sidewalk, the evidence was conflicting, a verdict for plaintiff thereon was final.

2. Municipal Corporations — Board of Public Works—Repair of Sidewalks—Jurisdiction.

San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 16, declares that where any portion of the roadway of any street or alley or any portion of any sidewalk shall be out of repair, the board of public works shall require the owners or occupants of adjoining property to repair said portion. Held to confer on such board jurisdiction to repair defective sidewalks, or to award a contract for the repairing thereof.

3. Same—Defective Notice to Owners.

Where a defective sidewalk came under the observation of the agent of the board of public works of the city whose duty it was to know, report, and act on the condition of streets and sidewalks, the board could not escape its liability to see that the walk was repaired by serving an insufficient notice on the adjoining property owners to make such repairs.

4. Same—Repair—Reconstruction.

Where a wooden sidewalk, located between two strips of cement sidewalk, had become defective, a notice to repair the same by constructing a cement sidewalk was proper, within San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 16, declaring that the board of public works shall specify in such notice what material shall be used in repairs.

5. SAME—BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS—FINANCIAL ABILITY.

The board of public works of San Francisco having authority to obtain an appropriation for the repair of sidewalks, to compel the abutting property owners to make needed repairs, to procure the work to be done themselves, and to acquire a lien on adjoining property for the amount expended, as provided by San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, §§ 16, 17, and being authorized by section 18 to procure the arrest of the owners in default, and to apply fines collected to such repair, it was no answer to the board's liability for injuries on a defective sidewalk that it did not appear that the board had funds with which to make needed repairs.

6. SAME—SPECIAL DEFECT—NOTICE.

Where a sidewalk was generally defective, it was not necessary, in order to render the city authorities liable for injuries sustained thereon, that they should have acquired notice of the particular defect which occasioned the injury.

7. DISMISSAL—CODEFENDANTS.

Where, in an action for injuries on a defective sidewalk, the board of public works and their sureties were joined with abutting owners, the board was not entitled to object to the dismissal of such owners from the case; the defendants being jointly and severally liable.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Rehearing denied October 11, 1905.

Myrick & Deering, Campbell, Metson & Campbell, M. J. Waldheimer, and John B. Gartland (N. J. Manson, of counsel), for appellants. Carl M. Mueller (Alfred Fuhrman and John Heenan, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action is against defendants, constituting the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, and the sureties upon their official bonds, for damages caused by a personal injury suffered by plaintiff in stumbling and falling over a sidewalk in the city which was out of repair and in a dangerous condition. The action is predicated upon the duty of the board of public works to maintain the sidewalks of the city in a reasonably safe condition and upon their negligent failure so to do in this instance. The liability of the defendants in a proper case is not questioned, but various grounds are urged against their liability in this case, which went to trial before a jury and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5,000.

It is argued that the sidewalk was not in such a condition of dilapidation as to make it unsafe or dangerous, it is argued that the evidence shows that the defendants were not negligent in the matter of this particular sidewalk, and it is argued that the evidence shows clearly that the plaintiff herself was guilty of contributory negligence. It appears that the sidewalk was a wooden sidewalk in the middle of a block, the sidewalks on either side of which were of cement. Plaintiff was reasonably familiar with the condition of the sidewalk before the time of the accident, and testified to its condition of general dilapidation and lack of repair. In this she was supported by other testimony. Photographs were likewise exhibited to the jury showing the condition of the sidewalk immediately after the accident. She walked over the sidewalk upon a dark night, stepped into a hole from which a plank had been removed, caught her foot in a projecting plank, was thrown, and suffered injuries. All these questions, whether the sidewalk was or was not in a reasonably safe condition, whether the plaintiff was or was not exercising due care in walking over it at night, were questions, under the conflicting evidence, addressed to the jury, and its verdict here is final.

It is contended that the board of public works was without jurisdiction either to repair the sidewalk in question or to award a contract for the repairing of it, in pursuance of the provisions of section 16, c. 2, art. 6, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, and that consequently the board must be held blameless in point of fact and without liability in point of law. So much of section 16 as is here involved reads as follows: "When any portion of the roadway of any street, avenue, lane, alley, court or place or any portion of any sidewalk * * * shall be so out of repair * * * the board of public works shall require the owners or occupants of lots or portions of lots fronting on said portion of said street, avenue, alley, lane, court or place by a notice in writing * * * to repair forthwith said portion of said street, avenue, lane, alley, court or place," etc. The point made by appellants is that "sidewalk," used in the first portion of the section above quoted, is not specifically repeated in the latter part, and that the jurisdiction of the board therefore extends only to the roadway proper, as distinguished from the sidewalk. But when the section declares that the board of public works shall require the owners or occupants of lots or portions of lots fronting on said portion of said street, avenue, etc., to repair forthwith said portion of said street, it is plain that "street" is here used with full and broad significance to include the sidewalks which are always a part of it.

It is undisputed by the evidence that an agent of the board of public works, a street inspector, whose duty, amongst others, it was to note, report, and act on the condition of streets and sidewalks, gave two different notices to the owners of the property touching the condition of the sidewalk. These notices directed them as owners of the property to repair the plank sidewalk in front thereof by constructing an artificial stone or bituminous rock sidewalk, and notified them that unless such repairs were commenced within five days after service of the notice, and diligently and without interruption prosecuted to completion, the board of public works, under and by virtue of the authority vested in it by the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, would enter into a contract with some suitable person to execute the prescribed work at the owner's expense. It is argued by appellants that these notices were not such notices as the charter contemplated, and that they were not delivered personally to the owner, but were sent to him by mail; and it is further contended that the notices called for repair of a wooden sidewalk by the construction of a bituminous rock or cement sidewalk, and that such construction is no part of repairing. But to this it must first be answered that the sidewalk in question, having come under the observation of the agent of the board of public works, if in fact, as the jury decided, the sidewalk was in need either of reconstruction or repair, the board of public works could not escape liability for its negligent performance or nonperformance of duty by proof of a negligent failure to perform another duty; that is to say, by proof that the notices which it actually sent were improper and insufficient. If this were so, then by the mere sending out of defective notices the board of public works could forever escape legal liability by failing to acquire jurisdiction. "The law does not permit itself to be thus trifled with, nor allow its ministers to thus substitute pretense for performance." Nicolson Pavement Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 700. And while it is true that, in general, repair has reference to the reconstruction and restoration of an imperfect existing thing, it is none the less true that in contracts and in statutes it frequently has a broader significance. The charter of San Francisco, in dealing with the question, declares in section 16 of chapter 2 of article 6, that the board "shall particularly specify in said notice * * * what materials shall be used in said repairs." And in note 2 to Encyclopædia of Law (2d Ed.) vol. 24, p. 472, under the head of "Repairs," will be found numerous cases in which the word has been held to apply to a new construction of different material. The notice in terms called for repair as well as for construction, and "to permit such walk to remain and attempt to repair it by nailing a rotten or even a sound board back to a rotten stringer is as negligent as to construct a walk of unsound materials in the first place." City of Shelbyville v. Brant, 61 Ill. App. 154.

It is urged that it does not appear that the board of public works had any money with which to make the needed repair, and is, therefore, relieved of responsibility. It does not appear that they sought an appropriation for the purpose; but, moreover, they had power to compel the abutting property owners to make the needed repair, to do the work themselves, or to enter into a contract with a suitable person to have it done, which person would have a lien for the amount expended. Charter of San Francisco, c. 2, art. 6, §§ 16, 17. They still further had power to procure the arrest of the owners in default, and the fines so collected form a special fund for repairing sidewalks. Charter of San Francisco, c. 2, art. 6, § 18. As said in City of New Albany v. McCulloch, 127 Ind. 500, 26 N. E. 1074: "An examination of the statute above referred to will disclose the fact that cities in this state are clothed with power to improve and keep in repair their streets and alleys without expense to the city, and where such power exists we do not think it is a defense, when sued for injuries occurring by reason of its neglect to keep the streets in repair, to say it had no funds with which to pay for such repairs." See, also, City of Belton v. Turner (Tex. Civ. App.) 27 S. W. 831; Village of Shelby v. Clagett, 46 Ohio St. 549, 22 N. E. 407, 5 L. R. A. 606; Erie v. Schwingle, 22 Pa. 384, 60 Am. Dec. 87; Evanston v. Gunn, 99 U. S. 660, 25 L. Ed. 306.

It was not necessary, as argued by appellant, that the board should have knowledge of the precise defect in the sidewalk which occasioned the injury. "In such case the city would be justly chargeable with notice of the general unsafe condition of the walk, though nobody may have known the special condition of the particular board which did the mischief." City of Shelbyville v. Brant, 61 Ill. App. 154; Shaw v Sun Prairie, 74 Wis. 108, 42 N. W. 271; Furnell v. City of St. Paul, 20 Minn. 117 (Gil. 101); City of McLeansboro v. Trammel, 109 Ill. App. 524; Moore v. City of Minneapolis, 19 Minn. 300 (Gil. 258).

With the board of public works and their sureties were sued the owners of the property. Appellants contend that under chapter 2, art. 6, § 16, and article 1, § 5, of the charter of San Francisco, the liability of the owners with the board of public works was joint and several, and that the court erred in dismissing the defendant owners of the property from the case. But the rule is fundamental that, if several are guilty in common of tort, the injured person has his right of action for damages against all or each, and may sue them either individually or collectively. Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 127 Cal. 438, 59 Pac. 826, 47 L. R. A. 467, 78 Am. St. Rep. 75. Moreover, the appellants in this case affirmatively sought by their demurrer this very dismissal, urging that there was a misjoinder of defendants, in that they themselves were joined in the action with the defendant owners of the property. We perceive no errors in the rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence, nor in the instructions which it gave and refused to give. Those refused were either properly refused as containing a mistaken proposition of law, or were substantially covered by those actually given.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; SHAW, J.

KRAMER v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.

(L. A. 1,379.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 7, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE DRAINS—DAMAGES—ACTIONS—FINDINGS — EVIDENCE.

In an action against a city for damages caused to a private property owner by the bursting of a storm sewer, evidence held to sustain findings that the city constructed the portion of the sewer lying across plaintiff's property and connected it with a storm drain in such a manner that it was incapable of sustaining the pressure of water which was intended to and did pass through it, and that the city was negligent in allowing the outlet to become clogged with débris, so as to increase the pressure.

2. SAME—CONSTRUCTON OF SEWER—PRIVATE PROPERTY—POWER OF MUNICIPALITY.

A municipal corporation, having power to construct a public storm drain under its general power to construct and maintain streets, and being authorized, also, to construct the same either in the streets or in private property condemned for such purpose, was authorized to agree with private property owners to construct the same along a right of way donated by them in a ravine in the city at the joint expense of such property owners and the city.

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action by a property owner for damages sustained by the bursting of a storm sewer, he contended that the outlet of the sewer was obstructed by débris, evidence showing the condition of the outlet immediately after a storm had subsided was admissible; it being impossible to observe the outlet while the storm prevailed.

4. SAME—NOTICE.

Where the largest part of the damage sustained by a property owner by a break in a storm sewer occurred during a second storm, and after such owner had notified the city street departments, the city engineer, and the mayor and common council in open session of the break in the sewer on his premises, the city was not entitled to notice of an obstruction at the outlet of the sewer as a condition of its liability for damages resulting therefrom; the city being bound to anticipate the probability of such occurrences and to guard against them by inspection.

5. SAME—DAMAGES.

Where plaintiff maintained a building which he used as a residence, dancing school, and to rent for parties and entertainments, and he suffered a loss of engagements already made for dancing classes and receipts from rentals of the dancing hall by reason of the flooding of the building by a break in defendant's storm sewer, a recovery for the loss of such receipts was not objectionable as an attempt to recover lost profits.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Henry J. Kramer against the city of Los Angeles. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied October 7, 1905.

W. B. Mathews and Herbert J. Goudge, for appellant. Bicknell, Gibson & Trask and Dunn & Crutcher, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought by plaintiff to recover damages from the city of Los Angeles for injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through the negligence of the city relative to a drainage conduit constructed through his premises. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, the city appeals.

The material facts, as found by the lower court, substantially stated, are: That prior to the year 1883 there existed in the city of Los Angeles a small ravine or arroyo, known as the "Arroyo de los Reyes," which began in the hilly section of the northwestern portion of said city at a point north of the intersection of Second and Fremont streets, and ran thence in a southerly direction through, along, and across the public streets of said city, and through and across private property, to a point south of the intersection of Eighteenth and Figueroa streets; that said arroyo, by means of its branches, tributaries, and the contour of the ground in said hill section of the city, received, collected, and carried off a large portion of the storm water naturally falling in said hill section, and delivered the same to and upon the public streets and private property of said city; that in 1883 or 1885 the city, for the purpose of confining said surface waters falling and accumulating in said hill section and flowing in said arroyo, constructed in said arroyo, at the places where it crossed the public streets, a 32-inch cement pipe or main, and also constructed in said arroyo, from a point in said hill section near the corner of Second and Fremont streets to a point southerly and in the east line of Flower street near Fifth street, a 41-inch brick conduit; that thereafter a cement pipe of 30 inches in internal diameter was laid in said arroyo from the southerly end of said brick conduit to Ninth street, a short distance north of the property of plaintiff; that there was also constructed in said arroyo, from a point just south of plaintiff's property southerly to a point in Figueroa street near its intersection with Eighteenth street, another cement pipe 30 inches in internal diameter, and terminating in a well constructed by said city in Figueroa street, which well was by said city also connected by means of a 22-inch pipe with another small well constructed by the city in Figueroa street about 50 feet from the first one, and over these wells the city placed iron gratings flush with the surface of said street, said two gratings constituting the only outlets of said cement pipe; that portions of said cement pipe were constructed in said arroyo by and at the expense of the owners of the lots through which the same was laid, portions by the city at its own expense, and other portions at the joint expense of the city and the owners of the lots through which the same was laid; that in March, 1897, plaintiff and the owners of the lots next adjoining plaintiff petitioned the city council to pipe that portion of said arroyo which ran across their respective lots, offering to pay one-half of the cost thereof, and in November, 1897, said city, for the purpose of completing said storm drain, which had already been constructed from a point in the hill section of said city within a short distance north of plaintiff's property, and from the south of plaintiff's property down to the southerly terminus of said drain in the wells in Figueroa street, and for the purpose of carrying said storm water therein, constructed across the property of plaintiff and the lots of the adjoining owners a cement pipe of 30 inches internal diameter, and so connected the same with the other portions of said storm drain already completed that the same then constituted a closed conduit or storm drain from a point in the hill section of said city to its southerly terminus or outlet in said wells in Figueroa street, near Eighteenth street; that half the cost of construction through the property of plaintiff and through the adjoining lots was paid by the owners of said lots into the city treasury of said city; that subsequent to the completion of said storm drain, and prior to November 17, 1900, plaintiff constructed upon his property a frame dwelling, described in the pleadings and known as "Kramer's School for Dancing," which on said last-mentioned date was being used, and had theretofore been used, by plaintiff as a residence and hall for conducting a dancing school, and also for renting purposes for parties and entertainments; that subsequent to the construction through the property of plaintiff of said cement pipe, and prior to said 17th of November, 1900, the city, for the purpose of more effectually collecting and confining the storm waters which fell and accumulated in said hill section of the city and ran through and over the public streets thereof, built and laid under the said public streets two other cement pipes or storm drains 30 inches in internal diameter, and connected the same with the first-mentioned storm drain at or near the intersection of Second and Fremont streets, one of which laterals or tributaries extended in a northeasterly direction in said hill section, and the other in a northwesterly direction in said hill section; that said city at all times after the construction of said cement pipes or storm drains has maintained the same under its supervision; that the portion of said pipe so constructed under the building of plaintiff was negligently constructed, and of improper, insufficient, and defective material, and was inadequate to withstand the pressure of the water which was intended to and did pass through the same; that just prior to November 17th defendant city negligently permitted said pipe and the outlet thereof to become partially clogged and stopped up with débris, and that by reason of the negligence of said defendant in the construction of said pipe and the defective character of the material used by said defendant in its construction, and by reason of its negligence in the maintenance of said pipe, the same on the 17th of November, 1900, broke at certain points underneath plaintiff's building, in consequence of which large volumes of muddy and oily water were discharged into the basement of said building; that immediately and on November 17, 1900, plaintiff notified the street department, the city engineer, and mayor of said city of the breaking of said pipe and the condition of plaintiff's premises; that on November 21, 1900, he appeared before the city council of said city, convened in regular session, and informed said council of the breaking of said pipe and the condition thereof and the condition of his premises; that defendant wholly failed to take any steps or make any effort to repair said pipe or place the same in safe condition, and thereafter, on said 21st of November, 1900, in consequence of the broken condition of said pipe, the basement of plaintiff's building was again submerged with muddy and oily water. And the court found that plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $2,613.86, injuries sustained by the sinking of the foundations of his building, injuries to his furniture contained therein, and loss resulting to his business.

Upon this appeal appellant attacks practically all of the findings made by the court upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify them. We do not deem it necessary to consider this attack, except as to a few of the main findings. As to the others, it is sufficient to say that we have given them careful attention, and, while it must be conceded that some of them could have been better and more satisfactorily supported by evidence which from the nature of the case was accessible, yet we cannot say that a reasonable consideration of such evidence as was addressed to them warrants the claim of appellant that it was insufficient to sustain them.

Referring now to the principal findings attacked, it is insisted that the evdence was insufficient to justify the finding that the city constructed the portion of the pipe lying across the property of plaintiff and connecting it with the storm drain already constructed. Aside from such facts as are contained in the recited findings, the evidence shows that the pipe which was constructed across the premises of plaintiff was designed as, and was a portion of, a conduit system practically constructed by the city at its own expense, or conjointly with the owners of property through which the conduit ran, for the purpose of draining, as far as its capacity would do so, a portion of the hill section of the city, and relieving that portion of the city south of said hill section from the burden of the storm waters. This system, save the laterals in the hill sections, had been completed, including the outlet on Figueroa and Eighteenth streets, along the arroyo north and south of the property of plaintiff and that of a few others adjoining him at the time they applied to the city to complete the portion through their property. When this application was filed with the city council, in which plaintiff and his co-petitioners offered to pay one-half of the expense of construction, the city having refused to bear more than one-half, that body took the matter entirely in charge and ordered a contract for the construction of the cement pipe across the property of plaintiff and his co-petitioners to be made between the city and W. A. Frinck. This contract was approved by the city attorney and signed by the mayor, and the contractor, Frinck, constructed the pipe in question, which being completed, the city paid the contract price; the plaintiff and his neighbors paying into the treasury one-half thereof. Plaintiff was not consulted as to the size, materials, or laying of said pipe, or anything relating to it. The city controlled the entire matter. It thus appears from the evidence that the city assumed the power to, and in fact did, contract for the construction of the conduit in question.

But it is contended by appellant, and its objection to the sufficiency of the finding is grounded mainly on that proposition, that while the city entered in fact into the contract for the construction of this portion of the conduit, and did construct it, yet its act in that regard was ultra vires and void; that the construction of this conduit was an improvement in private property; and that the city had no power or authority to build a pipe line or storm drain for the benefit of the owners of private property. We cannot agree with this position of appellant. It is true, as suggested by appellant, that a municipal corporation has no power to construct upon private property a pipe or conduit for the sole purpose of relieving the property owner of the inconvenience or danger caused by the existence thereon of a natural water course or drain. But this was not the purpose of the construction of the conduit over plaintiff's premises. It was for the purpose of completing a drainage system mainly constructed by the city and used by it to concentrate and control the storm waters flowing from the hill section of the city as far as the system was capable of doing so, and that the municipality had power to provide a complete system for that purpose we do not think open to question. The power of the municipality to construct sewers and drains is derived from its authority to construct and maintain streets. It is not necessary that express power should be conferred by the charter for the former purpose. Without any special grant, such power is regarded as incident to the general and express power to construct and maintain streets. Dillon on Municipal Corporations, §§ 805, 807; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) vol. 10, p. 237. The city, when it commenced the improvement of the hill portion of the city—to construct and lay out streets therein—was confronted with the necessity of taking care of the storm waters which fell in that section of the city, and, as no limitation and restriction was imposed upon it under the charter, it had the right to make such provision for their disposition as in its judgment was best. It can hardly be questioned that for such purpose it might have constructed a sewer or drain in the public streets running in the same general direction as the course of the arroyo. And if in the exercise of its discretion there was an opportunity afforded it of constructing a sewer or drain over private property, we do not see how any valid objection could be presented against its doing so. The power existing, the exercise of it is left to the discretion of the municipality. If necessary, a right of way for such purpose might have been condemned by the city along the arroyo. And if the city saw fit, to avoid damaging its streets by tearing them up to construct a storm drain therein, or to avoid the expense of condemning a right of way through private property for that purpose, to accept from the property owners a natural and convenient way along the arroyo, and construct its storm drain therein, we do not see how this construction can be said to be ultra vires. To have constructed the drain in the public streets or under condemnation proceedings would have been for the public benefit and in the exercise of its municipal power. The character of the construction, as being a public benefit and within its municipal power, is not affected by the circumstance that the owners of land along the arroyo consented to give, and the city accepted, a right of way which it might have purchased or condemned. Nor was the construction of the portion of the storm drain across plaintiff's property any the less a public improvement because its construction at that time only involved the premises of plaintiff and those of his neighbors, and was of particular benefit to plaintiff. The construction of this portion constituted the completion of the system, and, as the municipality had the power to construct the whole storm drain, it necessarily had the power to construct every part of it. There is no doubt but that the construction of the conduit through plaintiff's premises was a benefit to him. But so was the construction of the entire system of benefit to each particular portion of property through which it was constructed, and in determining benefits the system in its entirety must be considered. The benefit to plaintiff was no greater, when the portion on his land was constructed, than it would have been if the entire drain had been constructed at one time; and, as its entire construction was a public improvement which the city was authorized to make, it is of no consequence that particular benefit resulted to plaintiff through its completion. It is not necessary, in order that the use may be regarded as public, that the whole of the community or any large portion of it may participate in it. If the drain be of public benefit, the fact that some individuals may be specially benefited above others affected by it will not deprive it of its public character. Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 83.

Many other considerations are urged by respondent why the construction of the entire system of storm drainage along this arroyo was a proper exercise of municipal power—the growth of population in the section of the city traversed by the arroyo, and the construction by the city of streets across that stream from the hill section to Eighteenth street; the placing of pipes under those streets at such intersections, and the filling in of the remainder of the bed of the stream; the liability of the existence of nuisances created by stagnant pools formed thereby in a thickly settled portion of the city, and which would be a menace to public health and safety; and the actual existence of such a condition in the open portion of the arroyo on plaintiff's property near the public highway, a condition claimed to have been occasioned through the construction of the conduit by the city above and below his property, and for which condition neither himself nor the adjoining proprietors were responsible, and the removal of which, by completing the conduit through his premises, was a municipal duty and public benefit. We do not discuss these suggestions, satisfied that under the power to construct and maintain streets the city, in making such improvements in the hill portion thereof, had a right to construct and adopt the system, of which the conduit through plaintiff's land constituted a portion, for the purpose of disposing of the storm waters existing at least in the hill section. A general power to construct and maintain streets is sufficient authority to authorize a municipality to construct a sewer to carry off storm waters. McGuire v. City of Rapid City, 6 Dak. 346, 43 N. W. 706, 5 L. R. A. 752.

There are only two other findings which require particular mention. The plaintiff based his claim for damages resulting from the breaking of the pipe constructed by the city through his premises upon two grounds: First, that the pipe was constructed in such manner and of such materials that it was incapable of withstanding the pressure of the water which was intended to and did pass through it; and, second, that the city was negligent in allowing the outlet of the conduit to be partially clogged and stopped up with débris, so as to impede the passage of the water, thereby increasing the pressure upon that portion of the pipe underneath his building. These findings are challenged by appellant as not sustained by the evidence. An examination of the record, however, satisfies us that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the findings upon both points.

The pipe laid upon plaintiff's premises was constructed of cement, and the evidence clearly shows that it burst from the internal pressure of the water upon it. As to the strength and sufficiency of such pipe to withstand water pressure (referring to the testimony of some of the witnesses), the expert Purcell, called for plaintiff, testified that "the cement pipe practically will not carry any pressure at all, and it is considered to be impracticable to put more than eight feet head on it." Another one of plaintiff's experts, Koebig, testified that, when a cement pipe is bedded and tamped, it could not be subjected to a pressure over ten feet; that "the breaking strength really is between eight and ten feet, the safety. That is the pressure which the pipe should be subjected to, and not more." Wolbrecht, one of the expert witnesses for defendant, characterized such pipe as "wholly unfit for water pressure." The pressure upon this pipe across plaintiff's premises was estimated by the expert witnesses for plaintiff to be approximately 75 feet; that the outlet at Figueroa and Eighteenth streets, being covered with iron grating, did not materially decrease this pressure, even when the outlet was not clogged with débris; that under the most favorable circumstances pressure would be exerted upon the pipe on plaintiff's premises which it was entirely inadequate to withstand. It was agreed by the same character of witnesses (expert) called by defendant that the pressure on said pipe would be 75 feet, if the outlet was stopped with débris, but that, as constructed, if the outlet was unobstructed, the pressure would be from 9 to 10 feet. These estimates were given on the assumption that the pipe was full of water, which the testimony showed was liable to happen in cases of ordinarily severe rainfalls in that vicinity, and which was the case when the pipe in question burst. This testimony bore upon the question of the sufficiency of the pipe as constructed to stand, when full, the ordinary pressure of the water intended to pass through it if the outlet was unobstructed.

As to the sufficiency of the evidence to show that the outlet on Figueroa and Eighteenth streets was clogged up at the time the the pipe across plaintiff's premises burst, it appears from the testimony that there were taken out of the well, at the outlet, the day after the storm during which the pipe in question broke, large quantities of branches and several big rocks, and that the bars which covered the 30-inch cement discharge pipe, where it entered into the well on the east side of Figueroa street, and the bars which covered the 22-inch pipe from that well to the outlet on the west side of Figueroa street, were so clogged up that, as the witness St. Martin said they were so "full of stuff, had to pull it out with a shovel; that is, had to get it away from the bars. In the condition it [the well] was in, a small amount of water could run through there. It necessarily lessened, of course, the capacity." We do not perceive from the record that there was any testimony, save that of this witness, as to an actual examination of the condition of the outlet after the storm during which the pipe in question broke, and his examination showed it much obstructed at that time. There was water run through this conduit during the entire year, which would naturally carry more or less débris, to find lodgment against the bars at the outlet and impede the flow of the water in the event of a storm. It is conceded by all the witnesses in the case that the clogging of this outlet would throw a pressure upon the pipe on plaintiff's premises which it was not constructed to withstand, and the fact that it broke when the first storm came would be some evidence of itself that the outlet was then clogged and impeded. There was evidence, too, that as to the grating which covered the well, and which was intended to be a relief to the flow of water there, the débris usually carried or flowing down the street in which the well was located—leaves, straw, filth, etc.—had a natural tendency to clog this grating up, and so create a solid obstacle against the relief to the flow of the water from the outlet which it was intended, in case of a storm, to afford. There is some evidence in the case which, while not showing positively that that was the condition of the grating at the time of the storm, yet strongly indicates that it was; and this evidence was of such character that the court might reasonably infer that this was the condition of the grating at that time.

As we have said, the only evidence of actual inspection of the outlet to ascertain its condition was made by the witness St. Martin. It is not pretended that any officer or employé of the city at any time made any inspection of the outlet to ascertain whether it was obstructed or not, either before or after the storm. It is urged by the appellant, against the testimony of the witness St. Martin and other testimony to the same point that it only tended to show the condition of the outlet after the storm. But evidence showing the condition of the outlet immediately after the storm subsided, it being in the nature of things impossible to observe it while the storm prevailed, was competent evidence from which a reasonable inference could be deduced that the condition as disclosed then existed at and prior to the time of the storm. Dist. of Columbia v. Gray, 6 App. D. C. 319. While there is some additional evidence in the record on this point, we think we have called attention to sufficient of it to meet appellant's objection.

Taking, then, the evidence in the case, which we have referred to in a general way, addressed to the findings of fact which the appellant attacks, we think it entirely sufficient to support both of them. It is not pretended but that the breaking of the pipe was occasioned through the internal pressure of the water. All the witnesses in the case agreed to this. Independent of any question whether there was an obstruction of the outlet at the time the pipe broke, the court was warranted, from the evidence adduced by plaintiff's witnesses, in finding that the pipe as constructed by the city was inadequate to withstand, when full, the mere pressure of the water which it was intended to carry. This finds ample support in the testimony of the experts for plaintiff, and the fact that the pipe broke under pressure of the water flowing freely (if appellant's claim that the outlet was unobstructed were true) would confirm the testimony of these witnesses that it was inadequately constructed to withstand that mere pressure. And that the court was warranted in finding that the outlet was in an obstructed condition is sufficiently clear from the evidence upon that point to which we have referred. These constitute the only findings which we think require discussion. The others which are challenged are, in our opinion, as we have said, sufficiently sustained by the evidence, and particular reference to them we think unnecessary.

There is but one other additional point in the case made by appellant, aside from the matter of damages, which requires mention. The appellant does not question the rule that a municipality, when the construction of sewers or drains is within its power, is liable for injuries such as are claimed to have been sustained by plaintiff, and which are the result of negligence in the construction of such work, or for failure to keep the same, when constructed, in proper repair or free from obstruction. It is, however, insisted that it is the rule that a city is not chargeable with negligence, if permitting such obstruction, until after notice of its existence, and that in the case at bar it does not appear that the appellant had any notice that the outlet on Figueroa and Eighteenth streets had become stopped up. This point of appellant, it is claimed by respondent, is of no moment as affecting the liability of the city in the present case, because, it is insisted by him, that this element of negligence in permitting the outlet to become stopped up may be eliminated, as the evidence still shows, from the testimony of appellant's own witnesses, that appellant was negligent in constructing the conduit across plaintiff's premises of material unfit to bear the ordinary pressure of the water flowing through it without any stoppage of the outlet.

Whatever merit there might be in this claim, the force of it is lost under the finding of the court that the injury to plaintiff was occasioned, not purely through the negligent construction of the conduit in question by appellant, but that this, combined with its negligence in permitting the outlet to be obstructed, occasioned the damage.

Upon the matter of notice, if the rule contended for by appellant applies, it appears, in our judgment, that the city did have notice sufficient to move it to an examination of the outlet to ascertain its condition and remove the obstructions. The flooding of plaintiff's premises by the breaking of the pipe occurred during the first storm mentioned in the findings; the second flooding some five days after the first. When the flooding from the first storm occurred, the plaintiff immediately notified the street department of the city, and the city engineer and mayor, of the broken condition of the pipe and the condition of his premises as a result thereof. He subsequently appeared before the city council in open session and notified the members thereof of the condition of things. Although thus notified, the officials of the city took no steps to actually repair the sewer or to investigate the condition at the outlet, and plaintiff's building was afterwards flooded by the second storm; the water remaining in it for about 18 hours. From the evidence in the case the court was warranted in finding that the greater damage plaintiff sustained was occasioned by the second storm, occurring after the city had ample notice and had failed to act on it. We reach this conclusion without passing upon the point made by respondent, and which appears to be sustained by ample authority, that the city was not entitled to notice obstructions at the outlet before it became liable for damages resulting therefrom; that it is the duty of a city to anticipate the probability of such occurrences and to guard against them by occasional examinations and cleansings. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) vol. 10, p. 246; District of Columbia v. Gray, 6 App. D. C. 314; Fort Wayne v. Coombs, 107 Ind. 75, 7 N. E. 743; Schumacher v. City of New York (N. Y.) 59 N. E. 773. The general rule on this subject is stated in District of Columbia v. Gray, supra, in which obstructions similar to those complained of in the case at bar were involved. "But in a case like the present there seems to be no ground for the application of the doctrine of notice in its ordinary sense. Ordinarily, and in the nature of things, only the officers and agents of the municipality could know of such an obstruction as that of which complaint is here made. There could be no passer-by who could give the information. The location of the obstruction was open only to the employés of the municipality, and it was their duty to inspect it from time to time and ascertain the fact that no obstruction existed. Only by such inspection was it possible, ordinarily, to ascertain the existence of such obstructions; and, if that work of inspection was neglected by the municipality, it has no right to require that it must have notice from some other source. Its neglect of duty cannot be made the basis of exemption from liability."

As to the amount of damages. Aside from injury to plaintiff's building from settling, the amount of damages allowed for which is not questioned, the court allowed plaintiff damages for injuries to furniture and utensils and for loss of the use of his building, the allowance of portions of which amounts appellant questions. Plaintiff was the only witness as to these damages, and we think his testimony justified the allowance. As to the damages to his furniture and utensils, his statement was one of fact, not of opinion, as insisted by appellant.

As to the damages to his business. Plaintiff was also the only witness on this point. Counsel assume that in his claim for such damages plaintiff was seeking to recover profits which he lost. We do not so understand his claim. It was for the loss of receipts for rental of the dancing hall and loss of engagements for dancing classes. These were engagements which he had actually made, and which, on account of injury to the dancing hall, had to be abandoned. The only expenses he had were the running expenses of the hall, which he had all the year round. As the matter of profits did not seem to be involved in this claim for damages, appellant's point that the evidence did not warrant its allowance is without merit.

Various other points are made upon this appeal, which we do not touch on. They relate mainly to claims that the court failed to find on several material issues or found outside the issues in the case. We do not think that any of them are well taken.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COWAN.

1. HOMICIDE—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—COMMENTS ON TESTIMONY.

In homicide an expert testified that it was not possible for deceased, owing to the character of the wounds, to have taken a step after being shot, as immediate paralysis must have necessarily ensued. Thereupon the court stated that it was evident that deceased was not paralyzed when he was running, nor when he was scuffling with his assailant. Held that, if the statement of the court was an improper comment on the evidence, it was one favorable to defendant, who fired the first shot, another one having been fired subsequently by himself or some one else; and he could not complain thereof.

2. WITNESSES — CREDIBILITY — AFFILIATION WITH PARTY.

The membership of a witness in the same labor union as the party for whom he is testifying may be shown to affect his credibility.

3. HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSPIRACY.

In homicide, where it was shown that defendant was a member of a mob formed to tar and feather deceased, and that the members of the mob were armed with deadly weapons, it was not error to charge that, if a conspiracy existed, and the conspirators were prepared to use deadly weapons to effectuate their design, defendant would be guilty of murder or manslaughter, although there was a reasonable doubt whether he actually fired the fatal shot, provided he did feloniously fire a shot at deceased, and about the same time or shortly afterwards another shot, which caused the death, was fired in furtherance of the conspiracy.

4. SAME — NEW TRIAL — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

After a conviction of homicide, a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, which is merely cumulative in character, is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2328-2330.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court October 6, 1905.

Defendant was charged alone, by an information, with the crime of murder. No charge was made of a conspiracy. While defendant's first witness was on the stand, the prosecuting attorney made the following statement: "The res gestæ is confined in this case to the fact of the killing—to the act of the defendant, and not to the act of some person else—and he is not responsible for that; and it is irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and it is hearsay so far as this defendant is concerned." At this state of the proceedings counsel for the defendant asked the following question of the court: "I would ask the court if it is not a defense here if we can show that some one else killed the negro besides the defendant in this case?" To which the court responded: "The objection is overruled, if that is the object of it." At the close of the case the court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that the defendant and some other person or persons entered into a conspiracy to go to the jail at Mojave at the time and place alleged in the information for the purpose of unlawfully tarring and feathering the deceased, and that said defendant and others, in pursuance of said act, also agreed and conspired together at the Bunck House, on the way to the jail, after they had arrived at the jail, or at any other time and place, that they or either of them would shoot and kill the deceased, if necessary in order to carry out the unlawful design of tarring and feathering the deceased, then I instruct you that under such circumstances, if you should find beyond all reasonable doubt that defendant feloniously and of his malice aforethought shot and killed the deceased, your verdict should be guilty; and should you have a reasonable doubt in your minds as whether the defendant fired the shot that killed the deceased, and still you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he fired a shot feloniously at the deceased, and about the same time, or shortly afterwards, another shot was feloniously and with malice aforethought fired at the deceased, which caused his death, and that said shot was fired feloniously in furtherance of the unlawful design and conspiracy so entered into by defendant and the other person or persons, then I instruct you that under such circumstances it would be your duty to find the defendant guilty, and then proceed to determine, from the evidence and instructions of the court, whether it is murder in the first degree, murder of the second degree, or manslaughter."

Matthew S. Platz, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, J. Defendant was by information accused of murder, and was convicted of manslaughter, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial he prosecutes this appeal.

The record discloses that defendant and a number of others conspired together to commit an unlawful act by taking forcibly from a jail the deceased, who was a prisoner therein, and applying to his person a coat of tar and feathers. After such conspiracy was formed, the defendant armed himself with a gun, and joined his co-conspirators at the jail, where the same was broken open, and the prisoner rushed therefrom into the crowd of conspirators on the outside. Shortly after he emerged from the building, and when the deceased was but a few feet therefrom, a shot was fired by the defendant at him, and almost immediately thereafter he was grappled by another one of the crowd, and while engaged in a scuffle with the party who had seized hold of him another shot was fired, and the deceased thereupon sank to the ground, or was thrown down by his assailant, his clothing torn from his body, and crude oil and feathers applied. The deceased was then carried back to the jail building, and the crowd separated. It is evident from the character of the injury inflicted by the fatal shot that the deceased was dying, if not already dead, when the oil and feathers were applied. The testimony is convincing that defendant actually fired the first shot, and there was ample testimony to justify the jury in determining that he fired the second shot as well. Strange as it may seem, it appears affirmatively from the record that none of the participants were punished, or any attempt made in that direction by the authorities, except this proceeding against defendant, in which case the jury satisfied its conscience by a verdict of manslaughter.

Notwithstanding the brutal character of the crime, and the undoubted guilt of the defendant, he, nevertheless, on this appeal insists that the judgment should be reversed upon purely technical grounds. Chief among these is that the court erred in expressing an opinion as to the weight of evidence in the presence and hearing of the jury. This statement was induced by reason of expert testimony to the effect that it was not possible for deceased, owing to the character of the wounds, to have taken a step after being shot; that paralysis must have necessarily ensued immediately. The statement of the court was, in effect, that it was evident that he was not paralyzed when he was running, nor when he was scuffling with his assailant. If there was any error or impropriety in such statement, it was in support of defendant's theory, who was seeking to establish that, while he did fire the first shot, someone else fired the second. The effect of this statement of the court could only have been favorable to defendant's theory, and he should not be heard to complain.

The next objection is that the action of the trial court in permitting the district attorney to interrogate a witness as to his membership in the same miners' union of which defendant was a member was error. This was perfectly competent. It is permissible upon cross-examination to show the fact of relationship, fraternal or otherwise, existing between the witness and the party in whose interest he is called, as tending to affect his credibility. For the purpose of fully weighing the evidence of any witness, the jury are entitled to know his bias or feelings in the case, if any there be. People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 626, 49 Pac. 833. It is elementary that the state of mind of a witness as to his friendship or hostility towards the parties is proper matter for investigation. People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 509, 28 Pac. 589.

It is insisted further that the court erred in certain of its charges to the jury. The crime charged was murder. There was evidence received and circumstances shown to exist warranting the conclusion that the conspirators were prepared to go to any extent to carry out their unlawful design, and had so agreed. That a mob formed to commit an outrage upon a defenseless prisoner is found to be armed with deadly weapons is a strong circumstance tending to show that their determination and understanding was that, if need be, deadly weapons would be used to effectuate their design. Under these circumstances it was entirely proper to charge the jury that, "if such a conspiracy existed, and to the extent last above stated, and the same was established beyond a reasonable doubt, that even should you still have a reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether defendant actually fired the shot that killed the deceased, and still you believe beyond a reasonable doubt he fired a shot feloniously at the deceased, and about the same time, or shortly afterwards, another shot was feloniously and with malice aforethought fired at the deceased, which caused his death, and that said shot was fired feloniously in furtherance of the unlawful design and conspiracy so entered into by defendant and the other person or persons, that under such circumstances it will be the duty of the jury to find the defendant guilty, and then to determine from the evidence and instructions of the court whether it is murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, or manslaughter. We perceive no error in this, or in any of the instructions given by the court. People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 456, 50 Pac. 675.

There was no error in refusing a new trial, the application for which was based upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, where it appears that such newly discovered evidence is cumulative only in its character.

Judgment and order affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 14, 1905.)

1. Principal and Agent—Existence of Relation—Liability of Agent.

A contract with plaintiff for an alteration of defendants' house was signed by defendants' daughters, who had no interest in the house, but lived there with defendants. Defendants had actual knowledge of the agreement between plaintiff and their daughters, knew that the work was being performed by plaintiff, and received the benefit thereof. Held, that defendants' daughters were only agents for defendants, and were not liable on the contract signed by them.

2. Contracts — Building Contracts — Acceptance of Work.

Plaintiff contracted to build an addition to defendants' house. The plastering of the addition was to be done by another contractor. Plaintiff claimed that his work was completed, and thereupon the plasterer went ahead with his contract, and did the plastering. But it was not shown that defendants occupied the addition. Held, that the doing of the plastering did not constitute an acceptance of plaintiff's work by defendants, such as to excuse plaintiff from actually completing the contract if it was not in fact completed when he quit work.

3. Mechanics' Liens — Trivial Imperfections—Unworkmanlike Construction.

The unworkmanlike failure of a contractor to place the front windows in the basement story of a small house directly underneath the front windows of the upper portion of the house did not constitute a trivial imperfection within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, declaring that a trivial imperfection shall not be deemed such a lack of completion of the work as to prevent the filing of a mechanic's lien, but was a substantial noncompliance with the contract, which precluded the enforcement of a lien by the contractor.

*Rehearing granted by Supreme Court January 15, 1906.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by C. Schindler against Thomas Green and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Modified.

J. D. Moynahan and C. A. Elliott, for appellants. R. Platnauer, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The contract was made by plaintiff with Annie and Maggie Green, daughters of the defendants, and who lived on the premises with the parents, defendants. The work consisted of doing the carpenter work in making alterations and adding two rooms to the house in which the defendants lived—one room as basement, 12x16, and one room above, 12x16, and a front porch 6x16 feet. The plastering was done under another contract, by another party, with which plaintiff had nothing to do. There were no regular plans and specifications, or specifications as to where the doors or windows should be placed, the contract providing there should be not to exceed six doors and not to exceed ten windows, and the new structure to be built uniformly with the old, to which it was to be an addition; to be plain, at the cost of $403.50 for all material and carpenter work. There were two windows put in the basement part in front, but they were not set directly under the two windows in the front of the upper story. The plaintiff claimed to have finished his contract and done all that he was required to do thereunder. The defendants and Mr. Devine (the brother of the defendant Margaret Green, and who drew the contract, and who seemed to be acting for defendants) demanded that the windows be changed so as to be directly under the windows above. This the plaintiff refused to do, and defendants thereupon refused to pay the balance of the contract, viz., $303.50, or for the extra work, until plaintiff should change the windows. After plaintiff had finished the job, as he claimed—at least after he had done all the work that he did do, and furnished all the material he did furnish—the man employed by defendants went on and did the plastering. The plastering was partially completed, if not fully so, when defendants employed another carpenter to change the windows, setting them exactly under the windows above, at a cost to defendants of $7.50. At the trial the plaintiff had judgment, and the appeal is by these defendants from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial. In the transcript there are 37 specifications of error in the court's rulings as to the admission of evidence. We have gone over all of these rulings carefully, and, finding no reversible error therein, deem it unnecessary to refer to them further.

The appellant demurred to the complaint on the ground, among others, that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. The demurrer was overruled, and no exception taken. It is now claimed that no lien could attach to the property until plaintiff should find it impossible to collect his judgment against Annie Green and Maggie Green, who signed the contract. They are not shown to have had any interest whatever in the property. The facts were shown to be as follows: Annie and Maggie Green were the daughters of the defendants, and lived with their parents on the said premises in said house. Devine, who drew the contract and who supervised and superintended the work, was a brother of the defendant Margaret Green, and the other defendant, Thomas Green, could sign his name only with a mark; and that both defendants had actual knowledge of the agreement between plaintiff and Annie and Maggie Green as regards the original contract and also as to the extra work, and they, and each of them, at the time the work was being performed, had actual notice that the work was being performed, and that the plaintiff was performing it. The defendants, and not Annie and Maggie Green, have been the recipients of whatever benefit came from the work of plaintiff, and Annie and Maggie, under all the circumstances named, appear as, and were, only agents for the defendants, and are not, therefore, liable.

It is claimed, also, by respondent that, inasmuch as the defendants caused the rooms he had built to be plastered, they thereby took possession and thereby accepted his work. There is neither allegation, issue, nor finding upon this point. The evidence shows that the defendants were residing in the old part of the house, and that the man who was employed to do the plastering went ahead with his work after the plaintiff had placed the windows as he left them, and after he had quit work thereon. The plaintiff alleged he completed his contract October 13, 1902, but the court found he completed it September 18, 1902. The claim of lien was filed October 15, 1902. We think the circumstances of this case do not warrant us in saying there was an occupation and acceptance on the part of the defendants so as to excuse the plaintiff from completing his contract. The doing of the plastering was not an occupation of the rooms so as to create an acceptance of plaintiff's work so as to start the statute in motion as to time to file lien. This is a dwelling house, and there is no evidence that the defendants have ever occupied these two rooms built by plaintiff as a habitation. Jones v. Kruse, 138 Cal. 616, 72 Pac. 146.

The greatest fault found with plaintiff's work seemed to be in the manner in which the windows were placed in the front of the building. There was no dispute as to the fact that the lower windows were not immediately under the ones above. There was no reason given by any of the witnesses tending to show why they should not or could not have been so placed. The evidence did show that to place the windows as the plaintiff did place them was unworkmanlike, and the court found (finding 10): "That the two windows placed by plaintiff in the front portion of the basement story of said house were not directly underneath the two front windows of the upper portion of said house, which upper portion consisted of the old house after the same had been raised, and that the placing of such windows in this manner was not workmanlike; and the court finds that the failure of plaintiff to place said windows in the basement in a direct line underneath the two windows of the upper portion of said house is a trivial imperfection." We do not think the evidence supports the finding "that the failure of plaintiff to place said windows in the basement in a direct line underneath the two windows of the upper portion of said house is a trivial imperfection." Under the provisions of the last clause of section 1187, Code Civ. Proc., a trivial imperfection in the work will not prevent a lien; but under the peculiar circumstances in this case, and where the court is compelled to find, as it did, that the work complained of was not done in a workmanlike manner, we do not think it can be said the defect is of a trivial nature to the owner. It is true the defect was small, but the building was a small one, and the addition made by plaintiff was a small structure. Whether or not the defect is a "trivial imperfection" in any case depends upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case. Willamette, etc., Co. v. College Co., 94 Cal. 238, 29 Pac. 629. The defendants were just as much entitled to have their little structure, their home, completed according to the contract, and in a workmanlike manner, as the man who builds a palatial residence is to have first-class work done thereon, and in principle we can see no difference. It was a serious matter with the defendants, and they begged the plaintiff to make the change, which cost but $7.50 to make; but he refused, and declared he could do better in a lawsuit. The plaintiff had not complied with his contract. The findings do not support the judgment so far as the same fixes a lien upon said premises.

The motion for a new trial should have been granted. But, inasmuch as the question of the extra work and the value thereof was fully litigated in these proceedings, and the amount found due therefor, and the defendants have caused the work to be completed, it would be useless to order a new trial now, it appearing that a modification of the judgment would secure justice between the parties.

It is therefore ordered that the lower court be directed to modify its said judgment by striking therefrom the decree for a lien on the premises and providing for sale thereunder and cost of lien and attorney's fee, and enter judgment for plaintiff against defendants for the sum of $326.85, being the balance found due on said contract and for extra work, after having deducted the $7.50 paid by defendants for completing the work.

CHATHAM v. MANSFIELD.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 13, 1905.)

1. Elections—Contest—Statement—Capacity to Sue—Satutes.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1111, providing that "any elector" may contest an election, a statement of contest, dated November 18, 1902, giving the date of the election and the date when the board of supervisors met to canvass the returns, and alleging that plaintiff was an elector "at all the times herein mentioned," and filed on the succeeding day, was not fatally defective for failure to allege that plaintiff was an elector at the time the statement was filed, since it would not be presumed that plaintiff was an elector on November 18th, and not on the 19th; the defect not affecting the substantial rights of the parties, within section 475 or section 1117, declaring that no statement of the grounds of contest will be rejected or dismissed for want of form, etc.

2. Same — Process — Substituted Service—Statutes—Constitutionality.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1119, providing that, if the person whose right to office is contested cannot be found, he may be served by leaving a copy at the house where he last resided, at least five days before the time specified in the notice, is not unconstitutional; the notice so served being sufficient to constitute due process of law.

3. Same—Ballots.

Pol. Code, § 1259, provides that each ballot, as soon as the names marked on it as voted are read and verified, must be strung by one of the election judges, and must not thereafter be examined by any person, but must, as soon as all ballots are counted, be carefully sealed in a strong envelope, each member of the election board writing his name across the seal; and sections 1264, 1265, provide that a member of the board must deliver such envelope, without its having been opened, to the county clerk, or nearest sworn express agent for delivery to the county clerk, who, on receipt of the envelope, must file it, and keep it unopened and unaltered for 12 months, unless in case of a contest. Held, that where envelopes containing ballots were received by the county clerk, broken open, so that they could have been examined, and for several days were kept by the clerk in a vault to which the public had access, the ballots were inadmissible as evidence in the contest.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Election contest between R. S. Chatham

Rehearing denied August 12, 1905.

C. W. Eastin, Edw. F. Fitzgerald, and G. W. McEnerney, for appellant. Geo. C. Ross, for respondent.

COOPER, J. The parties to this suit were rival candidates for the office of sheriff of San Mateo county at the election held in November, 1902. The returns from all the election precincts in the county being made, the board of supervisors canvassed them, and thereupon made an order that plaintiff had received 1,378 votes, and that defendant had received 1,441 votes, and that defendant was the duly elected sheriff. Plaintiff filed a written statement for the contest of said election, which came on for hearing at a special session of the court, commencing in December, 1902. The case was finally submitted in March, 1903, and in April following the court filed its findings, to the effect that plaintiff had received 1,219 legal votes, and the defendant had received 1,218 legal votes; and judgment was accordingly entered, declaring plaintiff the duly elected sheriff of the county. From this judgment the defendant has appealed on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The contest was brought and the proceedings had under title 2 (sections 1111 to 1127, inclusive) of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is declared in section 1111 that "any elector of a county, city, or of any political subdivision of either, may contest the right of any person declared elected to an office to be exercised therein" for certain causes enumerated in the section. Defendant contends that the statement filed is fatally defective in not alleging that at the time of filing it the plaintiff "is an elector." The statement is dated November 18, 1902, gives the date of the election and the date when the board of supervisors met to canvass the returns, and it alleges that plaintiff was an elector "at all the times herein mentioned." It shows that at the time it was dated the plaintiff was an elector. If it had stated that "he is an elector," it would have referred to the time when the statement was made and signed. It was not filed until the following day, November 19th; but we do not think the ends of justice require us to presume that plaintiff was an elector on the 18th, and not on the 19th, day of November. Particularly is this so, as section 1117, Code Civ. Proc. provides: "No statement of the grounds of contest will be rejected, nor the proceedings dismissed by any court for want of form, if the grounds of contest are alleged with such certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular proceeding or cause for which such election is contested." The above section refers to the grounds of contest, but we think the liberal rule therein stated should be held to apply to any other matter alleged in the statement. The defect (if the statement may be considered defective) did not affect the substantial rights of the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 475. This is in accord with the views of the court in Doty v. Jenkins, 142 Cal. 498, 77 Pac. 1104. There the lower court allowed the plaintiff to amend his statement by showing that he was an elector of "the fifth supervisorial district." It is true that in that case the 40 days had not elapsed at the time the amendment was made, but the principle is stated. The court said: "An amendment to a statement of contest is to be construed by the same rule as an amendment to a complaint. Unless, from the nature of the facts alleged or otherwise, the contrary appears, it is to be deemed a statement of the facts existing at the commencement of the action or proceeding. The amendment in question must be thus construed. It takes effect as if it had been originally incorporated in the statement."

The same rule is applied to the statement and pleadings in an election contest as would be applied to pleadings in other cases. McCreary on Elections, §§ 440, 431. In the latter section cited it is said: "It may be stated as a general rule in this country that statutes providing for contesting elections are to be liberally construed, to the end that the will of the people in the choice of public officers may not be defeated by any merely formal or technical objections. Immaterial defects in pleadings should be disregarded. Necessary and proper amendments should be allowed as promptly as possible." Here there was no special demurrer pointed to the defect now so strenuously urged. It does not appear to have been in any way called to the attention of the trial court. No objection to the jurisdiction of the court or to the evidence was made on the ground that the statement did not show plaintiff to be an elector. In McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 160, 64 Pac. 280, the court said: "Plaintiff, by bringing the defendant Boggs into court, and asking the court to find the amount due, and by allowing the court to pass upon the issue as though properly made, is estopped from now claiming that the matter was not the subject of a counterclaim. He will not be allowed to thus lull his adversary into repose until his claim is barred by the statute, and then raise a point which is lethal." In the case at bar, if plaintiff was an elector of the county at the time he filed his statement, he had the right to contest defendant's election. He was before the court upon a complaint which he evidently deemed sufficient. Defendant treated it as sufficient. It is now too late to ask this court to hold it to be mere waste paper.

Defendant was served with the citation by leaving a copy at his residence; the officer being unable to find him. Section 1119, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, if the person whose right to the office is contested cannot be found, he may be served "by leaving a copy thereof at the house where he last resided, at least five days before the time so specified." It is claimed that such provision for constructive service is unconstitutional, and that defendant could not be brought into court, except by personal service. If this were held to be the law, the defendant, by absenting himself where he could not be personally reached, might prevent a contest under the provisions of the Code. An election contest is intended to be a summary proceeding, and is one in which the people of the political subdivision in which the contest is pending are interested. The defendant is presumed to have known the law, and to have known that after the return day of the election, if he absented himself, a citation might be left at his residence. It was so left, and he must have received it. The Legislature have the right to provide for constructive service in such case. Due notice to the defendant is essential to the jurisdiction of all courts, but such notice may be either actual or constructive in certain cases, as prescribed by the law pertaining to the forum in which such notice is given. If the Legislature has prescribed a kind of notice by which it is reasonably probable that the party proceeded against will be apprised of what is going on against him, and an opportunity is given him to defend, and the notice is given as the law requires, this will be held sufficient and due process of law. Rockwell v. Nearing, 35 N. Y. 314; Kennard v. Louisiana ex rel. Morgan, 92 U. S. 482, 23 L. Ed. 478; Earle et al. v. McVeigh, 91 U. S. 507, 23 L. Ed. 398; Sturgis v. Fay, 16 Ind. 429, 79 Am. Dec. 440; McCreary on Elections, § 426.

A more serious question, and one which necessitates a reversal of the judgment, was the receiving in evidence of the ballots from Baden, Colma, and Menlo Park precincts, under defendant's objection. The judges of election in the various precincts are required by law, as soon as the polls are closed, to canvass the votes given at such election in such precinct. The canvass must be public, in the presence of the bystanders, and continued without adjournment until completed and the result declared. The judges are sworn officers, and the result declared by them is prima facie correct. In an election contest the ballots are the best evidence, and may be used to overcome and set aside the result as declared by the official canvass, when their integrity can be satisfactorily established. It is intended by the statute that the ballots shall be preserved inviolate and above suspicion, so that they may be used in a contest. Each ballot, as soon as the names marked on it as voted are read and verified, must be strung on a string by one of the judges, and must not thereafter be examined by any person, but must, as soon as all ballots are counted, be carefully sealed in a strong envelope; each member of the board writing his name across the seal. Pol. Code, § 1259. A member of the board must, without its having been opened, deliver such envelope to the county clerk, nearest postmaster, or sworn express agent for delivery to the county clerk, who shall indorse on such envelope the name of the party delivering it, and date of such delivery. On receipt of the envelope the clerk must file it, and keep it unopened and unaltered for 12 months, unless in case of a contest. Pol. Code, §§ 1264, 1265. It was testified at the trial by the deputy county clerk that the "Colma package was delivered broken open to me. * * * It was delivered by Wells, Fargo & Co." The county clerk testified that the packages from Colma, Baden, and Menlo Park precincts were all "broken open" when received; that the ends of the ballots and the tally sheets were there; "anybody could pull them out if they wanted to look at them; that is the way they came by Wells Fargo." Fox, a deputy clerk, testified that the packages or envelopes containing the ballots were filed, and then placed in the lower vault in the clerk's office, and kept there for several days; that the vault was open all the time. The witness was then asked: "Q. Now, Mr. Fox, during that time that those pouches were in the lower vault, are you prepared to say that they were not interfered with by any person during the whole time that they were there, until they were put in the upper vault? A. I would not say positively that they were not interfered with. They were deposited in the vault, and we were going back and forth, all of us, at different times. Q. Well, the vault is open for all other persons? A. Yes, sir; other people have access to the vault besides the clerk and his deputies." This witness further testified that it was thought there might be some question as to these packages, and they resealed them and put them all in the upper vault, where they were locked and secured.

The lower vault, where the ballots were kept for several days, was used in connection with the county recorder's office, was not kept locked all the time, and was open to the public. After the envelopes containing the ballots had thus lain on the floor of the lower vault several days, they were placed in the upper vault, where, not the clerk, but one of his deputies and a deputy recorder, had the combination. They were not then kept in the exclusive charge of the clerk or his deputy. While the packages lay in the lower vault, many people, including political opponents of defendant, were in and about the office, and knew the condition of the envelopes. On the recount there was one less ballot in Baden precinct than the official canvass showed, in Colma precinct the official canvass showed four more ballots than were produced in court, and in Menlo Park precinct there was one more ballot produced in court than the official canvass showed. In the count in court, defendant suffered a net loss of 36 votes from that shown by the official count in these three precincts. The difference of six ballots between the official count and the ballots counted in court during the trial is certainly a strong circumstance tending to impeach the integrity of the ballots. No election officer was called to prove either the identity of the ballots, or that the envelopes were ever sealed. It was not proven that the envelopes were sealed when delivered to Wells, Fargo & Co., nor who delivered them, or either of them. It was not attempted to be proven that Wells, Fargo & Co. delivered them in the same condition in which they received them. It is said in McCreary on Elections, §§ 471, 473: "Such ballots, in order to be received in evidence, must have remained in the custody of the proper officers of the law from the time of the original official count until they are produced before the proper court or officer; and if it appear that they have been handled by unauthorized persons, or that they have been left in an exposed or improper place, they cannot be offered to overcome the official count. * * * But the better opinion seems to be that, if the deviation from the statutory requirements relative to the manner of preserving the ballots has been such as necessarily to expose them to the public or unauthorized persons, the court should exclude them; but if the deviations have been slight, or of such a character as not necessarily to render doubtful the identity of the ballots, the question of their identity may well go to the jury to be determined upon all the evidence." It is said by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed., p. 941): "If, however, the ballots have not been kept as required by law, and surrounded by such securities as the law has prescribed with a view to their safe preservation as the best evidence of the election, it would seem that they should not be received in evidence at all." Our own court, in the case of Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 107, 41 Pac. 455 (29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68), said: "One who relies, therefore, upon overcoming the prima facie correctness of the official canvass by a resort to the ballots must first show that the ballots, as presented to the court, are intact and genuine. Where a mode of preservation is enjoined by the statute, proof must be made of a substantial compliance with the requirements of that mode." In Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 78, 23 Pac. 186, it was said by the Chief Justice, in speaking of a failure of the election board to comply with certain sections of the Political Code: "Officers of election are, like all other persons, presumed to know the law, and their deliberate omission to follow directions designed to prevent fraudulent voting certainly calls for explanation. It casts suspicion upon their integrity, and is sufficient, prima facie, to make out a case of fraud. No doubt such omission is susceptible of explanation, and we are very willing to believe that the officers of those precincts erred through ignorance of the law, and were not actually guilty of fraudulent intent. But, as the case is presented, we cannot indulge in that presumption. The officers were not called as witnesses, as they should have been, to prove that they acted as they did through ignorance, and not with a fraudulent purpose; and in the absence of any rebutting proof on this point we feel constrained to hold that contestant made out a case of malconduct on the part of the election boards."

We may well apply the reasoning of that case to the question here. Why was it not proven that these envelopes were sealed and not opened by any one until placed in charge of Wells, Fargo & Co.? Some one must have taken charge of the envelopes in the precincts, and delivered them to Wells, Fargo & Co. It seems that it would have been easy to prove such fact. It was not incumbent on defendant to prove that votes had been taken out of those envelopes and changed. Where such circumstances appear that it is apparent that opportunities existed for evil-minded persons to have examined the ballots and changed them, their integrity is impeached. It is at once apparent that the official canvass is much more liable to be correct than a recount of ballots that have been in so many suspicious places. In the leading case of People v. Livingston, 79 N. Y. 279, the Chief Justice said: "They [the returns] may be impeached for fraud or mistake, but in attempting to remedy one evil we should be cautious not to open the door to another and far greater evil. After the election it is known just how many votes are required to change the result. The ballots themselves cannot be identified. They have no earmark. Everything depends upon keeping the ballot boxes secure. * * * Every consideration of public policy, as well as the ordinary rules of evidence, require that the party offering this evidence should establish the fact that the ballots are genuine. It is not sufficient that a mere possibility of security is proved, but the fact must be shown with reasonable certainty. If the boxes have been rigorously preserved, the ballots are the best and highest evidence; but, if not, they are not only the weakest, but the most dangerous, evidence. * * * Where ballots in an envelope sealed with the village seal are put by the village clerk in an unlocked desk, containing also the village seal, and situated in a room exposed to the public, and the envelope is partly torn by some unknown person while it remained in such desk, the ballots are not better evidence of the result of the election than the returns of the judges." See, further, People v. Burden, 45 Cal. 241; Coglan v. Beard, 65 Cal. 61, 2 Pac. 737; Ex parte Brown, 97 Cal. 89, 31 Pac. 840; Whipley v. McKune, 12 Cal. 352; Rhode v. Steinmetz, 25 Colo. 314, 55 Pac. 814; Hartman v. Young, 17 Or. 157, 20 Pac. 17, 2 L. R. A.

596, 11 Am. St. Rep. 787; Hughes v. Holman, 23 Or. 489, 32 Pac. 298; Beall v. Albert, 159 Ill. 127, 42 N. E. 166; Ex parte Arnold, 128 Mo. 260, 30 S. W. 768, 1036, 33 L. R. A. 386, 49 Am. St. Rep. 557.

Plaintiff relies upon an expression of Mr. Justice McFarland in Hannah v. Green, 143 Cal. 22, 76 Pac. 708, where it is said: "The question whether ballots have been sufficiently taken care of so as to preclude any reasonable suspicion that they are not in their original condition is a question which is largely within the judgment and discretion of the trial court, and its determination of that question should not be disturbed here, if the evidence fairly warrants the conclusion which the court reached on that subject." The learned justice was speaking with reference to the facts of that case, which were entirely different from the case at bar. In this case, if the evidence were such as to fairly warrant the conclusion reached by the trial judge, we would not interfere. While the decision of the trial court should not be disturbed, if there is sufficient evidence to fairly support it, yet we cannot give it more weight than the law, in its application to the facts, would allow. The discretion of the trial court gives it power to decide upon conflicting evidence, and to consider all the facts and the credibility of witnesses; but, upon a contest depending upon the integrity of ballots, the question is as to whether or not they have been so guarded as to be the best evidence and entitled to be recounted. In this case we do not think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court on the question.

The judgment is reversed.

In re MITCHELL.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 10, 1905.)

1. PENAL STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

The rule laid down by Pen. Code, § 4, that all the provisions of such Code are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice, applies to penal statutes not a part of the Code.

2. MALICIOUS MISCHIEF — EXPLOSIONS IN MINES.

The malicious depositing and exploding of dynamite in the levels, stopes, and chutes of a working mine is within Act March 12, 1887 (St. 1886–87, p. 112, c. 95) § 8, declaring guilty of a felony one who maliciously deposits or explodes at, in, under, or near any building, vessel, boat, railroad, tramroad, or cable road, or any train or car, or any depot, stable, carhouse, theater, schoolhouse, church, dwelling house, or other place where human beings usually inhabit, assemble, frequent, or pass and repose any explosive, with intent to injure or destroy such building or other structure, or to injure, intimidate, or terrify any human being.

3. CRIMINAL LAW—COMMITTING MAGISTRATES—BINDING OVER—EVIDENCE.

To authorize a committing magistrate to hold one for trial, the evidence produced need not be enough to warrant a conviction. It is enough that there is evidence making it appear that there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty of an offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 493.]

Application of W. Mitchell for writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

C. H. Fairall, for petitioner. J. P. Snyder, Dist. Atty., and Solinsky & Wehe, for respondent.

BUCKLES, J. The petitioner was held to answer on the following charge: "Did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and maliciously deposit and explode at, in, under, and near a place where human beings usually assemble, frequent, pass and repass, to wit, in the levels, stopes, and chutes of the Angels quartz mine owned by the Angels Quartz Mining Company, a corporation, certain dynamite, hercules powder, and explosives, with the intent to injure the said mine and the said structures therein, and to injure and intimidate and terrify human beings, and by means of which human beings were endangered." The charge is made under section 601, Pen. Code, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 687, c. 525), or it is brought under section 8 of the act of March 12, 1887 (St. 1886–87, p. 112, c. 95), which sections are identical one with the other, and read as follows: "Any person who maliciously deposits or explodes, or who attempts to explode, at, in, or under, or near any building, vessel, boat, railroad, tramroad, or cable road or any train or car, or any depot, stable, carhouse, theater, schoolhouse, church, dwelling house or other place where human beings usually inhabit, assemble, frequent, or pass and repass, any dynamite, nitro-glycerine, vigorite, giant or hercules powder, gunpowder or other chemical compound or explosive, with intent to injure or destroy such building, vessel, boat or other structure, or with the intent to injure, intimidate or terrify any human being, or by means of which any human being is injured or endangered, is guilty of a felony, and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year." It is claimed by petitioner that the charge must be brought under section 8 of the act of March 12, 1887, because that act had repealed section 601, Pen. Code, and, it having been repealed, could not be amended by the attempt made in 1905. This contention is doubtless correct if the repeal was effected as claimed. See section 330, Pol. Code. If the section was really repealed in 1887, it has not been re-enacted, and the prosecution is under section 8 of the act of 1887. Even though there was no repeal, and the amendment of 1905 is proper, the importance to petitioner, according to his standpoint, to have the prosecution under the act, rather than under the Code, is readily discernible. He contends that the common-law rule that "penal statutes must be construed strictly" is in force in this state as to all penal enactments which are not a part of the Penal Code, while a different rule prevails as to the provisions of the Penal Code, to wit: "All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms with a view to effect its object and to propromote justice." Section 4, Pen. Code. I know of no reason why a penal statute, not a part of the Code, should be construed by any other or different rule than that prescribed for construing the provisions of the Code. The rule laid down in section 4 of the Penal Code is a common-sense one, a rule which must be acknowledged as just and proper and which does not operate to improperly deprive any person of his liberty. At the time the Code was adopted, this rule was intended to apply to the entire body of criminal law in this state, and it was manifestly the intention that the old common-law rule of such strictness (applied sometimes without reason or sense) should be abrogated. It surely would not be within the light of reason or sense to say that two laws of the same nature, operating upon the same class of persons or things, within the same system of jurisprudence, should have two distinct rules for their construction and interpretation; and that, too, simply because the Legislature may see fit to make one enactment a part of the Penal Code and the other an act outside of the Code. There can be but one rule for the construing of penal enactments in this state, and that is the universal one laid down by section 4 of the Penal Code. I shall view this proceeding as having been brought under the provisions of section 8 of the act of 1887.

How is it possible, after a careful reading of the section referred to, to come to any other conclusion than that when the Legislature has pronounced against the malicious explosion of dynamite and other enumerated explosives (with intent to injure property and person) "at, in, under or near any building, vessel, boat, railroad, tramroad, or cable road, or any train or car, or any depot, stable, carhouse, theater, schoolhouse, church, dwelling house, or other place where human beings usually inhabit, assemble, frequent, or pass or repass," it was the clear intent to prohibit such use of dynamite and the other explosives at and in every and all places whatsoever? Such construction is warranted by the very terms of the section, and will admit of no other rational construction, and any other construction would not be according to the fair import of the terms used, and could not be with a view to effect the true object of the law, nor in the line of promoting justice. But the petitioner contends that the language "with the intent to injure or destroy such building, vessel, boat or other structure" must apply only to the things specifically enumerated, and that "other structure" includes nothing more than "railroad, tramroad, or cable road, or any train or car, or any depot, stable, carhouse, theater, schoolhouse, church or dwelling house." But this construction cannot be. For the purpose of illustration, suppose one maliciously explodes dynamite on or under a private footbridge constructed and built over a ravine, where "human beings pass and repass," with intent to destroy the bridge or injure or intimidate persons. Private footbridge not being enumerated in the list of places such as "building, vessel, boat," etc., can it be said that "other places where human beings pass and repass" would not include a private footbridge? The object of the statute is to prevent the injury to property and person and the intimidation of human beings by the malicious explosion of dynamite, etc., and to my mind there is no question but that "private footbridge" would be included in the term "other place where human beings pass and repass." Such footbridge would undoubtedly be a structure, and would come within the term "other structure" used in the statute. That a working mine, constructed as the Angels quartz mine is shown to be, with its shafts, chutes, tunnels, levels, stopes, excavated chambers, and stulls to hold up the rock and dirt overhead, is a structure in the common-sense view of the term, seems to me to admit of no doubt. It is a structure, and meets every requirement of the letter and spirit of the statute. To say that a man may do the things to wreck a mine that defendant is charged with doing and be able to escape responsibility therefor under the law reading as said section 8 reads, simply because it does not mention the word "mine," would be, to say the least, using a rule of construction not warranted even by the common-law rule which petitioner invokes. The act here sought to be punished surely comes within the reason and spirit as well as the mischief the law was intended to remedy, to wit, the malicious explosion of dynamite and other enumerated explosives with intent to injure property and human beings.

It is next claimed there is no evidence connecting the petitioner with the commission of the offense, except that of the witness Holmes, who is shown by his own admissions to be a co-conspirator and an accomplice. There is evidence in abundance to show a well-directed effort on the part of some one to wreck the mine, to prevent its being worked, or to make it more difficult to work, and to increase the expense of working, by blowing up the foot walls, blasting the timbers which held up the rock and dirt of the hanging wall, and thus allowing the rock and dirt to run in on the stopes and fill them, and cave them in, and make the levels of the mine very dangerous for men to work therein by reason of the supports, the stulls, being blown out from the roof of the chutes and levels, and that the wrecking began in the lower levels of the mine. The evidence also shows that the men then working in the mine were removed to other parts of the mine while the malicious blasting was being done, from which it would appear that those doing this work did not intend to injure the men then working in the mine. But the motive of the persons engaged in the wrecking seemed to be to make it disagreeable and dangerous for the men who should take the places of the wreckers, for they knew they were to be discharged, or work under a new boss. There was a large force of men at work in the mine. The petitioner was the boss, with power to move the men from place to place in the mine, and just before a certain place was wrecked the men were moved to some other place, with only the petitioner to direct them; and Holmes was the man in charge of the blasting powder, and subject only to the direction of petitioner as to its use. The circumstances under which the wrecking of the mine was accomplished are shown by other witnesses than Holmes to be such that it was next to impossible for the work of destruction to have been done by another without the knowledge—yes, and the direction—of the petitioner. The evidence of the witnesses N. Jakuliza, A. Prothero, J. W. Ling, Martinovich, Arnold Adams, and Thomas Fulton, taken together, tends in a strong degree to identify the petitioner as one of the guilty parties, and tends to connect him with the commission of the offense. The evidence produced upon the preliminary examination, independent of that given by the accomplice Holmes, would probably not be sufficient to show beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of petitioner; but, in order to hold the defendant and to put him on his trial, the committing magistrate is not required to find evidence sufficient to warrant a conviction. All that is required is that there be a sufficient legal evidence to make it appear that "a public offense has been committed and there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof." There was, then, sufficient evidence to warrant the justice in holding the petitioner and committing him for trial.

The petitioner is remanded.

DE LEONIS v. HAMMEL, Sheriff, et al.

1. QUIETING TITLE — RIGHT TO RELIEF — PLEADING.

While an action to quiet title cannot be maintained by the owner of an equitable estate against the holder of the legal title under a complaint containing only the usual averments commonly made in such an action, yet the remedies of quieting title, or cancellation, reconveyance, enforcement of trusts, or determination of priorities, may be granted under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, authorizing the award of any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, when the facts upon which the claim to such relief is based are alleged in the complaint, although plaintiff's title is but an equitable one.

2. MORTGAGES—DEEDS — FRAUD — PRIORITIES.

Where an ignorant person, without business experience, executes a deed to her agent and attorney in fact, relying on false representations made by him, and without receiving any consideration therefor, and in order that he may the better take care of her interests in the property, her title to the property is superior to that of mortgagees of the agent, who take with knowledge of the circumstances of the conveyance to him.

3. QUIETING TITLE—RIGHT TO RELIEF—CHARACTER OF DEFENDANT'S CLAIM.

In a suit to quiet title against a certain deed, plaintiff is entitled to have her rights determined, whether such deed was in fact procured by fraud and without consideration, or whether it was intended as a mortgage to the grantee named therein.

4. PARTIES—BRINGING IN ADDITIONAL PARTIES—POWERS OF COURT.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 389, when a complete determination of a controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court may order such parties to be brought in, and necessary supplemental pleadings to be filed.

5. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—FRAUDULENT ACQUISITION OF TITLE.

One who procures title to land by fraud, misrepresentation, and without consideration, acquires only a naked legal title, which he holds under a constructive trust in favor of his grantor.

6. MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEEDS—PRIORITIES.

The legal title does not pass under a deed intended merely as a mortgage to secure past and future advances, and subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers through the grantee with notice acquire no rights as against the grantor.

7. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — ACTIONS FOR FRAUD—APPLICABILITY OF STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, requiring actions for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake to be commenced within three years, is inapplicable to an action to quiet title against a deed, the grantee in which is charged with a constructive trust in favor of the grantor, or which is intended merely as a mortgage to secure past and future advances made by the grantee.

8. TRIAL—NONSUIT—MOTIONS — FAILURE TO SPECIFY GROUNDS.

The granting of a motion for nonsuit will be held erroneous, where the record fails to show that any specification of grounds for the motion was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Maria Esperitu Chijulla De Leonis against W. A. Hammel and others. From a judgment in favor of certain defendants, rendered after sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and from a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for appellant. H. H. Appel and H. Bell, for respondents.

TRASK, Special Judge. Two appeals have been taken in this case. The first appeal is from the judgment in favor of certain defendants, rendered because of plaintiff's failure to amend her complaint within the time allowed by law after their demurrer thereto was sustained. The second appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. By stipulation both appeals have been submitted upon the same transcript.

The substance of the lengthy complaint will be stated, so far as necessary for the purposes of this decision. From the complaint it appears that plaintiff is an ignorant Indian woman. On July 31, 1894, she deeded certain real property to one Laurent Etchepare. For several years prior to the date last mentioned he had been her agent and her attorney in fact in the management of her business and of her litigation as to her property. She made this deed because of her confidence in Etchepare, and because of her belief in his representations and those of an attorney whom Etchepare had induced her to consult. Among other representations made by Etchepare, it should be noted that he stated that she was indebted to him in the sum of $1,600 on account of moneys he had expended in her litigation and in the care of her property over and above what he had received from sales of cattle and from rents, and that it would be to her advantage to convey all her property to him, and "that he could thereby be better able to settle her estate" (evidently referring to the estate of her deceased husband and the litigation relating thereto). It was also represented to her that Etchepare had been advancing her moneys for her support and maintenance, and that it would be proper and advisable for her to convey her property to him, and that he would take care of it for her and defend her rights against adverse claimants. These and other representations, which are stated, are alleged to be untrue. From all the averments made in respect to the matter of the execution of this deed, it is doubtful whether it should be treated as a mortgage to secure past and future advances, or as having been procured by fraud and misrepresentation and without consideration, in which latter event a constructive trust would be created in favor of plaintiff. On February 12, 1895, Etchepare executed a mortgage on the property to defendant Elizabeth Murray to secure the payment of his note given for a loan made by her to him. A decree foreclosing this mortgage was rendered April 5, 1897, in an action brought by Miss Murray. Plaintiff and Etchepare were parties defendant in that action. A part of the relief asked in this action is an injunction restraining defendant Hammel, as sheriff, from selling the premises mortgaged to Miss Murray in pursuance of said decree. One ground upon which this relief is sought is that the sheriff's deed, if issued to a purchaser at such sale, would cloud plaintiff's title to her property. On August 16, 1898, Etchepare conveyed an undivided one-half interest in the property deeded to him by plaintiff to defendant Labaig, and on the same date he conveyed the other undivided one-half to one Mrs. Appel. Later Mrs. Appel conveyed an undivided one-half of the interest deeded to her to defendant Marie Le Mesnager. Thereafter Mrs. Appel died testate, and defendant Julia A. Shepherd is the executrix of the former's estate. In October, 1898, Etchepare executed a mortgage on all the property deeded to him by plaintiff to defendants Bell and Appel to secure the payment to them of $2,000. Bell afterwards assigned his interest in said mortgage to one Gibson, and Appel assigned his interest therein to defendant Julia A. Shepherd. Thereafter, in an action to which Julia A. Shepherd, as executrix and individually, said Gibson, and defendants Appel, Bell, and Labaig were parties, it was adjudged that said mortgage to Bell and Appel "was a valid lien as to the said" Etchepare, Labaig, Julia A. Shepherd, executrix, "the said mortgagees, and their assigns, upon the lands therein described in said mortgage." The representations made to plaintiff whereby she was induced to execute the deed to Etchepare, the situation and relation of the parties thereto, the circumstances and facts of that transaction showing fraud, misrepresentation, and want of consideration, and plaintiff's lack of education, business ability, and experience, are all alleged; and it is also averred that all of the parties to the deeds, mortgages, and assignments mentioned that were made subsequent to the execution of plaintiff's deed to Etchepare took every such deed, mortgage, or assignment thereof with notice and knowledge that her said deed was procured by misrepresentation, fraud, and without consideration, as alleged in the complaint. It is further shown that all of the transactions, subsequent to plaintiff's deed were had without her knowledge or consent, that she never received any benefit therefrom, and that the deeds executed by Etchepare, as well as some of the assignments mentioned, were without consideration. It is not shown who has been in possession of the property since the execution of the plaintiff's deed. The substance of the prayer of the complaint is that plaintiff be decreed to be the owner in fee simple of the land described in her deed to Etchepare; that it be decreed that neither of the defendants has any right, title, or interest therein; that her title thereto be quieted against all the defendants; that the defendant Hammel, as sheriff, be enjoined from making a sale under the decree in the foreclosure action; and that plaintiff have all other and proper relief. The action was dismissed as to defendants Labaig and Le Mesnager. The remaining defendants demurred to the complaint on several grounds—one ground being for insufficiency of facts; another, for uncertainty, in that the complaint does not show what estate or property the plaintiff claims; another, for defect of parties, in that Etchepare and Gibson had not been joined as parties defendant; and on the further ground that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant Murray's demurrer was overruled, and the demurrer of the others was sustained. The correctness of the latter ruling is questioned by the first appeal.

1. From the prayer of the complaint it may be inferred that the pleader regarded the action as being substantially one brought to quiet plaintiff's title and to obtain ancillary injunctive relief. An action to quiet title cannot be maintained by the owner of an equitable estate against the holder of the legal title under a complaint containing only the usual averments commonly made in such an action. Chase v. Cameron, 133 Cal. 231, 65 Pac. 460. But where, as here, the facts upon which plaintiff's claim is based are alleged, there is authority to grant any proper relief within the limitations of section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure. And appropriate remedies, such as cancellation, reconveyance, or decrees quieting title, or establishing or enforcing trusts, or determining the priorities of opposing equities, may be had, as between proper parties, under our system, whenever they are required upon equitable considerations and are justified by the pleadings and proof in the case. Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113; Tuffree v. Polhemus, 108 Cal. 670, 41 Pac. 806; Collins v. O'Laverty, 136 Cal. 31, 68 Pac. 327; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 33 Pac. 786; Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 Pac. 1091. Since general relief was demanded, the prayer of this complaint need not be considered further in determining whether or not the demurrer was properly sustained. Rollins v. Forbes, and Angus v. Craven, supra. If the allegations of the complaint are true, plaintiff's title is paramount to that of any defendant claiming a lien by mortgage. Murray v. Etchepare, 129 Cal. 318, 61 Pac. 930. Whether her deed to Etchepare was procured by fraud and without consideration, as alleged, or whether it was in fact a mortgage, as was once found (De Leonis v. Walsh, 145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637), is immaterial on this demurrer, for in any event she is entitled to have her rights determined. Though it is conceded that Etchepare and Gibson were proper parties, it does not appear from the complaint that they were necessary parties. But, if it should appear at any time during the progress of the case that the presence of parties other than those named by the complaint is necessary for a complete determination of the controversy arising on issues made by the pleadings, they can be brought in. Code Civ. Proc. § 389. The demurrer was not well taken for defect of parties. Nor should it be sustained for uncertainty, since the facts are alleged. In one view it may be concluded from the facts that Etchepare acquired only the naked legal title. This he would hold under a constructive trust, which would arise in favor of plaintiff. Hays v. Gloster (Cal.) 26 Pac. 367. But possibly the correct view of the matter, looking to facts alleged, and not to the pleader's conclusions, is that the deed was intended as, and was in fact, a mortgage. This conclusion is strengthened from the fact that it is not shown that Etchepare's agency did not continue after the execution of the deed, nor that he did not continue to receive and disburse large sums of money and to render services subsequently, as he had prior to that time. If the latter view is correct, the legal title did not pass by this deed, and subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers with notice would acquire no rights as against plaintiff. In either event the particular statute pleaded in bar is inapplicable. Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Goodnow v. Parker, 112 Cal. 437, 44 Pac. 738; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 50 Pac. 386.

2. Defendant Murray answered after her demurrer was overruled, and the case went to trial between her and plaintiff; they being then the only parties before the court. Upon this trial, after plaintiff had rested, a motion for nonsuit was made in behalf of Miss Murray. This motion was granted, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The record does not show that any specification was made of the grounds of this motion. For this reason plaintiff urges that the latter judgment should be reversed. Miss Murray's counsel answer this contention by saying that they expect to show that the grounds of the motion for the nonsuit were specified, and that same were sufficient in form and substance to justify the order, and that "at the proper time" they propose "to suggest a diminution of the record." No such suggestion has been made. It is admitted in appellant's brief that such general grounds as "that there was no evidence to sustain plaintiff's cause of action" and "that there was no evidence to sustain plaintiff's complaint" were stated at the time the motion was made. It is probable that the reason why the motion for a nonsuit was granted was for defect of proof that Miss Murray took her mortgage with notice of the fraud, misrepresentation, failure of consideration, and other matters alleged with respect to the execution of the deed from plaintiff to Etchepare. But, in the absence of any showing in the record that this was specified as a ground for the motion, it must be held that the granting of the motion was error; for, if this ground had been specified, it may have been possible that plaintiff could have offered more evidence on this branch of the case, if permission had been asked and granted, and that she would have asked to reopen her case for such purpose. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867; Bronzan v. Drobaz, 93 Cal. 647, 29 Pac. 254; Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602; Belcher v. Murphy, 81 Cal. 39, 22 Pac. 264; 6 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 879.

For the reasons given, both judgments appealed from are reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

WELDON v. ROGERS.

COURTS — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT — TRANSFER.

Appeal will be transferred to the Supreme Court under Sup. Ct. Rule 32, the amount involved exceeding that of which the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

McNutt & Hannon, Will D. Gould, and Jas. H. Blanchard, for appellant. Louis Luckel, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Judgment was entered against the defendant in favor of T. J. Weldon April 2, 1891, for the sum of $2,000, with interest at 2 per cent. a month from March 1, 1887, aggregating $3,960, and, with costs, $3,979.15. Weldon died August 25, 1894, and on the 10th day of April, 1905, on the motion of Sophie B. Weldon, claiming to be executrix of the last will of the original plaintiff, then deceased, an order was made by the court below "that execution issue, and that the said judgment be enforced in favor of Sophie B. Weldon, executrix of the last will and testament of said T. J. Weldon, deceased, plaintiff herein, and against the defendant, Ralph Rogers, for the sum of $3,979.15, with interest from April 2, 1891, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, now amounting to $7,870.44." Thereupon a writ of execution was issued, but in whose name as plaintiff does not appear from the record before us. Nor does it appear that any order was made by the court at any time to revive the action in the name of the executrix. Thereafter, on the 14th day of April, 1905, after due notice, the defendant moved the court to set aside the order of April 10, 1905, and to quash the execution thereon issued; and the motion, coming on to be heard on May 22, 1905, was denied by the court. From this order the defendant appealed—giving only the undertaking provided for in section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure—and now, pending the appeal, moves the court for a writ of supersedeas directed to the lower court, "requiring said court and its officers to stay proceedings on the order made and entered in said court on the 10th day of April, 1905," etc., "and * * * on the writ of execution issued in pursuance of said order on said 10th day of April, 1905." Upon this state of the case it is clear—whether we have regard to the amount of the original judgment, or that involved in the order of April 10, 1905—that the appeal should have been taken to the Supreme Court. It only remains for us, therefore, under the provisions of the Constitution and rule 32 of the Supreme Court, to transfer the case, together with the pending motion, to that court; and it is so ordered.

SMITH et al. v. BRADBURY. (S. F. 3,496.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1905.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACTS—FILING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, provides that all contracts for the construction and repair of buildings shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000, and shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder; otherwise, the same shall be wholly void, and all materials furnished by persons other than the contractor shall be deemed to have been furnished at the personal instance of the owner. Held that, where a contract for plastering specified the prices per square yard and the work to be done at that figure amounted to much more than $1,000 and defendant had paid $2,425.68 under the contract, he was not relieved from the necessity of filing the same because the contract did not state the aggregate price.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Rehearing denied November 1, 1905.

E. C. Chapman, for appellant. J. N. Young, William H. Young, and Marion S. Blanchard, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to enforce a lien for materials under the mechanics' lien law against a building and lot of land owned by defendant W. B. Bradbury. The amount of the lien claimed is $87.15, and the court gave judgment for plaintiffs, enforcing the lien for that amount, together with interest, costs, etc. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The case was tried without a jury, and, findings having been waived, no findings were made.

The defendant was engaged in repairing and altering some buildings and adding thereto, so as to convert the whole into a four-story hotel. He made a written contract with McKendrick and Mellon to do all the plastering throughout said buildings, and they purchased from plaintiff certain materials which they used in carrying out the contract, and the lien of plaintiffs here in question is for such materials. It is averred in the complaint that the contract work done by McKendrick and Mellon exceeded $1,000; that neither the whole of said contract nor any memorandum thereof was filed in the recorder's office, as required by the Code; and therefore plaintiffs claim that the contract was void, and the materials furnished by them are to be deemed to have been furnished at "the personal instance of the owner," as provided in section 1183, Code Civ. Proc. Defendant does not deny that the contract was not recorded, but contends that the contract price agreed upon in the contract with McKendrick and Mellon did not exceed $1,000, and that therefore the contract is not within the provisions declaring contracts void which are not recorded. We do not think that this point is tenable. By the contract in question McKendrick and Mellon agree to perform "all of the plastering work, including labor and materials, pertaining to that certain building, improvement, or structure now being altered and repaired by the said party of the first part (Bradbury), and situated," etc. It is further "mutually agreed that the contract price for lathing and plastering all the new work pertaining to said building shall be the sum of nineteen (19) cents per square yard," and that the contract price of the plastering of all the walls and ceilings of all the rooms and halls of the old building should be 13 cents per square yard. The evidence clearly shows that the amount of the work done under the contract at the stipulated price per yard amounted to a great deal more than $1,000. Defendant, himself, testifies, and it is asserted in the brief of his counsel, that he had paid $2,425.68 "pursuant to the contract." And, considering what was shown by the evidence, it must be assumed that the parties knew when the contract was made, unless they shut their eyes to what plainly appeared, that the work to be done at 19 and 13 cents per square yard would necessarily exceed $1,000; and, this being so, the defendant could not evade the provisions of the Code by simply avoiding a statement of the aggregate amount of the full price. The statement of the rate per yard sufficiently showed, under the circumstances, an agreement for an amount exceeding $1,000. Under this view there is no necessity to consider other points argued by counsel.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

THOMPSON v. CALIFORNIA CONST. CO.

(L. A. 1,309.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1905.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY OF MASTER—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

Under Civ. Code, § 1970, providing that the employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for loss suffered by the latter from the ordinary risks of the business, and section 1971, declaring that an employer must in all cases indemnify his employé for loss caused by the employer's want of ordinary care, an employer is not bound to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place in which to work, but is only required to exercise ordinary care in that regard.

2. APPEAL—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

That the trial court limited the ground on which a new trial was granted does not, on appeal from the order, restrict the Supreme Court in its examination of the record to ascertain whether a new trial should have been granted, except as to the sufficiency of the evidence in case the evidence is conflicting.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMED RISK.

Where plaintiff, who had been employed in defendant's rock quarry for several days, was injured by the sliding of a rock on the slope above him, and the conditions surrounding the place of work were constantly changing, owing to the progress of the work, and there was nothing to indicate that defendant, or its servants in charge of the entire work, or occupying the position of vice principal, had any better means of ascertaining the conditions than plaintiff, or that they knew that the rock was liable to fall, and plaintiff testified that, though he had examined the slope several times on the day of the accident, there was nothing to attract his attention to the fact that there was any danger, he assumed the risk, and was not entitled to recover.

4. SAME—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

There being no evidence that the sliding of rocks down the slope, or some portion thereof, was not a frequent occurrence during the progress of the work, the mere happening of the accident, and the fact that no one had previously been hurt in a similar manner, was not prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the master.

Action by Tobias Thompson against the California Construction Company. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied November 1, 1905.

Kendrick & Knott and Adcock & Reymert, for appellant. Herbert Cutler Brown and Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland (Byron Waters, of counsel), for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This was an action by an employé against the employer for damages on account of personal injuries received in a rock quarry in the possession and control of the defendant at the time of the injury. The verdict went for the plaintiff, and the defendant moved for a new trial upon various grounds assigned in his notice of motion therefor. The court below granted a new trial, and, in doing so, entered the following order: "Defendant's motion for a new trial is hereby granted upon the following specified ground, and upon no other, to wit: The court erred in instructing the jury as follows: 'It is the duty of the employer to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place in which to do any work the employer shall require of the employé, and to keep that place reasonably safe, and the employé has the right to assume that the employer has performed that duty, and the employé is not required to use any degree of care or diligence to discover danger to which he shall be exposed by reason of the failure of his employer to do his duty, and the employé shall be held to have assumed the risk only when he knew, and will be held to have known only when the danger was so obvious that he must have known or simply neglected to open his eyes and see, or when he was put upon inquiry by some discovery or suggestion of danger which it was gross carelessness for him to neglect.'" From this order plaintiff appeals.

The latter clause of the instruction is taken, word for word, from the decision of this court in Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 192, 60 Pac. 687. We express no opinion upon the question whether or not this part of the instruction was correct as applies to this particular case. The instruction in effect told the jury that the employer must furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place to work, without regard to the nature of the employment, and that "the employé is not required to use any degree of care or diligence to discover danger to which he shall be exposed by reason of the failure of his employer to do his duty." The Code declares the law on this subject as follows: "The employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed in the same general business, unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé." Civ. Code, § 1970. "An employer must in all cases indemnify his employé for losses caused by the former's want of ordinary care." Civ. Code, § 1971. And, as correctly stated in Rogers v. C. P. Ry. Co., 67 Cal. 607, 8 Pac. 377: "The Code having thus established the rule by which to ascertain the liability of the employer to his employé, it is not within the province of the courts to depart from it." Where a man engaged in a lawful business exercises reasonable care, the law does not make him the insurer of others against those consequences of his actions which reasonable care and foresight could have prevented. The contrary rule would obviously be against public policy, because it would impose so great a restraint upon action as to materially check human enterprise. Rogers v. C. P. Ry. Co., supra. "The law imposes on a master or employer only the obligation to use reasonable or ordinary care, skill, and diligence in procuring and furnishing suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the servant to perform the duties for which he is engaged." Brymer v. S. P. R. R. Co., 90 Cal. 496, 27 Pac. 371. The statement that it is the duty of the employer to furnish an employé with a reasonably safe place in which to work is a defective statement of the law. The duty of the employer in this respect is not absolute. He is not required at all hazards to furnish a reasonably safe place. His duty is fulfilled when he exercises ordinary care for that purpose. In this respect the court in another instruction told the jury that, if the defendant exercised such care as men of ordinary intelligence ordinarily exercise under like circumstances and conditions, taking into consideration the character of the work, then it had done all that was required of it and could not be held liable for the injuries received by the plaintiff. While this might have cured the instruction in the particular above stated, still we cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in granting the new trial upon this ground. Much is committed to the discretion of the trial court in considering such grounds for a new trial.

The action of the court below in limiting the ground upon which the new trial was granted does not restrict this court in its examination of the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a new trial should have been granted, except as to the sufficiency of the evidence, where it is conflicting. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 276, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124. One of the grounds for a new trial was the denial of the motion of the defendant, made at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, for a nonsuit. This motion was made upon several grounds—among others, that the evidence failed to show actionable negligence on the part of the defendant proximately causing or contributing to the plaintiff's injuries. We think the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. The evidence shows that the defendant was in control of a rock quarry in which the plaintiff was employed; that the business carried on was that of blasting rock out of a cliff of rock some 50 or 60 feet high, and loading large, irregular pieces of rock thus obtained upon cars standing at the foot of the slope upon which the rock lay; that this slope was composed of the rough pieces of rock, mingled with dirt from the soil above the stratum of rock; and that the process of loading consisted of fastening a chain around each rock, attaching it to a derrick, and thereby lifting the rock on the cars. At the time of the injury the plaintiff, with another workman, who seemed to be directing the plaintiff in his actions, was engaged in fastening the chain around one of these large pieces of rock in order to attach it to the derrick. While he was stooping down trying to pass the chain under the rock, another rock situated on the slope above him slipped down upon him and caused the injury. The plaintiff had been engaged in the quarry for 27 days prior to the injury, and during all that time the work of loading the rocks on the cars was continued. Part of the time he assisted in chaining rocks upon the slope where they lay after the blasting, and part of the time he was engaged in shoveling dirt. There is no evidence that the defendant or any of its agents or servants had any better knowledge or any better means of knowledge of the danger arising from the sliding of rocks down the cliff than that possessed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff himself testifies that during the morning before he started to work he looked lots of times at the slope where the broken pieces of rock were lying, and did not see anything lying loose, and that it looked all right; that, as he walked over to the place where he was to assist in chaining the rock, he looked up at the slope above and saw nothing lying loose. According to his testimony, the rock which came down upon him was at that time lying on the slope, some eight or ten feet above the rock which he was chaining, and there was nothing which attracted his attention to the fact that there was any danger that it would slide at that time, and thereby injure him. It is manifest that upon the face of a quarry, worked in the manner here indicated, the conditions of danger must be constantly changing as the work progresses. There is nothing whatever to show that the defendant, or any of its servants in charge of the entire work or occupying the position of a master with respect to the plaintiff, had any better opportunities of ascertaining the conditions than the plaintiff. The rule applicable to such cases is that the master is not liable for dangers existing in the place where the servant is assigned to work, unless the master knows of the dangers or defects, or might have known thereof if he used ordinary care or skill to ascertain them. 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 92. This rule applies with greater force in cases where the conditions surrounding the place of work are constantly changing, owing to the progress of the work. The rule is further modified by the proposition that, where the servant is under the same obligation as the master is to look for dangers in the place of work, and has equal facilities for ascertaining them, and under these conditions continues the work, the master is not liable for any injury caused by the dangers thus existing, unless in some manner he urges or coerces the servant to continue the work after he himself is aware, or should have been aware, of the danger. 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 130. In a case such as that under consideration, where the dangers complained of may to some extent arise from the changes in conditions made by the servant himself in the progress of the work, he is under as much obligation as is the master to be on the lookout for such dangers. The plaintiff had the burden of proving that his injury was due to the negligence of the defendant. There was no evidence of such neglect other than the fact that the rock slipped down and caused the injury. Under the circumstances above stated, the mere happening of the accident is not prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the master. That rule applies only in cases where, in the ordinary course of things, due care being used, such accidents do not happen. The plaintiff testified that during the time he was working in the quarry he had not seen anyone injured from such causes as the sliding of rocks down the slope. This, however, does not prove that such accidents would not happen in the ordinary course of things. It is not the injury itself, but the happening of the causes which produce the injury, that must be absent in the ordinary course of things. There is no evidence that the sliding of rocks down the slope, or some portion thereof, was not a frequent occurrence during the progress of the work. It is almost self-evident that such things would occur in a case of a slope made by blasting rocks from a high cliff, and, if that were the case, the danger arising therefrom would be obvious to any one having knowledge of the situation such as he could obtain from the use of his own eyesight. The mere fact that no one had previously been hurt by being in the way of such sliding rocks does not establish any presumption that there was no danger, or that due care had been theretofore used. There is no evidence that proper precautions to prevent the rocks sliding were not taken by the defendant. The motion for a nonsuit should have been granted upon the ground that it is not shown that the defendant was negligent with respect to the safety of the place in which the plaintiff was at work at the time of the injury.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

I concur: SHAW, J.

I concur in the judgment, upon the ground that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and also concur in what is said in the opinion upon that point: ANGELLOTTI, J.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1905.)

INJUNCTION—EX PARTE APPLICATION—MODIFICATION—NOTICE—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 532, providing that, if an injunction be granted without notice, the defendant at any time before the trial may apply upon reasonable notice to the judge who granted the injunction or to the court to which the action is brought to dissolve or modify the injunction, where a preliminary injunction was granted on complainant's ex parte application, the court had no power to modify the same in important particulars without notice to complainant.

Suit by the Cherry Hill Gold Mining Company against E. D. Baker and another. From an order modifying a preliminary injunction without notice, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James F. Farraher and E. A. Belcher, for appellant. R. S. Taylor and L. F. Coburn, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The court, having granted a preliminary injunction upon the verified complaint of plaintiff, subsequently, upon the ex parte application of defendants, modified this injunction in important particulars. The appeal is from this latter order, and involves the single question as to the power of the court so to do without notice to plaintiff. This question must be considered as definitely settled in favor of appellant by the cases of Heflon v. Bowers, 72 Cal. 270, 13 Pac. 690, and Page v. Vaughn, 133 Cal. 335, 65 Pac. 740. In the latter case it is said: "The evident purpose of the foregoing statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 532) is to empower the court to dissolve its injunction only after notice to the plaintiff. The meaning of the statute is plain, and to put a construction on it that would dispense with the notice required by it is to construe one provision of the statute out of existence and thereby thwart the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it." There is not, of course, here involved the question of the power of the court to modify or dissolve its preliminary injunction. It is merely a question of procedure. It is still always open to defendant, upon such notice as the court may direct, to obtain all the relief to which he may be entitled.

1. EQUITY—LACHES—LOSS.

In the absence of hardship or injustice to the opposite party, a plaintiff is not guilty of laches by mere lapse of time less than that specified by the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 19, Cent. Dig. Equity, § 204.]

2. GUARDIAN AND WARD—ACTION ON BOND—LACHES.

Where, in an action on a guardian's bond, nothing appeared on the face of the complaint to indicate that defendants, or any person other than plaintiff, had suffered or could have suffered any loss or prejudice by plaintiff's delay in proceedings to compel an accounting by her guardian, a defense of laches must have been pleaded and proved in order to be available.

3. SAME—LIMITATIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 343, providing that an action for relief not previously provided for must be commenced within four years from the time the cause of action shall have accrued, mere delay of three years and two months on the part of the ward in compelling an accounting by her guardian was not of itself sufficient to raise a presumption that the sureties on the bond would be prejudiced thereby.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

A. L. Shinn, for appellant. W. A. Gett, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The appeal is from a judgment rendered upon a guardian's bond. The plaintiff, whose maiden name was Ceas, and who is the daughter of defendant George T. Ceas, while still a minor, became or was the owner of some property, and her father, George T. Ceas, was appointed by the probate court of Sacramento county as guardian of her person and estate, and in compliance with the requirement of the court, on April 2, 1883, entered into a bond in the sum of $3,000, with C. P. Hensley and P. H. Gardiner as sureties. The plaintiff having arrived at age April 30, 1897, and her father as such guardian having failed to settle his guardianship or account to her and pay over the sums in his hands belonging to her, on the 21st of June, 1900, plaintiff commenced proceedings which resulted in a settlement of his account on the 24th of January, 1901. In said settlement it was ascertained and determined by the superior court of Sacramento county that there was a balance due from George T. Ceas, as guardian of the plaintiff, of $3,150.47. Upon demand being made by the plaintiff of the sum found due by the court, and failure and refusal on the part of the guardian and sureties on his bond to pay the same, the plaintiff thereupon commenced an action against her guardian and the sureties on his bond for the recovery of the sum of $3,000, being the sum mentioned in said bond. The defendant Ceas and one of the sureties, C. P. Hensley, defaulted; but the other surety, P. H. Gardiner, appeared and defended said action. In his answer he set up as an affirmative defense that the judgment ascertaining and settling the final account had not become final, 60 days not having elapsed after the rendition thereof before the beginning of said action, and that said action was therefore prematurely brought. (It appears that an appeal was taken from said judgment settling said account, and the judgment affirmed. Guardianship of Ceas, 134 Cal. 114, 66 Pac. 187.) The ruling of the court below that the action was prematurely brought, the time for taking an appeal from the order settling the final account not having elapsed, was by this court held to be correct. Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 227, 77 Pac. 65.

By another affirmative defense it was contended that the action was barred by the provision of section 1805, Code of Civil Procedure, which defense was also sustained by the court below. But this court, however, held that an action against the sureties of a guardian was not barred by the terms of section 1805, Code of Civil Procedure, until three years after a final order of court removing or discharging the guardian, and that it did not appear that the guardian had ever been discharged or removed. Section 1805, Code of Civil Procedure, referred to, reads as follows: "No action can be maintained against a surety on any bond given by a guardian unless it be commenced within three years of the discharge or removal of the guardian; but if, at the time of such discharge, the person entitled to bring such action is under any legal disability to sue, the action may be commenced at any time within three years after such disability is removed." In the opinion of this court on this branch it is said: "A statute of limitation ought not to be enlarged in its operation by judicial construction, when it is so framed as to work injustice, either by itself or in conjunction with other provisions of law. In this state we have one rule which prohibits an action on the bond of a guardian's surety until there is a final order settling the guardian's account, and another rule barring the action in three years after the removal or discharge of the guardian. So far as its express terms require, the rule must no doubt be enforced, even where, without the fault of the ward, a final settlement of the account has not been obtained within three years after the removal or discharge; but neither justice nor sound policy requires that a law capable of working so inequitably should be enlarged by construction so as to embrace a class of cases not comprehended in its terms. And this conclusion does not leave the sureties on guardians' bonds without an ample measure of protection against stale claims. They have all the advantage of the general statute of limitations, and of the doctrine of Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153, which will hold wards to the rule of reasonable diligence in procuring settlement of their guardians' accounts. In this case it does not appear whether or not there was unreasonable delay on the part of plaintiff in seeking a settlement of the account." And the judgment of the court below in the former action was affirmed on the ground that the action was prematurely commenced, and was remanded without prejudice to another action.

Upon the going down of the remittitur in the former action, the present action was commenced July 29, 1904. The defendant Ceas, and Hensley, one of the sureties on his bond, failed to appear and defend in this action, as in the former. The defendant Gardiner in his answer sets up the same affirmative defenses as in the former action, and in addition thereto alleges that said action is barred by the provisions of section 337 and subdivision 1 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure. The court found that no order or decree had ever been entered by the superior court of Sacramento county, having jurisdiction of the matter of guardianship in question, discharging or removing said George T. Ceas as guardian of plaintiff, and that the action was not barred by section 337 or subdivision 1 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure. On the question raised by defendant's answer of laches on the part of the plaintiff in commencing proceedings to compel a settlement of the account of the guardian, the court finds that there was no evidence offered by either party to the action in explanation thereof, nor as to the question whether the defendant was injured or his rights affected thereby. The court in this connection finds "that the time which elapsed between the coming of age of the plaintiff and the commencement of the proceedings by her to compel an accounting by her guardian did not amount to laches, nor affect her right of recovery herein."

On the present appeal it is contended on behalf of the appellant that the action is barred by laches, on the authority of Barnes v. Glide and similar cases, especially, however, on the authority of Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153. That was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the trustees of a swamp land district to levy a tax to pay warrants, and the court in its opinion says: "The warrant set up in the first count of the complaint was issued, presented, and payment thereon was refused, in November, 1877, and this present suit was not commenced until November, 1895, which was 18 years thereafter. The date of the latest warrant set up in the complaint is 1881, more than 14 years before the commencement of the action. The present board of trustees, who are made defendants, do not appear to have occupied that position for a longer period than 6 months prior to the commencement of the suit. The warrants sued on were issued, if at all, by other trustees, who were in office from 15 to 18 years before this proceeding was instituted. They may have been issued illegally. The act of issuing them may have been ultra vires. They may not have been issued for any labor done in the construction of the works of the district. They may have been issued without consideration and fraudulently. They may be forgeries. And it is quite evident that the present defendants, after such a lapse of time, would be in no condition to make any of the defenses above indicated, when witnesses who knew of the facts at the time may be dead, or may have allowed the recollection of them to vanish from their memories. And the evident purpose of the statute of limitations is to prevent such a condition of affairs, and to preclude parties from disturbing that repose which is intended to be final, after the lapse of certain periods of time designated in the statute itself. The position cannot be successfully maintained that no action could be commenced until a demand had been made by plaintiff upon the defendants to act. * * * If the facts stated in the complaint in the case at bar constitute a cause of action, they constitute a cause of action which accrued, and for which an action might have been instituted, from 14 to 18 years before the present complaint was filed. The statute of limitations is intended to embrace all causes of action not specially excepted from its operation; and there is no exception applicable to the present proceeding."

It will be seen from the foregoing that there is no similarity whatever between Barnes v. Glide and the case at bar, and the same may be said of the other cases referred to by appellant. The effect of lapse of time upon a cause of action, when the delay is unproductive of and unaccompanied by any hardship or injustice to the other party, is determined by the provisions of the statute of limitations. In order to constitute laches, there must be something more than mere lapse of the time which would bar the remedy under the statute of limitations. This subject was fully considered in Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 47, 78 Pac. 467, and Kleinclaus v. Dutard (Cal. Sup.) 81 Pac. 516. In the Cahill Case it is said that, "in order to bar a remedy because of laches, there must appear, in addition to mere lapse of time, some circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must be such lapse of time that it may be reasonably supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed." Laches, like the statute of limitations, is a defense which must be alleged and proved by the defendant, unless the facts constituting it appear on the face of the complaint, in which case, as in the case of the statute of limitations, it must be urged by the defendant by means of a demurrer, or in some other legal manner (Kleinclaus v. Dutard, supra); otherwise, it is waived. Nothing appeared on the face of the complaint herein to indicate that the defendants, or any person excepting the plaintiff herself, did suffer, or could have suffered, any loss or prejudice by reason of her delay in proceeding to compel an accounting by the guardian. It is at least doubtful if any statute of limitations constitutes a bar to such a proceeding (see Estate of Sanderson, 74 Cal. 215, 15 Pac. 753); but if there is such a statute it must be section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing the period of four years, which did not elapse in this case. Here there was a delay of only three years and a little less than two months, which is not, of itself, sufficient to raise any presumption or inference that the sureties on the bond would be prejudiced thereby. Hence it was incumbent on them to show, if they could, that some circumstance, such, for instance, as insolvency of the principal, occurred during the delay, from which loss may have been occasioned to them. Nothing having been shown, it follows, as matter of law, that the lapse of time alone was not laches.

This court on the appeal in the former action expressly held that it did not appear whether or not there was unreasonable delay on the part of the plaintiff in seeking a settlement of the account, and therefore the case was remanded, with permission to bring another action. And, as already shown, in the present action the court below finds that there was no evidence presented by either party in reference to the cause of the delay, and nothing to show that the defendant was injured or his rights affected in consequence thereof, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of laches, under the circumstances, in the delay in demanding an accounting of her guardian. There having been no evidence, as shown, to support the plea of laches, the case is in no better position, as far as that defense is concerned, than in the former action.

In this connection the question may well be suggested whether the sureties on the bond can in any event urge a delay by the ward in instituting proceedings to compel an accounting by the guardian, after she arrives at age, as sufficient laches to bar an action against them upon the bond, unless in cases where the conduct of the ward has in some way misled them, or caused them to delay such proceedings. They have an equal right with the ward to institute proceedings for an accounting. It is the duty of the guardian to render the account, and for the performance of that duty they have become his guarantors, so that in some respects his duty is their own. But, in the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to decide this question, and we leave it without expressing any opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

In bank.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. (dissenting). Having recorded my dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this cause, I desire to say that such dissent was not based upon any divergence of views as to the only question discussed in the department opinion, viz., the question whether the defendant had established his defense, based upon the equitable doctrine of laches. That defense was only one of several separate defenses pleaded in the answer, and seems to have been abandoned in the trial court, as it certainly was on the appeal. The plea, and the only plea, upon which the defendant rested his case in this court, was the three-year statute of limitations (subdivision 1, § 338, Code Civ. Proc.), and to that his argument was exclusively devoted. His propositions were: First. The duty of a guardian to pay over to his ward the balance found due on settlement of his final account is a purely statutory duty, and an action thereon is barred at the expiration of three years after it accrues; that is to say, three years after such settlement, and at the same time that the action is barred against the guardian, an action upon the collateral obligation of his surety is barred. To sustain this proposition he cited the well-considered decision of this court in bank upon rehearing of the case of County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 Pac. 257, 312, 65 Pac. 12, 459, which clearly does sustain the entire proposition. His second proposition was that, since the action against a guardian's surety is barred in three years after settlement of the account, the ward is held to reasonable diligence in procuring such settlement; that she cannot keep her cause of action alive indefinitely by neglecting to take a step which she is free to take the day she comes of age, and consequently that, this plaintiff having neglected for more than three years after she reached her majority (April 30, 1897) to institute any proceeding to compel such settlement, the statute began to run at the expiration of that period, viz., April 30, 1900, and had fully run before the action was commenced, which was July 29, 1904. This is the doctrine of Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153, to the advantage of which this court expressly held that the defendant was entitled in deciding the former appeal. 143 Cal. 231, 77 Pac. 65. The facts of the Barnes v. Glide Case, of course, were different from the facts of this, but the general doctrine which applies to the one applies with equal force to the other, and is clearly stated by Justice Harrison in Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 60, 47 Pac. 878, as follows: "The rule is well settled that when the plaintiff's right of action depends upon some act which he has to perform preliminarily to commencing suit, and he is under no restraint or disability in the performance of such act, he cannot suspend indefinitely the running of the statute of limitations by a delay in performing such preliminary act, and that, if the time within which such act is to be performed is indefinite or not specified, a reasonable time will be allowed therefor, and the statute will begin to run after the lapse of such reasonable time. What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances of each case. A party cannot, by his own negligence or for his own convenience, stop the running of the statute. Palmer v. Palmer, 36 Mich. 487, 24 Am. Rep. 605; Atchison, etc., R. R. Co., v. Burlingame, 36 Kan. 628, 14 Pac. 271, 59 Am. Rep. 578; Ball v. Keokuk, etc., Ry. Co., 62 Iowa, 751, 16 N. W. 592; High v. Board of Com'rs, 92 Ind. 580; Bills v. Silver King Min. Co., 106 Cal. 21, 39 Pac. 43; Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899. The rule rests upon the principle that the plaintiff has it in his power at all times to do the act which fixes his right of action."

This doctrine has been uniformily sustained in its application to a number and variety of cases in this state, and in other states. See 13 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (1st Ed.) p. 726. Usually it has been applied in this state to cases in which a previous demand on the part of plaintiff was necessary to perfect the cause of action, as in Bills v. Silver King Min. Co., 106 Cal. 21, 39 Pac. 43. In that case I stated in my concurring opinion the rule as to what is to be deemed, if unexcused, an unreasonable delay in taking the necessary preliminary step by the plaintiff to perfect his cause of action, as follows: "As to what is a reasonable time, that is ordinarily determined by the analogy of the statutory periods of limitation. If the cause of action is barred by the lapse of two years after it becomes complete, then the demand must be made within two years after the right to make it accrues, or a valid excuse must be shown for the failure to make it within that time." This statement of the rule in my concurring opinion has since been adopted by the court, and has thus become the settled rule of decision here, as in other states. Meherin v. S. F. Produce Exchange, 117 Cal. 217, 48 Pac. 1074. And it has been applied, not merely to the case of demand of payment, or of a deed, or other act due upon demand, but to a case in principle precisely the same as this. The case of Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 40, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17, was an action to recover lands claimed by the defendants under an invalid sale in probate. In such a case the action by the administratrix was held to be barred in three years after settlement of her final account. It was commenced before the settlement of her account; but it was said, with reference to her right of action: "In our opinion the administratrix was allowed under the amendment of 1880 a reasonable time in which to obtain settlement of her final account, and that, failing in this, the statute began to run, and were she the plaintiff here it could be pleaded against her with effect. What is such reasonable time must depend in general on the circumstances of each estate; but here it is apparent that much more than a reasonable time expired more than three years prior to the commencement of the action. There is no novelty in this proposition. It follows from the principle of quite extensive application that one cannot avoid the statute of limitations by delay in taking action incumbent upon him. Thus it was held that the executor of a will probated in Illinois, who had unreasonably delayed to take out ancillary letters of administration in New York, was not entitled to the benefit of the statute of the latter state which excepted from the general statute of limitations a certain period 'after the granting of such letters.' Kirby v. Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co., 120 U. S. 130, 7 Sup. Ct. 430, 30 L. Ed. 569. And see Bauserman v. Blunt, 147 U. S. 647, 13 Sup. Ct. 466, 37 L. Ed. 316, approving Bauserman v. Charlott, 46 Kan. 480, 26 Pac. 1051; Mickel v. Walraven, 92 Iowa, 423, 60 N. W. 633; Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899. If this be not the correct view of the statute, and if the right to sue can be preserved to the administrator and those whom he represents for 10 years by failure, without excuse, to settle his final account, then it may be preserved in like manner for 50 years, or indefinitely."

All these and other cases decided here and in other jurisdictions were cited by counsel for appellant in his printed argument in support of the second proposition that the plaintiff could not wait an unreasonable time to institute proceedings to compel a settlement of her guardian's account; that a period of more than three years was an unreasonable time, and consequently that the three-year statute had fully run. I think his defense was clearly established, and that the judgment of the superior court should have been reversed. But, whether this be so or not, there can be no doubt that he was entitled to a hearing upon the case which he submitted to our judgment. It is a matter of no practical consequence, in view of the modification of that part of the department opinion relating to the supposed "law of the case," to note the mistake of fact upon which it was founded; but I think the modification should have been more extensive. The statement still remains that the former case presented the same fact appearing here, viz., that plaintiff delayed, without excuse, for more than three years to take any step to compel an accounting. That fact was pleaded in the answer in the other case as part of the separate defense of laches, but, of course, was deemed denied, and, since there was no finding upon the issue, it did not appear from the record, which consisted of the judgment roll alone, that three years, or even a single day, had elapsed before proceedings were commenced. And this state of the record, showing a failure to find a fact material to the plea of the statute of limitations, was the sole occasion for what I said in my opinion regarding that plea and the doctrine of Barnes v. Glide.

BANK OF VISALIA et al. v. DILLONWOOD LUMBER CO. et al. (Sac. 1,160.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS — CREATION — CORPORATIONS — EMPLOYMENT CONTRACT.

Where L. was employed by the stockholders of a corporation to undertake the control of its business, to the extent of financing it and placing it on a profitable basis, at a monthly salary, with certain other advantages to accrue to him if the enterprise was successful, but no property was placed in his hands in trust for any purpose, and the corporation continued to transact business in its own name, the agreement did not constitute a trust, though L. was designated as "trustee" for the corporation.

2. ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—PRIORITIES OF CLAIMS—CLAIM OF TRUSTEE.

Where a transfer by a corporation in trust for creditors did not provide for any preference in favor of the trustee for money advanced, except that there was given "to the principal creditors" mentioned therein the right to determine the order in which the "principal debts" should be paid, and the principal creditors thereafter, including the trustee, agreed on an order which gave the trustee a preference, such creditors having only authority to bind themselves, neither the trust agreement nor the agreement between the creditors entitled the trustee to preferred payment over claimants for labor and supplies either for money advanced or salary earned prior to the assignment.

3. SAME—CLAIMS FOR WAGES—PREFERENCE—STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1204, providing for a preferred claim on behalf of laborers in all assignments of property, is not limited to insolvency proceedings or to assignments for the benefit of creditors, specified in Civ. Code, § 3449 etc., but applies also to the winding up of a corporation's business and the application of its assets to the payment of its debts by a trustee, to whom such assets were conveyed for such purpose.

4. SAME—LABOR AND SUPPLIES TO TRUSTEE.

Where a deed of trust conveyed the property of a corporation to a trustee to manage the business and pay debts, first the running expenses, including the necessary counsel fees, etc., persons performing labor and furnishing supplies to the trustee under the trust were entitled to a preferred claim therefor.

5. SAME—TRUSTEE—COMPENSATION—TIME.

Where a deed of trust for the benefit of creditors provided that the trustee should receive $150 a month to conduct the business, and it did not appear that the trustee rendered any service after October 1, 1901, when the business ceased as a going concern, to which time he was allowed a salary, it was not error for the court to refuse to allow his claim for further compensation till the rendition of a decree for the distribution of the proceeds of the corporation's property.

6. APPEAL — RECORD — BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

Where it does not appear from the record that certain items claimed by appellant not to have been allowed were not embraced in amounts for which allowance was made, it will be presumed that the amount to which he was entitled was allowed him.

7. SAME—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

Where, in a suit to wind up the affairs of an insolvent corporation and distribute the proceeds of its assets, all parties entered into a stipulation authorizing the court to make a sale of the corporation's property and to divide the proceeds, such stipulation constituted a waiver of an objection that the complaint was demurrable for want of facts.

8. TRUSTS—CONSTRUCTION—POWER OF TRUSTEE—AUTHORITY TO MORTGAGE.

A trust deed executed by a corporation conveyed its property to a trustee, to "conduct and carry on the sawmill and lumber business" of the corporation as trustee, and from such "business" to first pay the running expenses, and from the "property" or the product thereof to pay the indebtedness of the corporation. It also provided that the trustee should have power to sell, mortgage, or dispose of any part of the real or personal property for any and all of such purposes. Held, that such deed did not create two trusts, one of the "business" and the other of the property; and hence, though the trustee had power to mortgage "to pay" the indebtedness then existing, he had no power to mortgage "to secure" such indebtedness.

9. CORPORATIONS — INSOLVENCY—CREDITORS — RELIEF AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS — CROSS-COMPLAINT.

A creditor of an insolvent corporation was not entitled to any relief against stockholders, in an action for a sale and distribution of the corporate assets, where the liability of such stockholders was not pleaded by the creditor in a cross-complaint.

10. APPEAL—ISSUES AND PROOF—THEORY OF CAUSE.

Where appellant's claim against an insolvent corporation and its trustee was tried on the theory that the complaint charged a contract between the parties for the payment by the corporation of a certain price per 1,000 for all lumber hauled by claimant's engine, and there was no allegation in the complaint of any indebtedness based on the reasonable use of the engine, or any attempt to prove it, claimant could not object on appeal to a finding that neither the corporation nor its trustee entered into any agreement to pay any sum for the use of the engine, in that it was not a finding that defendants did not use the engine in their business or were not liable for such use.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Visalia and others against the Dillonwood Lumber Company and others to settle the affairs of defendant company, an insolvent. From a decree determining the order of payment of creditors, the Holt Manufacturing Company, George M. Perine, and A. J. De Laney, in his individual capacity and as trustee, etc., appeal. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter, Maurice E. Power, Samuel Rosenheim, and E. T. Cosper, for appellants. Charles G. Lamberson, Roth & McFadzean, Hudson & Pryor, Dixon L. Phillips, and H. P. Brown, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought by various creditors of the Dillonwood Lumber Company, a corporation, to enforce their claims against the property of the corporation, all of which it had assigned to the defendant A. J. De Laney as a trustee for their benefit. The complaint charged that the trustee had failed to comply with the terms of the trust, and that certain of his acts were in violation of its provisions, and asked that they be declared void, that he be removed and a new trustee appointed, that the trust property be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debts of the Dillonwood Lumber Company in the order and preference that the court might deem proper. The trust agreement, under the provisions of which the merits of the several appeals taken by appellants are to be determined, was executed by the Dillonwood Lumber Company and A. J. De Laney on June 19, 1901. After reciting that the company had that day conveyed to De Laney its real and personal property, it was agreed and declared that the said De Laney held all said property in trust for the following uses and purposes: "The said A. J. De Laney is to conduct and carry on the sawmill and lumber business of said Dillonwood Lumber Company, in said county of Tulare, as trustee, and from said business said A. J. De Laney is to first pay the running expenses thereof and all other necessary expenses, including necessary counsel fees, and from said property, or the product thereof, said A. J. De Laney is to pay, as soon as he can, the present indebtedness of said Dillonwood Lumber Company, * * * as shown by the books of said Dillonwood Lumber Company; and said A. J. De Laney shall have the right and power to sell any and all of said real and personal property to carry on and conduct said business and to pay said indebtedness, and may mortgage, hypothecate, and otherwise deal with or dispose of said property, or any part thereof, in any manner and to any extent he may elect, for any or all of said purposes, except as otherwise herein provided; and, upon said debts being paid in full, said A. J. De Laney shall reconvey to said Dillonwood Lumber Company any and all of the property he may then hold belonging to said corporation; * * * and provided, further, that said Dillonwood Lumber Company may terminate this trust upon paying off such indebtedness or the amount thereof due, or causing the same to be paid, together with all expenses incurred by said A. J. De Laney as aforesaid, and shall thereupon be entitled to a reconveyance of all said property then held by said A. J. De Laney. Said A. J. De Laney * * * shall carry on and conduct said business in a businesslike manner, and shall be allowed for his compensation as part of the necessary expenses thereof the sum of $150 per month and necessary traveling expenses during the existence of this trust. It is expressly agreed and understood that the principal present debts of said corporation shall be paid in the order and manner to be agreed upon by the principal creditors of said corporation; said principal creditors being the following named, to wit: Bank of Visalia, Fresno Agricultural Works, O. R. Cross & Company, Central Lumber Company, G. M. Perine, C. A. Canfield, and A. J. De Laney. And, in case said creditors do not agree within 10 days after said creditors shall have been notified of this trust, then said A. J. De Laney shall determine the order and manner of the payment of such debts. * * * And it is further agreed and understood that said A. J. De Laney shall not sell or have the power to sell any of said real property or any of said personal property constituting the plant necessary to carry on and conduct said sawmill and lumber business without the consent of said Dillonwood Company. And it is further agreed and understood that said A. J. De Laney, as such trustee, shall carry on and conduct said sawmill and lumber business as herein provided in the name of the said Dillonwood Lumber Company, by said A. J. De Laney, trustee." Within ten days after the execution of said trust agreement, the principal creditors, with the exception of G. M. Perine, entered into the written agreement provided for under said trust, whereby they agreed that the indebtedness due to each of them should be paid pro rata, except that the claim of G. M. Perine for $3,000 and interest and the claim of A. J. De Laney for $4,200 and interest should be paid in preference to the claims of said parties entering into said trust agreement; and said parties in writing ratified and accepted said agreement of trust. The defendant G. M. Perine had at all times full knowledge of the execution of the trust agreement, assented thereto, and agreed to the terms and conditions thereof. This trust agreement, although executed on June 19, 1901, was not recorded till September 3, 1901; but from the time of its execution up to the commencement of the action said De Laney acted as trustee under its provisions.

The Dillonwood Lumber Company was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling lumber in Tulare county during the years 1890 and 1891, operated a sawmill for that purpose and was the owner of a large amount of real and personal property used in connection with its business. This was all transferred to A. J. De Laney, as trustee, for the purposes of the trust. Prior to the trial of the cause, by stipulation entered into by the parties to the action, all of the property of the corporation referred to in the trust conveyance was sold by order of the court and the proceeds placed under its control, to be distributed in favor of the parties to the action found entitled thereto. These parties (a large number, and all creditors of the corporation) embraced mainly persons who had performed labor or furnished supplies for the corporation before or during the time De Laney was trustee, together with the principal creditors specially mentioned in the trust agreement and the creditors' agreement entered into subsequent thereto. In ultimately disposing of the cause, it was found that the fund derived from the sale of the corporate property would be inadequate to pay all the allowed claims of the creditors, and the court determined that certain of them were entitled to preferential payments. It was found that some of the plaintiffs had performed labor for the corporation within 60 days prior to the assignment of the property to De Laney as trustee, and as to them decreed that they were entitled, under the provisions of section 1204 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to first preferential payment. It was also found that, while the defendant De Laney was operating the lumber mill of the corporation under the terms of the trust, certain other plaintiffs performed labor for or furnished necessary supplies to him as trustee, and decreed that they were entitled, under the terms of the trust agreement, to next preferential payment. As to the other plaintiffs, the court found that they were ordinary creditors, with no preferential rights. As to the defendant and appellant A. J. De Laney, De Laney asserted a preference in the case above all the other creditors for $4,200, the amount mentioned in the agreement entered into between himself and the principal creditors subsequent to the execution of the trust agreement. This the court denied, giving him preference only as against the other creditors who with himself had entered into such agreement giving him a preference over them. The effect of this was to deny him any participation in the fund which had then become exhausted by the prior preferences. De Laney made claim to other preferences, which were denied. The court also refused to allow him the full amount of compensation claimed as trustee, and, it is further claimed, failed to allow him other amounts to which he was entitled, on account of all of which matters he complains on this appeal, and they will be particularly considered presently. As to the defendant and appellant George M. Perine, the court found that De Laney, as trustee, had given a mortgage on the trust property to said Perine to secure an indebtedness due from the Dillonwood Lumber Company; that as to a portion of such indebtedness the court found Perine was not entitled to any preference under the trust agreement; and that De Laney had no authority to make the mortgage to secure it, and to that extent decreed such mortgage to be void. Perine complains of the findings and decree in this respect. As to the plaintiff and appellant the Holt Manufacturing Company, the court found against it as to a portion of its claim, and it appeals for that reason. All the appellants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and they appeal from the order of denial and from the judgment.

His principal contention is that the court should have decreed him a preference above all the other creditors to the extent of $4,200. He bases this right on the terms of the trust agreement, the principal creditors' agreement, and on the fact that this sum was furnished by him for the benefit of and to sustain the business of the Dillonwood Lumber Company between February 28, 1901, and June 19, 1901, when it is claimed he was acting as trustee for the corporation. Upon the latter proposition it is certain, from the evidence, that during the period named there was no trust existing for the benefit of creditors. The true situation in that respect was that about February 28, 1901, the stockholders of the corporation induced appellant to undertake the control of the corporate business to the extent of financing it and placing it on a profitable basis. For these services he was to be paid $150 per month, with certain other advantages to accrue to him if the enterprise was successful. There was nothing in the nature of this transaction which fixed upon him the capacity of trustee. He was simply the superintendent or business manager of the corporation, a position which the corporation and himself were pleased to designate as that of "trustee." There was in fact no trust to which the appellation could be applied. No property had been placed in his hands in trust for any purpose, and the Dillonwood Company continued to transact business in its own name until June 19th, when appellant, under the trust agreement of that date in question here, became trustee. Until June 19th he was not a trustee, either in fact or law, and the advances made by him to the corporation prior to that date, aggregating $4,200, were made while acting as agent or manager of the corporation, and for the futherance of its business.

Neither is there any merit in his claim that he was entitled to such preference under the trust agreement or the principal creditors' agreement. The trust agreement does not itself provide for any preference in his favor, except that there is given to the principal creditors mentioned in it the right to determine the order in which the principal debts shall be paid. The principal creditors so mentioned, including appellant, agreed upon an order which gave preference to appellant; but it was only an agreement as to the order in which their debts should be paid. Their action in this respect could not affect the laborers or persons furnishing supplies, or other creditors not participating in the transaction nor acquiescing in the agreement of the principal creditors. These latter had no authority to bind any one save themselves. It is not pretended that the laborers or supply men who were given preference by the court over appellant ever consented to or acquiesced in the trust agreement or this agreement of the principal creditors, or that they had any knowledge of their existence till their claims for labor and supplies had accrued and the mill closed down about August 29, 1901, at which date the corporation practically ceased doing business. They did not even have constructive notice of the trust agreement, as that was not recorded until September 3, 1901, several days after the mill closed down. Appellant's right to preference is to be measured by the terms of his agreement with the other principal creditors, and we cannot perceive how, under the law and the terms of the trust agreement itself, he was entitled to any preference for the payment of the $4,200 over the laborers and supply men. The law fixed the right of some of the plaintiffs to a preference as laborers, and the trust agreement fixed the rights of the other plaintiffs, who performed labor or furnished supplies to the appellant as trustee while conducting the business under the trust. It is quite clear that the Dillonwood Lumber Company, at the time of the assignment of its property to De Laney as trustee, was unable to pay its debts, and that the assignment to him as trustee was for the purpose of providing for their payment. This is apparent from the terms of the trust agreement itself, which, aside from investing the trustee with powers for that express purpose, and as evidencing in its general terms that that was the main and controlling purpose of the assignment, declares that, when the debts shall have been paid, the trustee shall reconvey the property to the corporation. And, if it were necessary to consider it as adding anything to what appears to be the express purpose of the trust agreement in that regard, the court found that the assignment was made with that particular object in view. It is provided by section 1204 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "in all assignments of property made by any person to trustees or assignees, or on account of the inability of the person at the time of the assignment to pay his debts * * * the wages of * * * laborers employed by such person or any other person who * * * performs work to the amount of one hundred dollars each, and for services rendered within sixty days previously, are preferred claims and must be paid by such trustees or assignees before any other creditor or creditors of the assignor." As the assignment of its property by the corporation to De Laney as trustee was for the purpose of providing for the payment of its debts, the court properly applied the provisions of this section in enforcing the claims of the creditors under the trust, so as to give preference, in an amount not exceeding $100, to the laborers who had performed labor for the corporation within 60 days prior to the assignment to appellant as trustee.

It is insisted that this provision only applies to insolvency proceedings, or to assignments for the benefit of creditors which are made as provided for in section 3449 et seq. of the Civil Code. No such limitation is placed on its application by the language of section 1204 itself. If it had been intended to apply only to particular classes of assignment, the Legislture would have so limited it in terms. But it did not. It is made applicable to "all assignments." It could apply to assignments other than such as follow proceedings in insolvency, or which are made for the benefit of creditors, as provided in section 3449, Civ. Code—for instance, to such assignments as the one we are now considering—and we see no reason for placing a limitation upon the general language of the section which would exclude the latter class.

As to the next preference made by the court in favor of persons performing labor for or furnishing supplies to the trustee under the trust. It is not questioned but that they were necessary running expenses of the business, entailed while it was being managed under the trust agreement, and, this being so, it only needs further to be said that their payment preferable to the claims of general creditors, including that of appellant, is expressly provided for by the trust agreement itself.

It is next insisted by appellant that the court should have allowed him as a preference his claim for salary for the period between February 28, 1901, and June 19, 1901, during which period he claims he was acting as trustee. But, as we have seen, appellant was not trustee during that period. This salary for which he claims he should have had a preference was the compensation agreed on between the corporation and himself to be paid monthly for his services as manager of the business. The court allowed his claim for it, and gave him judgment therefor, but without preference. This was proper. He was only a general creditor as to this claim.

He insists, also, that the court should have allowed him $150 as his salary under the trust agreement from June 19, 1901, till the rendition of the decree in the lower court. The court did allow him as a preferred claim compensation at the rate fixed in the trust agreement from June 19, 1901, till October 1, 1901. The mill closed down in the latter part of August, 1901, and the allowances made included salary for more than a month after that time. It does not appear from the record when this action was commenced; but it is asserted in respondents' brief to have been commenced October 8, 1901, and this date is not questioned in the reply briefs of any of the appellants. The trust agreement provided for the payment of $150 per month to conduct the business. The business as a going concern had ceased in August, and after October 1, 1901, the record does not show anything to have been done by appellant which would warrant us in saying that the allowance as rendered was not all he was entitled to.

Another point urged by appellant is that the court failed to allow him at all certain amounts which he claims it was conceded by all parties he was entitled to. Aside from the amounts which the court allowed appellant as preferred claims and the nature of which is clear from the record, the court allowed him, jointly with other creditors, subsequent preferences in two amounts, $727 and $294, and a general judgment for an additional $6,637.45. It is not clear what the items composing these several amounts consisted of. It was stipulated upon the trial that defendant had paid out, for hay bought of J. T. McCutcheon for use in the business subsequent to June 19, 1901, the sum of $196, and that he had paid judgments for labor performed in the business subsequent to the same date amounting to $368.75. He was entitled to allowance for these amounts, and contends that he did not receive them. We cannot say, however, from the record, that they were not allowed him. They may have been allowed, and proper preference not given; but even this latter point cannot be determined from the record. The entire matter is one which the record does not clearly present, or the suggestions of counsel upon either side satisfactorily enlighten us about. Of course, appellant should have all that it was conceded he was entitled to; but the presumption is that the court allowed it to him, and, if he did not obtain it, it was incumbent on him to present on this appeal a record which would show that such allowance was in fact not made. We cannot say that these items which he insists he was not allowed were not embraced in the amounts for which allowance was made. If that were not so, it was the business of appellant to show that fact from the record, and this he has not done.

These are the only matters relative to De Laney's appeal which, we think, call for discussion. He asserts that other alleged errors were committed by the court in determining the amounts which he was entitled to be allowed in his capacity as trustee, but we think that the conclusion the court reached disallowing them was correct.

As to the appeal of George M. Perine:

This appellant makes a preliminary attack upon the pleadings, questioning the right of the plaintiffs to maintain this action and the sufficiency of the complaint as stating a cause of action. He is the only appellant in the case who does this. No demurrer to the complaint was filed or objection raised on the trial to the admission of evidence under it by any of the parties. These objections are now for the first time urged. We will not discuss their merits, because we think that, as far as any attack on the pleadings is concerned, all parties are precluded from doing so by their stipulation, under which they authorized the court to make a sale of the property of the corporation and provided for the disposition to be made of the proceeds. It is found by the court that all the parties to the action had, pending the trial of the case, stipulated that the court might order all the property mentioned in the trust agreement and involved in the action to be sold; that the court had made such order, and now had the proceeds from the sale under its control; that it had been further "stipulated and agreed between all the parties to this action that there should first be paid out of said amount the sum of $2,313.53 to N. P. Dillon, * * * and that the remainder of said amount remaining in the hands of the clerk be distributed among the parties entitled thereto." We think that under this stipulation appellant cannot now be heard to urge the objections he presents. Such a stipulation, conferring power upon the court to sell the trust property, directing the payment of a fixed sum to a designated creditor, and providing for the distribution of the remainder among the parties to the action entitled thereto, could only be entered into on the theory that the parties signing it were properly in court under pleadings sufficient to authorize the court to determine their respective claims. This is obviously the theory upon which the stipulation was signed, and the effect of it upon appellant is that by entering into it he then waived the objections which he now endeavors to interpose on appeal.

As to the other points made by this appellant:

At the time of the execution of the trust agreement of June 19, 1901, the Dillonwood Lumber Company was, and for some time prior thereto had been, indebted to appellant for money loaned it in the sum of $3,000. This was the amount referred to in the principal creditors' agreement, to which we have heretofore referred as executed subsequent to the trust agreement, and in the creditors' agreement it is provided that appellant be given a preference, together with De Laney, before the other principal creditors as to the payment of their debts. Subsequent to the execution of these agreements De Laney, as trustee, applied to appellant for a loan of $3,000. Appellant agreed to advance this amount, provided De Laney, as trustee, should execute a chattel mortgage upon the property of the corporation, which he had in trust, to secure the payment of the $3,000 mentioned in the principal creditors' agreement, which the corporation then owed him, together with the $3,000 to be advanced. De Laney agreed to do this, and on August 14, 1901, appellant advanced the additional $3,000. Through some delay the promised chattel mortgage was not executed until August 29, 1901, nor recorded until September 3, 1901. Subsequently De Laney paid off a portion of this latter advance, leaving due thereon $2,059.99. The court found as to this latter amount that under the trust agreement De Laney was authorized to execute the chattel mortgage to secure its payment, and that, the property mortgaged having been sold under order of court, appellant was entitled to a preferential payment of that amount subsequent to the payment of the labor claims and claims for supplies heretofore referred to in considering De Laney's appeal. As far as the mortgage purported to secure the payment of the $3,000 indebtedness existing on July 19, 1901, when the trustee agreement was executed, and which is referred to in the principal creditors' agreement, the court held that De Laney had no power or authority under the trust agreement to execute it, that it was void to that extent, and that he was not entitled to preference to such amount by reason of it.

It is insisted by appellant that the trust agreement of June 19, 1901, fully empowered De Laney, as trustee, to mortgage the property of the company, not only for the sum advanced August 14, 1901, but also for the principal indebtedness existing when the trust agreement was executed, and that appellant was a preferred creditor under the mortgage for the full amount, and that none of the plaintiffs—laborers or supply men—were entitled to preference over him. In this regard he claims that the trust agreement created two separate and distinct trusts, and divided the assets of the corporation into two separate and distinct classes; that the first trust embraced the proceeds of the business—the manufacture and sale of lumber—as carried on by its trustee, and from these alone the claims for labor and necessary supplies could be paid; that the second trust embraced the property constituting the plant of the company necessary to carry on the milling business, and was by the terms of the trust agreement appropriated to the payment of the indebtedness of the company then shown on its books; that as the mortgage to appellant was on the plant of the corporation, which was not charged with a trust in favor of the laborers and supply men, the proceeds of its sale under order of the court should have been devoted to paying all the indebtedness of appellant which it secured; and that no portion of it should have been applied, in preference to his claim, to the payments of the claims of laborers and supply men, which, under the first provision of the trust agreement, he contends, could only be paid from the proceeds of the business itself. This point, while equally available under a similar construction of the trust agreement to the appellant De Laney as to his claim to preferred payment to the extent of $4,200, was not specially made by him. We mention this, not as affecting the merits of the claim as now urged by this appellant, Perine, but as a reason why no discussion of it is made in disposing of De Laney's appeal. We do not, however, think that the trust agreement bears this construction. It does not speak of the business of manufacturing and selling lumber, or of any proceeds thereof to be devoted solely or at all to payment of expenses. It speaks of the sawmill and lumber business of the corporation. This embraced all that pertained to such business —timber lands, plant, and everything else used in connection with it—and in the assignment of its property to the trustee the property is referred to as all the property "used by it in its sawmill and lumber business." It was the general business in which the company was engaged which was conveyed to the trustee, with power to conduct and carry it on, and it was "from said business" that the running expenses and other necessary expenses were to be first paid. These would ordinarily be paid from the usual product of such business—manufacturing lumber; but there is nothing in the trust agreement which confines their payment to proceeds derived from such a source. It is obvious that the corporation transferred all its property, which comprehensively constituted a sawmill and lumber business, to the trustee to pay the general creditors of the corporation. This the trustee could do, if possible, from the actual manufacturing and sale of lumber, or by a sale of the "real estate or * * * the personal property constituting the plant necessary to carry on and conduct said sawmill and lumber business" with the consent of the corporation, or he could mortgage all said property without such consent to carry on and conduct the business, or to pay the indebtedness to the general creditors. These powers conferred had reference to the business of the corporation generally as including all the property used in connection with it in the manufacture and sale of lumber, and not to the actual manufacture and sale itself, and it was the running expenses and other necessary expenses entailed in the general conduct of such sawmill and lumber business which the trust agreement provided should be paid first; and no particular fund or source of payment was designated for that purpose in the trust agreement. Appellant's contention that separate and distinct trusts were created is based principally upon the use of the word "business" in the clause referring to preferential payment of expenses and the use of the word "property" in the clause referring to payment of the general creditors. We think, however, that no importance is to be attached to the use of these terms. Taking the general context of the trust agreement into consideration, it is evident that the words are used as of interchangeable meaning. As to the mortgage itself, as far as it undertook to secure the payment of the indebtedness of $3,000 existing at the time the trust agreement was executed, little need be said. The authority of the trustee to make it must be found in the trust agreement itself, and no such power is conferred by that instrument. Authority is given to mortgage for the purpose of conducting the business and to pay indebtedness then existing. He had no power to mortgage to secure such indebtedness, and this was the only purpose of the mortgage. The trust agreement did not provide for securing by mortgage one creditor in preference to another, and the effect of the execution of the mortgage in favor of this appellant, particularly complained of by the respondents—labor and supply men—is that it undertook, against the express terms of the trust agreement, to give appellant a preference over them. The trust agreement itself provided for all the preference that should be given. No authority was conferred on the trustee to create a preference in favor of appellant by executing a mortgage securing this indebtedness, and the attempt to do so was to that extent void, and the mortgage created no lien for this sum in appellant's favor.

This disposes of what we deem to be the principal points made by this appellant. Additional grounds are urged for a reversal. Some of these are disposed of in considering the appeal of De Laney. Certain of the plaintiffs were stockholders of the Dillonwood Lumber Company, and were given a preference as laborers over the mortgage of appellant, and he complains that he was not given preference over them. The pleadings, however, did not warrant this preference in his favor. If he desired any relief against these stockholders, he should have asserted it by cross-complaint, under which the liability of these stockholders and appellant's rights against them could have been determined. This he did not do. The other points urged by appellant have, in our opinion, no merit.

As to the appeal of the Holt Manufacturing Company:

This appellant is one of the plaintiffs, and alleged in the complaint that the Dillonwood Lumber Company and De Laney, as trustee, became indebted to it for certain merchandise sold and delivered to them at their request (for which judgment was ultimately given by the lower court), "and the further sum of $1,100 for the use of a traction engine used by said Dillonwood Lumber Company and said A. J. De Laney as trustee." The court found that neither of the defendants entered into any agreement to pay appellant $1 per 1,000 feet of lumber hauled, or any other sum, for the use of a traction engine. It is insisted that this finding does not respond to the issue, as it is not a finding that the defendants did not use the engine in their business, or that appellant was not entitled to compensation for its use. An examination of the bill of exceptions accompanying this appeal shows that the case of this appellant was tried on the theory that the complaint alleged a contract between the parties for the payment by defendants of $1 per 1,000 feet for all lumber hauled by said engine. There was no allegation in the complaint of any indebtedness based upon the reasonable use of the engine, or any attempt made to prove it. The issue assumed to have been made under the pleadings and actually tried was that a contract, as we have stated it above, was made by the parties. As this was the issue actually tried, the finding of the court was responsive to it. The further point is made that the finding is contrary to the evidence. We have examined the evidence, and, in our judgment, it fully sustains the finding.

We discover no reason for disturbing the judgment or the orders appealed from, and they are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

147 Cal. 715

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1905.)

1. Waters and Water Courses—Public Lands—Irrigation Ditches.

Where defendants had acquired a right of way for an irrigation ditch across certain land, when it was unoccupied public land of the United States, as authorized by Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2339, 2340 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1437], they had no right by reason of such easement, after plaintiff acquired title to the land, without his consent to construct an additional ditch on a different line varying from 1 to 20 feet distant from the line of the old ditch.

2. Same—Injunction—Findings.

Where, in an action to restrain the construction of an additional drainage ditch across plaintiff's land, the court found that defendants, by virtue of their easement to maintain the original ditch, were not entitled to maintain the second ditch, located at some distance from the original and on a different line, such findings sufficiently disclosed the particulars in which plaintiff would be obstructed in his rights to the free use and possession of his land or injured in his property by the maintenance of such additional ditch.

3. Same—Right to Injunction.

An injunction will be granted to prohibit the continuance of action that obstructs a landowner in the free use and enjoyment of his land, irrespective of other damage, where such action, if continued, will ripen into an easement.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 27, Cent. Dig. Injunction, §§ 101, 102; vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Water and Water Courses, §§ 260, 261.]

4. Same—Pleading—Variance.

Where, in a suit to restrain the maintenance of an additional irrigation ditch, the only allegation in the complaint with reference thereto was that in the early part of the year 1900 defendants made and constructed the ditch complained of, the finding that about six rods of such new ditch was constructed in 1896 was not objectionable, as without the issues; the variance being immaterial, within Code Civ. Proc. § 470, declaring that, where the variance is not material, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, etc.

5. Trial—Findings of Court—Failure to Make.

It was not error for the court to fail to find on certain issues tendered by defendant's answers, where, so far as the allegations were material, they were covered by the findings made.

6. Pleading—Amendment—Time for Application—Statutes.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1054, providing that, when an act to be done as provided in the Code relates to the pleadings in the action, the time allowed by the Code may be extended on good cause shown, but such extension shall not exceed 30 days without the consent of the adverse party, applies only to cases where time is allowed by some provision of the Code, and does not apply to an application for an extension of time to amend a complaint.

7. Same—Extension of Time.

Where time was given to amend a complaint, the court had jurisdiction before the expiration of the time so given to grant successive orders extending the time.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by W. A. Vestal against Charles Young and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. M. Boardman, Boardman & Boyd, and T. B. Dozier, for appellants. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment enjoining them from using or maintaining a certain ditch constructed by them upon and across certain land of plaintiff in Lassen county, from carrying or conducting water across said land by means of said ditch, and from entering upon said land for the purpose of repairing said ditch, and also awarding plaintiff $5 damages and his costs. The facts of the case, as shown by the findings of the court, are very simple. Plaintiff acquired his land by patent from the United States on April 18, 1883, and has ever since owned and possessed the same. While this land was still unoccupied land of the government, viz., about the year 1865, the defendants or their grantors constructed across this land a flume ranging from 2 to 3 feet in width and about 16 inches in depth, and diverted water from Pitt river into said flume, and by means thereof conducted the water across this land to their own adjoining lands, where they used it for a beneficial purpose. This use of the flume by defendants was continous from the year 1865 to the year 1896, and there is no question in the case as to the right of defendants to continue such use and exercise and enjoy all the incidents thereof. In the year 1896 defendants, without plaintiff's consent, constructed on plaintiff's land about 6 rods of ditch on a line different from, and from 1 to 20 feet distant from, the flume line. In the year 1900 defendants, without plaintiff's consent, extended the 6 rods of ditch to a ditch 4 feet in width and 3 feet in depth, extending across the northern portion of plaintiff's land for about one-fourth of a mile on a line distant from 1 to 20 feet from the flume line, but extending in the same general direction. Ever since then defendants have carried their water across plaintiff's land by means of said ditch, and threaten to continue so to do, and have discontinued the use of their flume, with the exception of about 5 rods at the intake of the water from the river. The trial court found that "by reason of such acts and threatened acts of defendants the plaintiff is and will be obstructed in his rights to the free use and possession of his said lands, to which he is entitled as the owner in fee simple thereof, and that such acts of defendants will, if continued, ripen into an easement." This action was commenced September 26, 1900.

1. There can be no doubt that the facts detailed above, shown by the findings, fully sustain the judgment as to the injunction. The right of defendants in regard to plaintiff's land, whatever its source, was simply to continue the use thereof they were enjoying at the time he acquired the land. They were then maintaining a flume across the same for the purpose of carrying the water, which, it may be assumed, they had lawfully appropriated, and for which they consequently had a right of way over the land, under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 26, 1866. 14 Stat. 253, c. 262; Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2339, 2340 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1437]. This right of way had at the time plaintiff acquired his land been definitely fixed and located along a certain line, and the method of use thereof, viz., a flume, apparently finally adopted. For many years after the acquirement by plaintiff of his land, the use along this line and in this manner was continued and acquiesced in by all the parties.

We need not here discuss the question as to whether defendants might lawfully have constructed a ditch of the same size as their flume along their flume line. See, however, Allen v. San Jose Land & Water Co., 92 Cal. 138, 28 Pac. 215, 15 L. R. A. 93; Barrows v. Fox, 98 Cal. 63, 66, 32 Pac. 811. They constructed this ditch upon another line, and for this purpose they appropriated to their use different land of plaintiff. The precise location of the right of way had been as definitely and finally fixed by the acts of the defendants as it would have been had the metes and bounds been set forth in an instrument of grant. See 14 Cyc. pp. 1161, 1205. Defendants had acquired the right to that precise location and no other. The remainder of plaintiff's land was his, free from any right of defendants. We know of no principle of law that would warrant defendants in subjecting, without his consent, another and different portion of his land to their use, even although they abandoned their former location. It is elementary that the location of an easement of this character cannot be changed by either party without the other's consent after it has once been finally established, whether by the express terms of a grant or by acts of the parties tantamount in their effect. See Jagui v. Johnson, 27 N. J. Eq. 526, 552. The granting of a right over one portion of a person's land gives the grantee no right over any other portion. Where such a grantee attempts to exercise his right over some other portion by subjecting such portion to his use without the consent of the owner, he deprives the owner of the free use and possession thereof, and his acts, if continued the requisite time, will ripen into an easement, and the owner will be permanently deprived of his property. That such a result injuriously affects the rights of the owner cannot well be questioned. As was said in Burris v. People's Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 248, 37 Pac. 922: "It is well settled that the owner of an easement cannot change its character, or materially increase the burden upon the servient estate, or injuriously affect the rights of other persons." It is entirely immaterial in this connection that the new line was only from 1 to 20 feet distant from the old line. It was upon property of plaintiff, over which defendants had no right whatever; and the principle is the same as if the new line had been hundreds of feet away from the old one.

It is suggested that the trial court did not find in what particulars the plaintiff will be obstructed in his rights to the free use and possession of his land, or injured in his property, by the maintenance of the ditch. The facts found and detailed above sufficiently show this. By the maintenance and use of the ditch plaintiff is deprived of the free use and possession of his real property without right, and will be permanently deprived thereof, if such maintenance and use are continued. This alone is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief by injunction granted. It is the settled law of this state that, irrespective of other damage, an injunction will be granted to prohibit the continuance of action that obstructs one in the free use and enjoyment of his land, where such action, if continued, will ripen into an easement. See Ewing v. Mott, 90 Cal. 231, 237, 27 Pac. 194; Walker v. Emerson, 89 Cal. 456, 458, 26 Pac. 968; Moore v. Clear Lake W. W., 68 Cal. 146, 150, 8 Pac. 816; Conkling v. Pac. Imp. Co., 87 Cal. 296, 305, 25 Pac. 399; Henne v. Lankershim (Cal.) 79 Pac. 591.

2. It is contended that the findings are without the issues, in so far as it is found that a portion of this ditch, viz., about 6 rods, was constructed in the year 1896; the only suggestion of the complaint in this regard being that "in the early part of the year 1900 * * * defendants * * * made and constructed" the ditch complained of. The variance as to the small portion of ditch constructed in 1896 was immaterial, and the court properly found according to the evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

3. Complaint is made that the court failed to find upon certain issues tendered by defendants' answers. In so far as the allegations are material here, they appear to be covered by the findings heretofore stated.

4. What has already been said disposes of the contention that the demurrers to the amended complaint should have been sustained. The allegations of such complaint as to the invasion of plaintiff's rights and the effect thereof were substantially the same as the findings of the court in regard thereto.

5. It is contended that two motions to dismiss the action, made by defendants prior to the filing of their answer, should have been granted. The first motion was made prior to the filing of the amended complaint, and the second thereafter. Both motions were made upon substantially similar grounds, and were based upon the same facts. The original complaint was filed September 26, 1900. A demurrer thereto was served and filed November 9, 1900. On December 21, 1900, according to the original minute entry: "Counsel for plaintiff confesses demurrer, and asks that he be given 30 days' time in which to amend complaint. Counsel for defendants consents to said request. Whereupon the court orders that counsel for plaintiff be, and he is hereby, given 30 days in which to amend complaint in said action." Within the life of this order the judge made another order granting plaintiff 30 days' further time within which to serve and file his amended complaint. Within that time, to wit, on February 20, 1901, the judge made another order granting an additional 30 days. The amended complaint was filed on March 21, 1901. The first motion was made March 9, 1901, the ground thereof being that under section 1054, Code Civ. Proc., the judge had no authority to extend the time in which to file an amended complaint beyond 30 days; that his second and third orders were consequently void; that defendant, having failed to amend within the first 30 days, was in default; and that the action must therefore be dismissed. The second motion was on the further stated ground that plaintiff had failed to prosecute his action. There was some dispute as to whether the minutes correctly stated the proceedings, and the court ordered the same corrected, so as to leave out the statement that plaintiff confessed the demurrer, and to show simply that plaintiff had asked leave to file an amended complaint within 30 days, which request was granted.

We deem it entirely immaterial whether the original minute entry was or was not correct in this respect. We know of no statutory provision limiting the power of the trial court as to the time that may be given to a plaintiff to serve and file an amended complaint. Section 1054, Code Civ. Proc., relied upon by defendants, has no application. That section is limited by its terms to cases where time is allowed by some provision of that Code for the doing of some act, and was designed to enable the court or judge to grant additional time to that allowed by the Code, upon good cause shown. In granting the power to so extend the time allowed by the Code, it was thought proper to limit it to 30 days. But the time within which one may file an amended complaint, when permitted by the court so to do, is not specified by any provision of law, and is a matter resting entirely within the discretion of the court. Where there is any abuse of this discretion, probably a remedy would be found on appeal; but, in the absence of a statutory provision forbidding it, we cannot hold that a court is without power to grant more than 30 days for the filing of an amended complaint. The second and third orders extending the time were not, therefore, void. Nor can we see that there was any prejudicial error in the granting of such orders. The motion for dismissal on the ground of want of prosecution was addressed to the discretion of the court, and there was no error in denying the same.

These are the only points requiring notice on this appeal. The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1905.)

1. Appeal — Order Denying New Trial — Scope of Review.

Alleged error in the denial of a motion to dismiss the action before trial, in the overruling of a demurrer to the amended complaint, that the findings of the court were without the issues, and that the findings did not support the judgment, was available only on appeal from the judgment, and could not be considered on an appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. Waters and Water Courses—Easements —Irrigation Ditch—Change of Location —Injunction.

Where, after defendants had acquired an easement over plaintiff's land for an irrigation ditch, they commenced the construction of another ditch some distance from the original one, it was immaterial to plaintiff's right to restrain such acts that the land taken from such additional ditch had no appreciable value.

3. SAME—PUPLIC LANDS—ACQUISITION SUBJECT TO EASEMENT—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

That defendants acquired a right of way over public unoccupied land for an irrigation ditch did not entitle them, as against one acquiring the land from the government subject to their easement, to change the location of such ditch on the land; the purchaser from the government having taken the land subject only to the right of way as it existed at the time of his purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, §§ 20, 261.]

4. EVIDENCE—SIMILAR FACTS.

In a suit to restrain defendants from changing the location of an irrigation ditch over plaintiff's land, which defendants had an easement to maintain, evidence in respect to the construction of defendant's ditch on the land of another was immaterial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelly, Judge.

Action by W. A. Vestal against Chas. Young and others. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

W. M. Boardman and T. B. Dozier, for appellants. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendants from an order denying their motion for a new trial in the same action in which the judgment has been this day affirmed. Vestal v. Young et al. (Sac. 1,134) 82 Pac. 381. Several of the points made upon this appeal, viz.: (1) The motion to dismiss the action made before the trial should have been granted; (2) the demurrer to the amended complaint should have been sustained; (3) the findings of the court are without the issues made by the pleadings; and (4) the findings do not support the judgment—were available only on the appeal from the judgment, and cannot be considered on the appeal from the order denying a new trial. They were, in fact, considered and disposed of on the appeal from the judgment.

1. It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support certain findings of the court, but a careful consideration thereof discloses no particular wherein it was insufficient to support the findings substantially stated in the opinion on the appeal from the judgment; and, as there shown, the findings warranted the judgment. Much reliance appears to be placed upon the fact that it was not shown that there was any appreciable value to the land appropriated for the ditch. This is entirely immaterial. It was plaintiff's land, however poor it might be, and the fact that it apparently has no great present value will not justify one who has no legal right thereto in appropriating the same. Plaintiff has the right to use it for any purpose that he may see fit, and anything that deprives him of the free and unobstructed use thereof is an invasion of his rights, against which the law will protect him. Here an injunction against the maintenance of the ditch by defendants is the only adequate means of preventing the acquirement by prescription by defendants of an absolute right to the use of said land for their purposes. There was sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that the ditch was constructed upon an entirely different line from that occupied by the flume, and from 1 to 20 feet distant therefrom. It cannot be successfully contended that this was not a material difference. It subjected to defendants' use land of plaintiff that was not properly subject thereto. There can, of course, be nothing in the contention that, because defendants acquired their right of way over public unoccupied lands of the United States, they have the right, as against one acquiring the land from the government subject to their easement, to change the location thereof upon his land. He took his land subject only to the right of way as thus located. See McGuire v. Brown, 106 Cal. 660, 39 Pac. 1060.

2. Certain errors are alleged in regard to the admission of evidence over the objection of defendants. The evidence so admitted was of such a nature that, if it be assumed that the trial court erred in each ruling assigned, it still remains that the conclusion of the court upon the issues material to the judgment could not have been affected by the evidence. The court did not err in refusing to admit testimony on the part of defendants in respect to the construction of their ditch on the land of Bolar. What defendants had done on other land than that of plaintiff could not affect the determination of the issues between plaintiff and defendants.

3. What has already been said here and in the opinion on the appeal from the judgment disposes of all points made under the contention that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted.

(147 Cal. 725)

SMITH et al. v. GOETHE et al. (Sac. 1,376.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1905.)

1. TRUSTS — RESULTING TRUSTS — PURCHASE BY LENDER WITH MONEY LENT.

Where an administrator, having mortgaged certain property jointly with his intestate to secure their joint debt, thereafter negotiated a loan on a mortgage of the same property and other property belonging to the estate for the purpose of paying his individual indebtedness and also that of the estate, the money so loaned became in equity the property of the borrower, and its subsequent use by the lender to purchase the joint mortgage was in legal effect a purchase of the mortgage for the borrower, so far as it affected the property of the estate.

2. ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—RANK.

The administrator, under such circumstances, was entitled to use such mortgage for the purpose of fixing the rank of the mortgage debt as a claim against the estate, and to secure him against subsequent liens on the property of the estate, if any, and to hold it as a mortgage upon the property of the estate to the extent of the moneys advanced by him on behalf of the estate in making the purchase.

3. SAME—ADVANCEMENTS BY ADMINISTRATOR.

Where an administrator had no funds on hand, and was not chargeable with any funds of the estate whatever, no duty rested on him to advance money to the estate or to purchase claims against it and discharge them.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Where intestate was jointly liable with his administrator for a debt secured by their joint mortgage, which was thereafter purchased with the proceeds of a loan made to the administrator on property belonging to him and to the estate by the lender, the latter would be regarded as the agent of the administrator in his individual capacity in purchasing the mortgage, and as such could acquire no rights superior to those which would have accrued to him had he attempted to have made such purchase as against the estate, and hence the estate was not deprived of its right to redeem by a foreclosure of such mortgage by the purchaser.

5. TRUST—MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE — JUDGMENTS—ESTOPPEL.

Where an involuntary trustee has acquired the apparent legal title to the property of the beneficiary under a mortgage foreclosure sale, such judgment and sale will not estop the beneficiary from establishing the trust.

6. ADMINISTRATORS—RENTS AND PROFITS—APPLICATION TO DEBTS.

Where an administrator acquired title to certain property belonging to the estate, subject to certain liens, it was his duty as administrator to apply the rents accruing from the property of the estate on its debts.

7. LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—REDEMPTION — INTERLOCUTORY JUDGMENT.

In a suit to redeem certain property from liens and for an accounting, it was not essential that an interlocutory decree should be rendered from which an appeal could be taken as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as such section only gives the right of appeal from such decree when one is made.

8. TRUSTS—ESTABLISHMENT—DECREE.

Where an administrator mortgaged separate parcels of real estate, some belonging to himself personally and others belonging to the estate, it was the duty of the court, in an action to establish a voluntary trust as to those parcels belonging to the estate and to compel a conveyance on payment of the liens which had been satisfied by defendant, to determine the amount necessary to redeem each separate parcel.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by S. B. Smith, as administrator of the estate of Ann Thomas, deceased, and others, against H. J. Goethe and others. From a judgment in favor of the estate, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied October 16, 1905.

Devlin & Devlin, for appellants. A. L. Shinn and P. S. Driver (White & Miller, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment in favor of the estate of Ann Thomas and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The present plaintiffs are the administrators representing the estates of Ann Thomas and Frank Thomas, respectively. The action was begun by Frank Thomas, in his own behalf and as administrator of the estate of Ann Thomas, then deceased. Frank Thomas died after the judgment appealed from was entered, and his successor and personal representative have been substituted as plaintiffs. Judgment was given in favor of the defendants against Frank Thomas, and in favor of the estate of Ann Thomas against the defendants. No appeal has been taken by Frank Thomas, or his representative, from the judgment against him, and the rights of the estate of Ann Thomas, as against the defendants, are alone concerned.

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and the sufficiency of the facts stated to give a cause of action in favor of the estate of Ann Thomas is the first question presented for our consideration. The facts alleged are in substance as follows: Ann Thomas died on April 25, 1895, the owner of the south 45 feet of lot 8 of a certain block in Sacramento, which for convenience is designated as "parcel 5," and of the undivided one-half, as joint owner with Frank Thomas, of four other parcels in the same block, situated in lots 1 and 8, and for convenience designated as "parcels 1, 2, 3, and 4." Prior to her death she and Frank Thomas had jointly executed a deed of trust to certain parcels to secure a debt of $2,000 due to the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank and a mortgage to one Cadwallader of $3,400. It is alleged that the deed and mortgage each included all of the five parcels of land. Frank Thomas and Maggie Thomas were the sole heirs at law of Ann Thomas. Soon after her death Frank Thomas was appointed administrator of her estate, and continued to act as such thereafter during all of the transactions involved in the case. He became personally indebted to other parties, and to secure his personal debts he thereafter executed mortgages upon his interest in all of the said five parcels of land, and included therein two other parcels owned by him in another block in the city; but, as his rights are not concerned, it is unnecessary to refer to these parcels further. On April 5, 1900, for the purpose of discharging part of the indebtedness of himself and the estate of Ann Thomas, Frank Thomas borrowed from Curtis, Carmichael & Brand, a corporation, the sum of $8,400, and as security therefor executed to Brand, as trustee for said corporation, a deed absolute in form to all his interest in the said seven parcels of land, and at the same time and as part of the same transaction executed a written contract with Carmichael, who was acting in behalf of and for said corporation, so far as his duty under the contract was concerned. This contract in legal effect provided that Carmichael should act as agent for Thomas to lease or rent all of the interest of Frank Thomas in all of said real property, collect the rents accruing thereon, insure the improvements, and apply said rents, first, to paying his commissions for making the loan, and as agent in collecting such rents; second, to pay the insurance premiums; third, to pay the interest or principal of the prior mortgages on the property aforesaid; fourth and fifth, to pay repairs and taxes and other paramount liens; sixth, to pay interest on the loan of $8,400; and that the contract of agency should continue until all indebtedness to the corporation was discharged. Thereupon Frank Thomas delivered to said Carmichael corporation the possession and control of all the above-mentioned real estate, including that of the estate of Ann Thomas, as well as his own, for the purpose of collecting the rents and applying the same to the payment and satisfaction of the said debts of the estate and of Frank Thomas; and thereafter that corporation and the H. J. Goethe Company, its successor, continued to control and manage all of said property, and to collect the rents thereof, under and in pursuance of the agreement aforesaid. The $8,400 loaned to Frank Thomas was apparently not delivered to him. It is alleged that it was used by the Carmichael corporation in the purchase of liens against the property aforesaid, including the mortgage to Cadwallader (alleged to cover parcels 1 to 5, inclusive), and that assignments of said liens were taken to Carmichael, as agent for his corporation, as security for the said sum of $8,400. The H. J. Goethe Company subsequently became the owner of other liens on the property, the amounts whereof were unknown to plaintiff. Carmichael, in his own name, sued to foreclose the Cadwallader mortgage, joining as defendants to the action Frank Thomas, individually and as administrator of the Ann Thomas estate, and the H. J. Goethe Company. On October 25, 1901, while the foreclosure suit was pending, the Carmichael corporation sold and transferred to the H. J. Goethe Company the mortgage to Cadwallader, the $8,400 mortgage of Frank Thomas, and all its other claims and demands against Frank Thomas, for $9,500, and agreed that the H. J. Goethe Company should thereafter be entitled to all rents due or collectible from the property covered by the mortgages. Judgment of foreclosure of the Cadwallader mortgage was obtained in the name of Carmichael for the corporation after this agreement and transfer to the H. J. Goethe Company, and the judgment was thereupon assigned to the H. J. Goethe Company in fulfillment of the agreement to transfer. From and after October 25, 1901, the H. J. Goethe Company collected the rents of said property and applied the same to its own use. That company had full notice of all the rights of the estate of Ann Thomas at the time it made the agreement with and purchase from the Carmichael corporation. On November 14, 1901, the trustees named in the trust deed aforesaid, in execution of the trust, sold parcels 3, 4, and 5 of the real estate, including the interest of Frank Thomas therein, as well as that of the estate, to the H. J. Goethe Company for $2,157.74; said company being at the time in the control and management thereof, pursuant to the transfer of October 25, 1901, made by the Carmichael corporation. On December 7, 1901, on foreclosure sale under the judgment foreclosing the Cadwallader mortgage, parcels 1 to 5, inclusive, of the real estate, were sold to the H. J. Goethe Company. It is then averred that "by virtue of" the mortgages and liens held by the H. J. Goethe Company, and of the "money advanced by said company in purchasing" parcels 3, 4, and 5 at the trustee's sale, the estate of Ann Thomas became indebted to said company in an amount to plaintiffs unknown, which was wholly unpaid; that plaintiffs had made due effort to settle with the said company and redeem the said property from the mortgages, liens, and obligations against it held by said company, but that said company claimed to own the said property in fee and denied the plaintiffs' right to redeem; and that plaintiffs are able and willing, and offer, to pay to said company all moneys due it upon such redemption. The prayer is for an accounting of the rents and profits received by the H. J. Goethe Company, for a determination of the amount owing by plaintiffs to that company, for a conveyance of the property by that company to the estate, upon payment of the amount due, and for general relief. We have stated the averments of the complaint according to their legal effect, and have treated a statement of an act by or transfer to an agent as if it were alleged to have been done or received by the principal.

The purpose of the action obviously is to charge the defendants as involuntary trustees of the estate of Ann Thomas, deceased, with respect to the interest of the estate in the real property, to ascertain the amounts for which as such trustees the defendants have a lien or charge upon such interest, and to obtain a reconveyance upon payment thereof. There are no allegations that there was any fraudulent intent or bad faith towards the plaintiffs on the part of either of the defendants, and the case must be considered as free from that element. The defendants are purchasers with notice, and consequently have only such rights against the estate as the Carmichael corporation would have had if there had been no transfer by it to the defendant corporation. The $8,400 which the Carmichael corporation loaned to Frank Thomas became in equity the property of Thomas as soon as it was thus loaned. Its subsequent use by the Carmichael corporation to purchase the Cadwallader mortgage was in legal effect a purchase of that mortgage for Thomas, so far as it affected the property of the estate. The corporation could, by such purchase, acquire no greater rights against the estate than Frank Thomas would have had if he had purchased the property directly with his own funds. The mortgage was made jointly by himself and the deceased to secure their joint debt. His own land was bound for the moiety of the debt owing by the estate, and he was also personally bound therefor as joint debtor. Hence, with respect to the half which the estate ought to pay as between the two joint debtors, he was in the position of a surety for the estate, with his land mortgaged for its benefit. In such case he would have the right to use the mortgage for the purpose of fixing the rank of the mortgage debt as a claim against the estate, and as a protection against subsequent liens by other parties upon the property of the estate, if there were any, and, generally, to hold it as a mortgage upon the property of the estate to the extent of the moneys advanced by him on behalf of the estate in making the purchase. In other words, he would be entitled to subrogation, as against the estate, to the rights of Cadwallader, the mortgagee. 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 119. It is not claimed that he had on hand, or as administrator was chargeable with, any funds of the estate whatever. No duty rested on him, under such circumstances, to advance money to the estate, or to buy claims against it and discharge them. He could obtain no additional advantage for himself, as against the estate, by so doing, nor make the purchase operate to the disadvantage of the estate; but we perceive no reason why he should not be protected by allowing him the benefit of the debt and lien according to the status they had acquired prior to his purchase. But he would not be permitted, while acting as administrator, to bring an action against himself to foreclose a lien thus obtained, or cause it to be done in the name of an agent, and, after obtaining a decree of foreclosure and purchasing the property of the estate at the foreclosure sale, to thereafter hold such property as his own. He was a trustee of the property of the estate for the benefit of the creditors and heirs. A trustee "may not obtain any advantage over" the beneficiaries "by the slightest * * * adverse pressure of any kind." Civ. Code, § 2228. He "may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit, or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust, in any manner." Civ. Code, § 2229. Neither he nor his agent can take part in any transaction concerning properties in which he has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to the beneficiary, except by consent of the beneficiary, or order of the proper court. Civ. Code, § 2230. The trustee cannot enforce any claim against the trust property which he purchased after his appointment as trustee. Civ. Code, § 2263. The rule concerning such transactions is thus stated in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 3 (3d Ed.) § 1077: "As long as the confidential relation lasts the trustee or other fiduciary owes an undivided duty to his beneficiary, and cannot place himself in any other position which would subject him to conflicting duties, or expose him to the temptation of acting contrary to the best interests of his original cestui que trust. This prohibition operates irrespectively of the good faith or bad faith of such dealing. It is therefore a gross violation of his duty for any trustee or director, acting in his fiduciary capacity, to enter into any contract with himself connected with the trust or its management. Such a contract is voidable, and may be defeated or set aside at the suit of the beneficiary. * * * If, however, the trustee's act, in violation of this rule, is not done in bad faith, and the beneficiary has received any benefit therefrom, it cannot be avoided without a restoration to the trustee of what has been thus received." Further, the same author says: "Courts of equity have carefully refrained from defining the particular instances of fiduciary relations in such a manner that other and perhaps new cases might be excluded. It is settled by an overwhelming weight of authority that the principle extends to every possible case in which a fiduciary relation exists as a fact, in which there is confidence reposed on one side, and resulting superiority and influence on the other." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 956. The consequent application of these rules to the present case is that, if the administrator, Frank Thomas, had himself purchased the property of the estate at the foreclosure sale, whether decreed in a suit by the original mortgagee, Cadwallader, or in a suit as above set forth, he would not be allowed to claim title thereto adversely to the estate, but would stand charged in respect to the title as trustee of the estate, and would be compelled to reconvey it to the estate upon payment to him of the amount equitably due him from the estate on account of the joint debt. The Carmichael corporation, and Carmichael, its agent, in buying the mortgage with his money and foreclosing the same, must be regarded as the mere agents of Frank Thomas, and as such they could acquire no rights superior to those which would have accrued to him, had he attempted to do the same thing in person. Of course, he could not have sued himself as administrator; but, by procuring another to do it for him, the nature of the transaction and its effect in equity is not changed. The agent who acted in his stead stands charged as trustee precisely as he would have been if the original mortgagee had foreclosed, and he, while he was the administrator, had bought at the foreclosure sale. The H. J. Goethe Company, having notice of all the facts, is in no better position, so far as its rights under the mortgage foreclosure are concerned, and is bound to reconvey on payment of the amount justly due upon the portion of the debt owing by the estate to Frank Thomas. The case is in many respects similar to Raynor v. Mintzer, 67 Cal. 159, 7 Pac. 431. In that case the parties were chargeable as trustees because of their actual fraud, and in this case because of the legal relation of Frank Thomas to the estate; but the principle applies to all trustees alike, and in that case, as in this, the purchase was made by the intervention of a third person at the instance of the parties charged. We think the complaint states a good cause of action, so far as the transaction of the Cadwallader mortgage is concerned.

In view of what has been said, it is scarcely necessary to add that neither the statutory right to redeem from the foreclosure sale nor the effect of the judgment of foreclosure as an estoppel against the estate of Ann Thomas can operate to diminish or take away the right of that estate to charge the defendant company as trustee, for its benefit, of the apparent legal title by that means obtained. By the principles of equity, to which we have referred, it would be obliged to hold any legal title to the property of the estate obtained by the attempt to enforce payment of these debts as a title in trust for the benefit of the estate. The case of Raynor v. Mintzer, supra, is authority for this proposition. Where the trust relation exists, the party charged as trustee cannot by any circuitous method, without the consent of the cestui que trust, free himself from the obligations arising therefrom. The same principles of equity apply to the title of the H. J. Goethe Company, under the trustee's sale, of parcels 3, 4 and 5. It was at the time of that sale in possession of the interest of Ann Thomas in the property, having obtained such possession from the Carmichael corporation, with full notice of the rights of the estate and the trust obligations of that corporation concerning the same. It does not clearly appear whether the agreement under which possession of the interest of Ann Thomas in the property was delivered to the Carmichael corporation was written or parol, express or implied. It is in substance stated, however, that the rents thereof were to be collected by that corporation and applied in satisfaction of the debts of that estate and of Frank Thomas. It was the duty of Frank Thomas in his fiduciary capacity as administrator to apply the rents accruing from the property of the estate upon its debts. Perhaps this would require the application to be made upon the debts generally, rather than upon these particular debts; but the defendants cannot insist upon this, nor take advantage of any lack of authority in Thomas to make the particular application which he directed, and, besides, it does not appear that the estate owed any other debts. From these facts it is necessarily implied that the portion of the rents arising from the interest of the estate would be applicable solely to the payment of the mortgage to Cadwallader and the debt secured by the trust deed. The Carmichael corporation was, therefore, in possession of the property of the estate as trustee for the purpose of collecting the rents and applying the same, in part at least, upon the debt secured by the trust deed, and the H. J. Goethe Company, having notice of the trust relation at the time it acquired possession, would be bound by the same obligations, and would hold under the same trust. The transferee having notice of the facts, neither party to the transfer of possession could gain any additional rights adverse to the estate by means thereof. This constructive trust, imputed where confidential relations exist, does not depend upon the fairness or unfairness of the unauthorized disposition which the trustee attempts to make of the trust property, nor upon the existence of an intention to create a trust by the unauthorized transaction. Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. 521; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 Pac. 788; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur., supra. Hence it is immaterial whether the sale was or was not for a fair price, or whether the transfer to the Carmichael corporation for the purpose of having the rents applied on the debts was beneficial to the estate or not. It is immaterial whether Frank Thomas had or had not authority, as administrator of the estate, to make such a disposition of its property. If he acted without authority, the party who gained the unlawful possession thereby will not be allowed to dispute the trust obligations arising from the transaction by implication of law. The Goethe Company, being in possession under this trust to pay the debt secured by the trust deed out of the rents received, was occupying a fiduciary relation to the estate, and by the principles above stated would be precluded from purchasing at the trustee's sale and claiming the title thus obtained free from the obligations of the trust. The fact that Frank Thomas, as heir of Ann Thomas, had inherited the title to one-half of her lands, subject to administration, is immaterial, so far as the trust here involved is concerned. His right as heir is subordinate to the rights of the estate. The most that the defendant corporation could ask by reason of their acquisition of such right would be to have a clause inserted in the decree to the effect that if, upon final settlement of the estate of Ann Thomas, there should remain for distribution any part of the interest of Frank Thomas, as such heir, in any part of this land or its proceeds, the said defendant would be entitled thereto. It follows that the facts stated also constitute a good cause of action to redeem the property of the estate from the sale under the trust deed, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

It is claimed that the court should have made an interlocutory order declaring the right to redeem, and directing an accounting as to the amount necessary to be paid for that purpose. This claim is made upon the ground that since, by amendment to section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such an interlocutory order, if made, would be appealable, the effect is to make it imperative upon the court in all actions to redeem to make the interlocutory order, so as to give the opportunity to appeal. Obviously the amendment was not so intended, and has no such effect. It recognizes the fact that, although such practice is not contemplated by the Code of Civil Procedure, yet by the practice in equity the court in its discretion may make such an order, and it merely gives the right of appeal therefrom in case the order is made. The court is not bound to follow this practice, and in many cases it should not do so. Generally it will be found fully as convenient and conducive to justice, and less expensive to all parties, to proceed with the trial of all the issues before making findings or rendering judgment upon any fact, and in such cases the proper course would be to proceed with the findings and judgment as in any ordinary action. But, in any event, it is a matter of discretion, and the amendment of the Code has not changed the rule.

The court made a general finding that all the allegations of the complaint were true, but made certain specific exceptions, which are important, because they show that the judgment given is not supported by the facts. According to these findings and the evidence, the trust deed embraced only parcels 3, 4, and 5, and the Cadwallader mortgage covered only parcels 1 and 2. These were the only liens upon the interest of the estate of Ann Thomas. It was further found that the amount necessary to be paid to the Goethe Company by the estate of Ann Thomas to redeem the entire property was the sum of $6,549.82, which sum included the amounts due on both of the liens aforesaid. Judgment was given to the effect that upon the payment of that sum the Goethe Company should reconvey to the Ann Thomas estate all of the five parcels, including the interest obtained by that company from Frank Thomas by his absolute deed, as well as that of Ann Thomas, deceased, as to which latter alone it is charged with the trust. This is manifestly wrong, both in the amount required to be paid and in the interests required to be conveyed. It was also improper to combine the two liens and require a payment of both to obtain a reconveyance of the property covered by either. The liens, so far as the estate of Ann Thomas is concerned, are and have been entirely separate and distinct, and are upon different parcels of land. The right of the estate to redeem from either, and the corresponding obligation of the defendant, are not dependent upon the payment of the other. The defendant corporation had acquired absolutely the interest of Frank Thomas in all the land in satisfaction of the debts due it from him, including other debts for which Ann Thomas never became liable; and that corporation was under no obligation to convey that interest to the estate of Ann Thomas, either upon payment of the debt or upon any other condition whatever. If that interest in any parcel had any value in excess of the one-half of the joint debt for which such parcel was bound, the Goethe Company was entitled to the benefit of it. (Of course, we do not here refer to the interest of Frank Thomas as heir of Ann Thomas.) After ascertaining that the interest of Frank Thomas and his part of the joint debts were thus disposed of absolutely, the court should have considered and settled the case with regard to the estate of Ann Thomas in the same manner as if the lien of the trust deed had covered only parcel 5 and her half interest in parcels 3 and 4, and had been for one-half of the amount due thereon at the time of the transfer of possession to the Carmichael corporation, and should have adjusted the account by applying the rents accruing from her interest upon the amount due upon the one-half of the original debt, which in equity, as between Ann Thomas and Frank Thomas, she should have paid, and should have pursued a similar course concerning the debt and land covered by the Cadwallader mortgage. The defendant corporation is entitled only to the rights which Frank Thomas would have had against the estate if he had attempted to acquire the title himself; that is, to hold the interest of the estate in the respective properties as security for the respective moieties of the debts due from the estate. The two accounts should have been stated separately. In the Cadwallader mortgage account the Goethe Company should have been credited with one-half of the amount actually paid for the mortgage by the Carmichael corporation out of the $8,400 loaned to Frank Thomas, with one-half of all reasonable expenses paid and incurred by that corporation and the defendants for repairs, taxes, insurance, and otherwise, upon parcels 1 and 2, and with accruing interest on the amounts paid, and it should have been charged with one-half of the rents received from said parcels by it and the Carmichael corporation from the time the latter took possession up to the time of trial. In the trust deed account the credits should consist of one-half of the amount paid at the trustee's sale, one-half of all reasonable expenses paid or incurred, for repairs, taxes, insurance, and otherwise, upon parcels 3 and 4 for the time above mentioned, and all such expenses for that period upon parcel 5, and accruing interest, and the charges should consist of one-half the rents from parcels 3 and 4 and all the rents from parcel 5 for the same period. The rents in each account should be applied first on expenses and then upon interest, the balances, if any, to go on the principal at the dates they may occur. When the respective amounts were thus ascertained, the judgment should have been to the effect that, upon payment of the amount found due from the estate upon the Cadwallader mortgage, the defendants should convey to the estate, or to the administrator or heirs for its use, the one-half undivided interest in parcels 1 and 2, and that, upon payment of the amount found due from the estate on account of the debt secured by the deed of trust, it should in like manner convey the one-half interest in parcels 3 and 4 and the whole of parcel 5. The findings furnish no details from which the respective amounts due from the estate on the respective liens can be determined, and a new trial will be necessary. We need not express any opinion concerning the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. In view of the material variances between the allegations and the proofs, as above pointed out, it will be necessary for the plaintiff representing the estate of Ann Thomas to amend his complaint, and leave to amend it generally should be given.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff Frank Thomas, as administrator of the estate of Ann Thomas, deceased, against the defendants, and also the order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial as against said plaintiff, are reversed; but such reversal shall not affect the judgment against Frank Thomas personally.

BAUM v. ROPER et al.

1. EJECTMENT—WRIT OF POSSESSION—ISSUANCE BEFORE ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

A writ of possession, issued after rendition of judgment in ejectment, though before entry thereof, may be executed.

2. LIS PENDENS—PURCHASERS PENDING SUIT.

One not a party to an ejectment suit, but who went into possession of the premises after the suit was brought, is subject to removal under the writ of possession issued under the judgment for plaintiff, he not having clearly shown that he did not obtain possession from one of the defendants, the tenant of the other defendant, or enter under the title of the other defendant, though by deed he had obtained, not only that title, but another, that of one not a party to the suit, which on its face was an inferior record title.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Ejectment by Clara Baum, administratrix, against Edward Roper and others. From an order refusing stay of execution of the writ of possession, J. W. Reay, Jr., not a party to the action, appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. W. B. Kollmyer and Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by J. W. Reay, Jr., from an order refusing to stay the execution of a writ of possession issued under a judgment in ejectment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants. Julius Baum brought an ejectment suit on the 14th day of April, 1892, against Edward Roper and wife, Kate Roper, and David J. Spence, to recover possession of a parcel of land situate at the southeast corner of Turk street and Van Ness avenue in the city and county of San Francisco, fronting 50 feet on Van Ness avenue and 109 feet on Turk street. Pending suit Julius Baum died, and Clara Baum, as administratrix of his estate, was substituted as plaintiff. Kate Roper also died, and her administrator was substituted. Findings of fact and conclusions of law were signed February 5, 1897, and filed the next day, in favor of plaintiff and against all the defendants. Judgment was entered and recorded in accordance therewith February 10, 1897; but, as is afterwards found by the court, the clerk, in entering said judgment, through misprision and inadvertence omitted the name of the defendant Spence therefrom. On the 4th day of April, 1901, a writ of possession was issued out of the court, and the sheriff was proceeding to execute the same, when J. W. Reay, Jr., on the 9th day of April, 1901, obtained an order on affidavits to show cause why the execution of said writ should not be stayed. The order to show cause was discharged, and the sheriff directed to execute the writ forthwith May 28, 1901. On May 29, 1901, the judgment was by order of the court amended nunc pro tunc as of the 10th day of February, 1897, so as to in terms run against David J. Spence.

Appellant, J. W. Reay, Jr., was not a party to the suit, but pending the same succeeded by mesne conveyances to the interest of Spence in the premises, and among other things now insists that he cannot be evicted as grantee of Spence, for the reason that, when the writ was issued and when the order to show cause was heard and determined, no judgment had been entered against Spence. Before considering the main contention of appellant, it is convenient to dispose of the contention just mentioned. While it is true that an appeal will not lie from a judgment until it has been entered (Spencer v. Troutt, 133 Cal. 605, 65 Pac. 1083), the judgment in other respects gets its force and vitality from its rendition, and not from its entry. The rendition of the judgment is the judicial act of the court; its entry is the ministerial act of the clerk. In Los Angeles County Bank v. Raynor, 61 Cal. 145, the court said: "But it is urged that the record shows that the judgment was not entered when the execution was issued, nor was it necessary that it should have been. The enforcement of a judgment does not depend upon its entry or docketing. These are merely ministerial acts, the first of which is required to be done for putting in motion the right of appeal from the judgment itself, and of limiting the time within which the right may be exercised (section 681, Code Civ. Proc.), or in which the judgment may be enforced (section 685, Code Civ. Proc.), and the other for the purpose of creating a lien by the judgment upon the real property of the debtor (section 671, Code Civ. Proc.). But neither is necessary for the issuance of an execution upon a judgment which had been duly rendered. Without docketing or entry execution may be issued on the judgment and land levied upon and sold (Hastings v. Cunningham, 39 Cal. 144); and the deed executed by the sheriff, in fulfillment of the sale, not only proves the sale, but also estops the defendant from controverting the title acquired by it." To the same effect are Janes v. Bullard, 107 Cal. 132, 40 Pac. 108; Freeman on Judgments, vol. 1, § 38; Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 129, 60 Pac. 900; and In re Cook's Estate, 77 Cal. 232, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267. In Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491, it was held that the making and filing of findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute the rendition of judgment. In this case findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed February 6, 1897, long before the issuance of the writ of possession. On the second appeal of this case (78 Pac. 466), taken shortly after the actual entry of judgment as to Spence, the court held that it could not consider the objection that the evidence did not support the decision of the trial court, inasmuch as the appeal had been taken more than four years after the rendition of the judgment. The judgment having been rendered, although not entered, as against Spence, before the issuance of the writ of possession, the writ could be executed either against Spence or his grantee.

The main contention of appellant, however, is that he cannot be dispossessed under the writ; for, although he entered into possession of the premises after suit brought, he entered as grantee of one A. W. Reay, who was not a party to the suit, and was in possession when the suit was brought, and so remained until his death in 1899. The discussion of this contention requires a somewhat fuller statement of the facts disclosed by the record before. In 1877 Julius Baum (the original plaintiff in this action) brought a suit in ejectment for the premises in controversy here against J. W. Reay (father of appellant), and in November, 1887, recovered judgment against J. W. Reay for the same, which judgment was on appeal affirmed prior to the beginning of the present suit. April 8, 1885, J. W. Reay conveyed to A. W. Reay a portion of the premises, having a frontage of 6 feet on Van Ness avenue by 109 feet on Turk street, with a width in the rear of 48 feet. Deed was recorded July 18, 1887. May 6, 1891, Edward Roper (one of the defendants in the present action) conveyed a one-half interest in the premises in question to A. W. Reay. This deed was not recorded. March 2, 1892, Edward Roper conveyed to David J. Spence the premises in question; deed recorded the next day. (The claim of title by Roper was from a different source from that of J. W. Reay.) April 4, 1892, Baum commenced this action against Roper, his wife, and Spence. March 6, 1893, Spence deeded the premises to A. W. Reay; deed not recorded. February 10, 1897, judgment was rendered for plaintiff against defendants in this suit, and subsequently, to wit, June 24, 1899, A. W. Reay deeded premises to J. W. Reay, Jr. (appellant). April 4, 1901, after affirmance of judgment on first appeal by defendants in Baum v. Roper et al., 64 Pac. 128, the writ of execution was issued. It will thus be seen that appellant, subsequent to the rendition of judgment in this suit, and pending an appeal therefrom, obtained through his deed from A. W. Reay, the J. W. Reay title (which had long before been finally determined to be invalid as against Baum) to about one-half the premises, the Roper title to an undivided one-half, and the Roper-Spence title to the entire premises.

Under what circumstances a person not a party to a suit in ejectment, who entered pending the suit, may be dispossessed under a writ issued on a judgment against the defendants, has been considered by the Supreme Court of this state in numerous cases. In Scheerer v. Goodwin, 125 Cal. 154, 57 Pac. 789, which was an action brought by the plaintiff to restrain the sheriff from dispossessing him under a writ on a judgment in a suit in ejectment to which he was not a party, the court said: "Under the judgment in the action of Goodwin v. Scheerer, supra, the sheriff was authorized to remove from the land the defendants in that action, and all persons found thereon whose possession was derived under the defendants, or either of them; and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that all persons coming into possession of the premises subsequent to the commencement of that action came in under the defendants therein. * * * Upon the issue of their right to remain in possession the burden is upon them to show affirmatively that their possession is rightful and under a title that has not been determined in the action, and that such possession was not taken by collusion with the defendants in the judgment"—citing Long v. Neville, 29 Cal. 131; Leese v. Clark, 29 Cal. 664; Wetherbee v. Dunn, 36 Cal. 147, 95 Am. Dec. 166. In Leese v. Clark, supra, the court, repeating language used in Long v. Neville, supra, said: "Prima facie all who come into possession after action brought must go out, for the presumption is, nothing to the contrary appearing, that they came in under the defendant." In the same case the court also said: "The fruits of a successful litigation cannot be wrested from the prevailing party, and the process of the courts evaded upon a mere claim set up under suspicious circumstances, resting upon affidavits alone, unless the case made by that kind of proof is reasonably satisfactory." To the same effect is Cal. Q. M. Co. v. Redington, 50 Cal. 160, where the court said: "It is incumbent upon a party seeking relief in a summary proceeding of this character to make out a clear case, free from ambiguity. A plaintiff in ejectment who recovers a judgment, perhaps after a protracted and expensive litigation, ought not to be deprived of the fruits of it, except in a case free from all reasonable doubt. The opportunity for collusion is so great, and the fraud is often so difficult of detection, that courts are reluctant to grant such relief on ex parte affidavits, except in cases clearly made out, and free from any reasonable suspicion of fraud or collusion." See, also, Sampson v. Ohleyer, 22 Cal. 201. So in this case, as appellant confessedly entered after suit brought, if it can be fairly deduced from the evidence in the record that he entered under or in collusion with either Spence or Roper, or, indeed, if he has not clearly and satisfactorily shown that he did not enter under or in collusion with either of them, the order of the trial court was right, and he must go out.

There is much evidence in the record that seems incompetent and immaterial, but certain salient points are quite clear. J. W. Reay, A. W. Reay, and Mrs. Kate Roper were brothers and sister, and J. W. Reay, Jr., is the son of J. W. Reay. It may be conceded that at the time of the bringing of this action A. W. Reay actually resided on and was in possession of the premises, and so continued till his death in 1899. It is equally certain that Edward Roper and wife also resided on the premises and were in possession thereof at the beginning of the suit, and Roper so continued until after the death of A. W. Reay. The evidence also shows that the Ropers at the commencement of the suit were in possession as tenants of Spence, who at that time had a claim of title to the entire premises previously derived from Roper, which on its face was a better record title than the one-half interest then held by A. W. Reay (also derived from Roper), for the reason that the Spence title was under a recorded deed, while the other was under an unrecorded deed. After the bringing of this suit both these titles, as well as the J. W. Reay title to a portion of the premises (which by final judgment had been determined to be worthless as against Baum) passed to appellant by deed from A. W. Reay. Appellant in his affidavit states "that shortly after the death of the said Alfred W. Reay this deponent repaired said premises, papered the rooms, and made other repairs thereto, and thereupon rented both of said houses to tenants, who immediately entered thereon, and they and their successors have ever since occupied and held said premises under this deponent and as tenants of his, and are now in the occupation thereof as such tenants." J. W. Reay, in his affidavit, states that "Edward Roper removed from said premises, and from said city and county of San Francisco, very shortly after the death of said Alfred W. Reay, and has not resided on said property, or in said city and county, since said date." From the foregoing two statements it is a very fair inference that the last person in the actual occupation of the premises before the entry of appellant was Edward Roper, defendant in this action and tenant of Spence, also defendant in this action. It is significant that appellant, in his affidavit, makes no mention of the vacating of the premises by Roper. From the foregoing circumstances it is a very fair deduction that appellant received the actual possession of said premises from defendant Roper (the then only actual occupant thereof), the tenant of defendant Spence, and that he entered under the title derived from Spence. At any rate, he has not clearly shown that he did not obtain possession from Roper or enter under the Spence title. Such being the case, under the authorities above quoted and the well-established law, he ought to go out under the writ.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

McKENZIE v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

1. Certiorari—Office of Writ—Correction of Jurisdictional Errors.

The writ of certiorari will only be granted where an inferior tribunal or board exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction, and there is no appeal, nor any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. It is not a writ of error, and cannot be used to determine whether the inferior tribunal or board has regularly pursued its authority, nor to correct irregularities or mistakes of law in its proceeding, nor to determine whether or not the evidence was sufficient to support the order, resolution, or matter complained of.

2. Schools—Provisions of General Law—Conflict with City Charter—Effect.

General laws passed by the Legislature in regard to the common schools, and prescribing the duties of boards of education in counties and cities, are paramount, and control conflicting provisions of city charters; but such charters may contain additional provisions, or provide for matters not enumerated in the general law, so long as such provisions are not in conflict with the general law.

3. STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

The charter of a city and the general law should be construed together by the court, and made to harmonize, so as to give effect to each, if possible.

4. SCHOOLS—REMOVAL OF TEACHERS—POWERS OF BOARD.

Pol. Code, §§ 1791, 1793, authorizes boards of education to dismiss teachers for certain causes. The charter of the city and county of San Francisco authorizes the board of education, "in addition to the powers conferred by the general laws," to dismiss teachers for the same causes. It further provides that charges against teachers must be formally made by the superintendent, and shall be finally passed upon by the board, after giving the accused teacher due hearing, and authorizes the board to investigate charges against any person in the employ of the school department, and to take testimony in such investigations. Held, that the board of education may investigate charges against a teacher, although not preferred by the superintendent, and may hear evidence and remove the teacher pursuant to such charges.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Schools and School Districts, §§ 301, 302.]

5. SAME—SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS—NATURE OF OFFICE—DUTIES.

The superintendent of schools is a public officer, whose duties are specifically prescribed by Pol. Code, § 1543, and additional duties cannot be imposed upon him by a city charter.

6. SAME—DUTIES OF SUPERINTENDENT.

Pol. Code, § 1543, requiring the county superintendent of schools "to superintend the schools of the county," does not make it the duty of such superintendent to prefer charges against teachers.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Application by Margaret McKenzie for a writ of certiorari against the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco and others. From a judgment granting the writ as prayed, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeal, September 11, 1905; by Supreme Court, October 11, 1905.

City Attorney Long, for appellants. S. V. Costello and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondent.

COOPER, J. This was an application by respondent as petitioner to the superior court for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of vacating and annulling an order or resolution made by defendants in their official capacity as the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco, dismissing the petitioner from her position as teacher in the school department of the public schools of said city and county. The appellants, having made a return to the writ setting forth the proceedings in full, the court, upon motion of petitioner, made an order granting the writ as prayed, and judgment was accordingly entered. This appeal is from the judgment.

The writ of certiorari will only be granted when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. It cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board, or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board, or officer. It is not a writ of error. Its purpose is not to consider errors or irregularities committed in the exercise of an admitted jurisdiction, nor to correct mistakes of law in conducting a proceeding of which the inferior tribunal, board, or officer had jurisdiction. Nor can it be used for the purpose of determining whether or not the evidence was sufficient to support the particular order, resolution, or matter complained of, provided the law and the machinery employed were such as to give the inferior tribunal jurisdiction.

In this case the defendants, as a board of education, heard and determined charges against the petitioner in regard to her unfitness to teach. They had jurisdiction to hear and determine said charges, if properly made. Pol. Code, §§ 1791, 1793; Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 490, 22 Pac. 1042. This is not controverted by respondent; but it is claimed that the board of education never acquired jurisdiction, because the method provided by the charter of the city and county of San Francisco as to making the charges is the only method provided and the source of the power of the board to act, and that the charges were not made as provided by the charter. If the charter of the city and county of San Francisco were the only law upon the question, there would be much force in respondent's contention. The Legislature, under the Constitution, has provided a general system in regard to the common schools, and prescribed the duties of boards of education in counties and cities and counties of the state. The general laws passed by the Legislature are paramount, and, in case any provision of the charter of any city conflicts with the general laws as to matters pertaining to the public schools, the charter must give way to the general law. But the charter of a city, or city and county, may make additional provisions, or provide for matters not enumerated in the general law, provided such provisions are not in conflict with the general law. Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 434, 32 Pac. 558. It is the duty of the court in all cases to consider the different provisions of the charter of a city or city and county and the general law, so as to make them harmonize, if possible, and give effect to each if it can be done. We find no difficulty in this case in so harmonizing them, and holding that the board of education had jurisdiction upon the written charges made by citizens.

The laws of the state provide that boards of education may dismiss teachers for insubordination, immoral or unprofessional conduct, profanity, or evident unfitness to teach. Pol. Code, §§ 1791, 1793. The charter of the city and county of San Francisco provides (article 7, c. 3, §§ 1–5): "In addition to the powers conferred by the general laws of the state, the board of education shall have power * * * to promote, transfer, and dismiss teachers; but no teacher in the department at the time of the adoption of this charter, or who shall be hereafter appointed, shall be dismissed by the department, except for insubordination, immoral or unprofessional conduct, or evident unfitness for teaching. * * * Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the board from removing teachers holding only special certificates or serving a probationary term. Charges against teachers must be formally made by the superintendent after due investigation, and shall be finally passed upon by the board after giving the accused teacher due hearing. * * * To investigate charges against any person connected with or in the employ of the school department, and to take testimony in such investigations."

While the above-quoted provisions attempt to make it the duty of the superintendent to make formal charges against teachers, they do not make it essential that the board of education investigate only in cases where the superintendent makes the charges. The board is not prohibited from acting in cases where no formal charges are made by the superintendent. On the other hand, it is expressly stated that these powers conferred on the board of education are "in addition to the powers conferred by the general laws of the state." And after the use of the clause attempting to make it the duty of the superintendent to make formal charges, in subdivision 5 of section 1 of the chapter of the charter pertaining to the matter, the board is given power "to investigate charges against any person connected with or in the employ of the school department, and to take testimony in such investigations." This does not confine the board to charges made by the superintendent, but is broad enough to include any charges for which a teacher may be removed. The superintendent might decline to make the formal charges, but that does not deprive the board of the power of investigating charges made by some one else. Such was not the intent of the framers of the charter. If such were the law, it might, in many cases, leave the board powerless to remove a teacher for immorality, intemperance, or any other cause. The superintendent might, through favoritism or corrupt influences, refuse to make any formal charges, and, according to petitioner's contention, the board would be powerless.

Not only this, but the superintendent of schools is a county officer. The charter of the city cannot impose duties upon him as such county officer. His duties are prescribed by section 1543, Pol. Code, and we look in vain in that section for any language making it his duty to prefer charges against teachers. Counsel for petitioner claims that the duty is included in the words "to superintend the schools of the county." To superintend the schools does not mean "to make charges against teachers," any more than it could be held to mean that the superintendent should prosecute all teachers or pupils in his county for violation of the criminal laws.

As our conclusion is that the board of education did not exceed its jurisdiction, this inquiry need go no further. The judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to dismiss the petition.

McKENZIE v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

SCHOOLS — TEACHERS — REMOVAL—NECESSITY OF FORMAL CHARGE.

The board of education of the city and county of San Francisco has jurisdiction to hear testimony against a teacher, although no formal charges have been presented against her by the county superintendent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 43, Cent. Dig. Schools and School Districts, §§ 301, 302.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Application by Margaret McKenzie for writ of mandate against the board of education in and for the city and county of San Francisco and others. From a judgment denying the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeal, September 11, 1905; by Supreme Court, October 11, 1905.

S. V. Costello and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for appellant. City Attorney Long, for respondents.

COOPER, J. This is an application by petitioner for a writ of mandate against respondents, as the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco, to compel said board to restore her to her position as teacher in the public schools of said city and county. The trial court denied the petition, and judgment was accordingly entered in favor of respondents. From the judgment petitioner prosecutes this appeal.

The contention of appellant is that the board of education had no jurisdiction in the matter of hearing testimony, for the reason that no formal charges had been presented against her by the county superintendent. This contention has been disposed of against appellant in the case of Margaret McKenzie v. Board of Education of City and County of San Francisco et al. (No. 128) 82 Pac. 392, this day decided; and for the reasons therein stated the judgment in this case is affirmed.

FRENCH v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGER — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries sustained by a passenger while alighting from a car, a charge that the burden is on plaintiff to show that the injury was caused by the act of defendant in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business, and that, if this be shown, there is a presumption of negligence, which throws upon defendant the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without negligence, was not subject to the objection of withdrawing from the jury the issue whether the car started while plaintiff was alighting therefrom, or whether he voluntarily left the car while it was in motion, or to any other objection, when considered with other instructions that a passenger who voluntarily alights from a moving car assumes the risks thereof, and cannot recover for injuries sustained, and that, if plaintiff alighted from the car while it was in motion, and was thereby injured, he was guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery.

2. SAME.

Nor, in view of the above instructions, and the fact that the only issue was whether the car started while plaintiff was alighting therefrom, or whether he voluntarily left the car while it was in motion, was it error to refuse a charge that "in a case of this character the burden of proving negligence rests on plaintiff, and he must prove the negligence alleged in the complaint by a preponderance of evidence."

Action by C. W. French against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court October 6, 1905.

Bicknell, Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, for appellant. John W. Kemp, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This is a suit for damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff from injuries caused by his being thrown to the ground while alighting from one of defendant's cars. There was evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that while alighting from the car, after it had stopped, the car was suddenly started forward, and that he was thereby thrown violently to the street. On behalf of defendant, there was evidence tending to prove that plaintiff alighted while the car was in motion. The court instructed the jury (among other instructions) as follows: "You are instructed that the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that the injury to a passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business. If this be shown by a fair preponderance of all the evidence, then there is a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence upon his part." And the following instruction, asked for by the defendant, was refused: "The Court instructs the jury that the plaintiff in this action seeks to recover damages sustained by reason of injuries to him on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant, its agents and employés, and you are instructed that in a case of this character the burden of proving negligence rests upon the plaintiff, and he must prove the negligence alleged in the complaint by a preponderance of evidence." The case was tried by a jury, and verdict was for the plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment entered on the verdict and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The sole errors complained of are the giving of the former, and the refusal of the latter, of the instructions quoted. As to the instruction given, it is urged by the appellant, and is not denied, "that there was but one issue in the case, viz., was the car started while the plaintiff was alighting therefrom, as he claimed, or did he voluntarily alight therefrom while it was in motion, as the defendant claimed?" The objection urged by the appellant to the instruction is, in effect, that it took this issue from the jury. But this is obviously not the case. If the plaintiff was injured by alighting from the car while it was in motion, or if there was any contributory negligence of any kind proven, then the injury was not caused "by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business," and the instruction could have no application. Accordingly, the jury were explicitly instructed, in effect, that a passenger who voluntarily alights from a car when in motion assumes the risks thereof, and cannot recover for any injuries sustained thereby; and that, if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff alighted from the car while in motion, and was thereby injured, then he was guilty of such negligence as to preclude a recovery; and there were other explicit instructions to the same effect. The jury therefore could not have been misled as to the issues submitted to them. Nor, as the law is established in this state, do we think any objection can be urged to the instruction. McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 Pac. 324, and cases cited; Babcock v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 128 Cal. 173, 60 Pac. 780; Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 549, 66 Pac. 787, 55 L. R. A. 608; Osgood v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 137 Cal. 280, 70 Pac. 169. It is unnecessary, therefore, to examine critically the cases cited from other states. But it may be observed that the instruction involved in Chicago Street Ry. Co. v. Catline, 70 Ill. App. 97, was essentially different from the one given in this case, and that under the authorities cited the decision in D. & R. G. R. Co. v. Fotheringham (Colo. App.) 68 Pac. 978, cannot be regarded as law in this state.

As to the instruction refused, we see no error; or, at least, no error of which the appellant can complain. There was, as claimed by the appellant, but one issue in the case, and on this issue the jury were fully instructed by the instructions given at the request of defendant already referred to. To have given the instruction asked for would, therefore, have served only to confuse the jury as to the only issue before them. The case of Kahn v. Triest Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 345, 73 Pac. 164, and the case of Patterson v. San Francisco and San Mateo Ry. Co. (Cal.) 81 Pac. 531, have no application. It may be admitted that, had the instruction been given, it might (in view of the ambiguous nature of the term "burden of proving") have been so construed as to not be in conflict with the instruction given. Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 400, 22 Pac. 871. But in its most natural construction, and in the construction that would most probably have been given to it by the jury, it would be contradictory; and, as there was but the one issue before the jury, it could have but served to mislead them.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TAGGART.

CRIMINAL LAW—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

An instruction in a criminal case that, where the evidence is entirely circumstantial, yet is not only consistent with the guilt of defendant, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, it is the duty of the jury to convict, though such evidence may not be as satisfactory to their minds as the direct testimony of credible eyewitnesses would have been, while erroneous, not only in authorizing a conviction on evidence less "satisfactory" than in the case of direct evidence, whereas Code Civ. Proc. § 1835, defining "satisfactory" evidence to be such "as ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind," provides that such evidence alone will justify a verdict, but also in declaring it to be the jury's duty to convict if the "evidence" (not the facts) be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than guilt—is harmless, the circumstantial evidence of defendant's guilt being at least "satisfactory," as defined by the Code, and being uncontradicted, and the improbability of a different result but for the instruction being such as to produce an abiding conviction to that effect.

Joseph H. Taggart was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Byron Waters and N. A. Bailie, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SMITH, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only error complained of is the following instruction to the jury: "Where the evidence is entirely circumstantial, yet is not only consistent with the guilt of the defendant, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion, the law makes it the duty of the jury to convict, notwithstanding such evidence may not be as satisfactory to their minds as the direct testimony of credible eyewitnesses would have been." It is said by the appellant's attorneys that this instruction was first given in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 202, and that it has been approved in some later cases, cited by them. But the instruction is taken, not from the instructions in People v. Cronin, but from the opinion of the court on page 202; and in looking over the cases citing this case, as given in Palm's Citations, we have not been able to find any in which this instruction was involved, except the cases of People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, where it is held to be erroneous, and in People v. Rushing, 130 Cal. 453, 454, 62 Pac. 742, 80 Am. St. Rep. 141, where it is, in effect, so held. In the former case, indeed, it is said: "The vice of this instruction is generally corrected, as it was in this case, by special instructions to the effect that every fact essential to sustain the hypothesis of guilt and to exclude the hypothesis of innocence must be fully proved;" and in the latter case this forms part of the instruction given. But in the case at bar there is no such qualifying instruction. It is, indeed, urged by the attorney for the state that the qualifying instruction referred to in the cases cited "offers but meager support if the main instruction is prejudicial." But in this we do not agree. The vice of the instruction here is, not merely that the jury are instructed that in the case of circumstantial evidence they may convict upon evidence less "satisfactory" than in the case of direct evidence (as to which see Code Civ. Proc. § 1835), but also that, if the "evidence" be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than the defendant's guilt, it is the duty of the jury to convict. But the law is that the jury is the sole judge of the credibility of the evidence, and therefore, though the evidence be inconsistent with the theory of the defendant's innocence, yet they may acquit him. This defect is pointed out in the opinion in People v. Dole, where it is said: "In cases of circumstantial evidence facts should be proved which are * * * inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of innocence, and every single fact from which the deduction of guilt is to be drawn must be proved by evidence which satisfies the minds and consciences of the jury," etc. Or, as elsewhere expressed, to justify the jury in finding the defendant guilty "the law requires that the facts (not merely the evidence) * * * be * * * inconsistent with any other rational conclusion." People v. Murray, 41 Cal. 67. Having regard, therefore, to this vice in the instruction, it can readily be perceived that the error might be cured—as it was in fact cured in the cases cited—"by special instructions to the effect that every fact essential to sustain the hypothesis of guilt and to exclude the hypothesis of innocence must be fully proved." In People v. Eckman, 72 Cal. 585, 14 Pac. 359, and People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 454, 24 Pac. 143, cited in the briefs, the instruction involved was that, "to convict upon circumstantial evidence, it should be such as to produce nearly the same degree of certainty as that which arises from direct testimony." But this instruction is free from the principal vice to which the instruction now under consideration is obnoxious. The cases are therefore not similar.

I have no doubt, therefore, that the instruction is erroneous, and that ordinarily the error would be material. But in the present case the circumstantial evidence of defendant's guilt was, if not absolutely conclusive, at least "satisfactory," in the sense of the term as defined by the Code—that is to say, it was such as "ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1835, 1826); and it stood entirely uncontradicted. Assuming, therefore (as we must), that the jury was composed of men at once unprejudiced and of average common sense and judgment, we are justified, under the authorities, in believing (as we do) that the result would not have been different had the instruction been omitted. Code Civ. Proc. § 475; Green v. Ophir Co., 45 Cal. 526, 527; Est. of Briswalter, 72 Cal. 110, 13 Pac. 164; Est. of Spencer, 96 Cal. 449, 450, 31 Pac. 453. The cases cited are, indeed, civil cases, but we see no reason why the same principle should not apply in criminal cases.

Nor are the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure cited to be disregarded. They have, indeed, as to certain matters, specifically indicated in the decision, been held unconstitutional (San Jose Ranch Co. v. San Jose Land & Water Co., 126 Cal. 325, 58 Pac. 824), but the question now before us does not seem to be affected by that decision, for here not only does it not appear that "a different result would have been probable if [the] error * * * had not occurred," but the contrary; and the improbability of a different result upon the omission of the instruction is so strong as to produce in us an abiding conviction to that effect.

We are of the opinion, therefore, having regard to the particular case, that, notwithstanding the error of the court below, the judgment and order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

PEOPLE v. TURNER.

1. WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT.

The impeachment of a witness by showing that he had made statements in conflict with his testimony cannot be met by evidence that at other times he made statements in harmony with his testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 1260.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—HEARSAY.

Testimony that witness had learned from conversation with another that defendant was one of the robbers is hearsay.

3. SAME—DECLARATIONS.

Declaration of the person robbed, made in the presence of defendant on his arrest, that he was the robber, is not admissible against him, he having at once flatly denied the charge; such a declaration being admissible only for the purpose of showing conduct in connection with it evidencing guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Ben F. Turner was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

Rowen Irwin and Emmons & Irwin, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, P. J. The defendant stands convicted of the larceny of $50 from the person of one Smith. The evidence tended to disclose something very much in the nature of a highway robbery. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial, and his principal contention is that the court erred in permitting the prosecution to prove certain hearsay statements identifying defendant as having taken part in the larceny charged. The question arises this way: The conviction of defendant depends almost altogether upon the testimony of the complaining witness, Smith; he being the only witness who identified the defendant as assisting in the robbery. To impeach and weaken the force of Smith's testimony in this regard, the defendant called the city marshal of Bakersfield, Ed Tibbet, who testified that about two hours after the alleged larceny Smith had, in substance, declared that he could not identify any of the parties that robbed him. The defense also called a brother of Ed, Bert Tibbet, who testified that in the evening of the same day of the robbery, or larceny, Smith had expressed himself as unable to identify the defendant as being concerned in the robbery. Smith had been intimately acquainted with the defendant for a long time before the robbery. Thereafter, the prosecution was permitted to show on the cross-examination of Bert Tibbet, and by the testimony of James McKamy, a constable, that on the day following the larceny the complaining witness did state in their presence that the defendant was one of the parties who robbed him. The prosecution was also permitted to show by the testimony of McKamy, that Smith subsequently stated, in the presence of defendant and to him, that he (the defendant) was one of the persons concerned in the robbery, and that defendant denied it, and also denied having been with Smith at the Palace Dance Hall in the neighborhood of 3 or 4 o'clock, just previous to the alleged larceny.

In the foregoing we think the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant. The impeachment of a witness by showing that he has made statements in conflict with his present testimony cannot be met by the party calling such witness, with evidence that at other and different times the impeached witness has made statements in harmony with his present testimony, and to permit the introduction of testimony of this latter character is prejudicial to the party against whom it is received. Mason v. Vestal, 88 Cal. 396, 26 Pac. 213, 22 Am. St. Rep. 310. Particularly is this the rule where, as here, there is nothing to show that the witness did not have the same motive or interest to deceive when he made the confirmatory statement that he may have had when he testified to the fact. People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 254, 63 Pac. 351; Mason v. Vestal, supra.

We are of opinion, also, that it was error to permit the city marshal to testify to any information that he had received from conversation with the barkeeper, Silva, as to "who one of the parties were that had robbed the complaining witness." The answers of the city marshal to the questions asked him by the district attorney were well calculated to leave the impression that Silva had told the marshal that the defendant was one of the parties engaged in the robbery. Of course, this was hearsay, and prejudicial to the defendant.

We are also of opinion that the testimony of McKamy to the effect that Smith, soon after the arrest of defendant, stated that "he was one of them, he was the fellow," in the presence of and to the defendant, should have been excluded. The defendant denied this charge of Smith at once. It is not the declaration made in the presence of a defendant that can be taken as evidence against him. It is only his conduct in connection with the declaration that can be looked to for evidence of guilt, and if he flatly denies the charge there can be no evidence in this of guilt, and therefore the whole matter should be excluded, lest the jury may infer, from its being admitted, that they are warranted in treating it as evidence against the defendant. People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 544, 66 Pac. 798; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650. Of course, where the act constituting the crime is clearly shown, and the only question is as to whether the act was done with a criminal intent, the fact that the defendant denies the commission of the alleged criminal act may tend to show criminal intent and consciousness of crime. People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547. Indeed, even where the defendant flatly denies the criminal act, yet if he goes on to make exculpatory statements, for instance, as to his whereabouts at the time, and these statements can be shown to be false, then the statements, together with their falsity, may be shown, on the theory that falsehood in the matter is an indication of conscious guilt. In such a case, it is the falsehood only that tells against the defendant.

The district attorney seems to have insisted on the introduction of all the foregoing testimony upon some theory that, all these statements having been made by Smith in the presence of the witness Bert Tibbet, they in some way tended to discredit his testimony as to what he claimed to have heard the complaining witness say on the day of the larceny or robbery. But, as we read the record, all these declarations of Smith to the effect that the defendant assisted in the robbery were made on the day he was arrested, being the day after the robbery, and do not tend to contradict or discredit the testimony of Bert Tibbet as to Smith's statements made on the day that he was robbed.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: ALLEN, J.; SMITH, J.

PEOPLE v. HILL.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. August 15, 1905.)

1. Criminal Law—Appeal.

An appeal from a verdict of guilty, or from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, is not authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2586, 2591.]

2. Murder in First Degree.

Though defendant sincerely believed deceased had a few dollars of defendant's money, for defendant to shoot him because of his refusal to surrender it shows an "abandoned and malignant heart," and constitutes murder in the first degree.

3. Criminal Law—Admissions of Defendant—Instructions.

An instruction that evidence of admissions or statements of defendant made to witnesses should be received with caution and viewed with scrutiny, and that in considering it the circumstances surrounding defendant and the probability or improbability of defendant having made the statements should be considered, even if erroneous, is not prejudicial, whether it applies to admissions of defendant to officers after his arrest and placed in evidence through them, or to some statement of defendant previously made and relied on by him in his defense.

4. Same—Evidence—Instructions.

The quoted language in an instruction that in considering the weight and effect to be given defendant's evidence, while the jury may consider his manner and the probability of his statements, taken in connection with all the evidence in the case, and, "if convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act on it"; if not, they may reject it—is not erroneous.

5. SAME—EXPLAINING OBJECT OF LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Refusal of an instruction stating the object of the law in permitting persons charged with crime to testify is not error; it not being necessary.

6. MURDER—EVIDENCE.

Where defendant shot a street car conductor on his refusal to surrender a $5 gold piece which defendant claimed to have given him by mistake for a nickel, evidence that the conductor did not have a $5 gold piece, in connection with evidence that in defendant's first account of the matter he had made statements in conflict with his testimony as to when he first discovered his loss of the money, is admissible, as tending to show he was acting in bad faith in making his claim for money.

7. SAME—CONFLICTING STATEMENTS.

Where defendant shot a street car conductor on his refusal to surrender a $5 gold piece which defendant claimed to have given him by mistake, it is not error to permit evidence to stand tending to show conflicting statements of defendant as to when he discovered his loss of the money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Archie Hill was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Rossiter, C. L. Shinn, and H. H. Appel, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, P. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment, from an order denying him a new trial, from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, and from the verdict of the jury. The appeals from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment and from the verdict are unauthorized by law, and may therefore be ignored. The defendant shot and killed Wilbur L. Carlton, a street car conductor, in the city of Pasadena. The killing was the culmination of a dispute between defendant and the conductor as to whether defendant had, on a previous trip, by mistake, given the conductor a $5 piece, thinking it was a nickel.

1. The appellant contends that the evidence, taking the worst view of it for defendant, establishes no greater crime than that of manslaughter. The evidence was very conflicting. The testimony of one set of eyewitnesses to the controversy and shooting showed that the defendant shot the conductor without any previous hostile demonstrations or threats on the part of the latter, and because the latter denied receiving the $5, and refused to restore it to defendant. Another set of witnesses testified to facts showing that the conductor violently beat the defendant in the face and on the head, and pushed him off the rapidly moving car, and that defendant shot only after the beating had progressed for some time, and just as the defendant was losing his hold on the car—perhaps accidentally. What theory should be adopted from this evidence, and what witnesses should be believed, was for the jury to determine. We cannot interfere with the verdict, where there is, as in this case, a substantial conflict in the evidence; one line of it pointing clearly to guilt of the crime of which the defendant stands convicted, and the other line pointing to a lesser crime, or, perhaps, to justification on the ground of self-defense. Of course, on the theory of the truth of the witnesses who testified to the absence of hostile threats and demonstrations on the part of the conductor prior to the shooting, the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree. However sincerely defendant may have believed that the conductor had $4.90 of defendant's money, yet, for the latter to shoot the former because of his refusal to surrender this money shows an "abandoned and malignant heart," and constitutes murder in the first degree.

2. The following instruction is complained of: "You are instructed that the evidence of certain witnesses as to oral admissions or statements of defendant, alleged to have been made to them, should be received with [great] caution and viewed with scrutiny, and that in considering such testimony you should take into consideration the surrounding circumstances and surroundings of defendant, and the probability or improbability of his having made such statement." Certain oral admissions of defendant, made to the officers soon after his arrest, had been placed in evidence through the testimony of the officers. This instruction must be understood as applying to those admissions, and, thus understood, we cannot see how it can be regarded otherwise than as favorable to defendant. If it were conceded to be erroneous, it could not have harmed the defendant; and this would be so, even if it were directed at some statement that the defendant had previously made, and upon which he relied at the trial to aid his defense. People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 232, 74 Pac. 744.

3. The jury were instructed as follows: "In considering the weight and effect to be given to the evidence of the defendant, while you may consider his manner, and the probability of his statements, taken in connection with all the evidence in the case, and, if convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have the right to reject. But this does not mean that you have a right to arbitrarily reject it. And, in judging of the defendant who has testified before you, you are in duty bound to presume that he has spoken the truth; and, unless that presumption has been legally repelled, his evidence is entitled to full credit." The appellant complains of this instruction, but there is no merit in such complaint. People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470. The language, "if convincing and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it," is found in the instruction in the Cronin Case, 34 Cal. 196, and that case has been often affirmed upon this point.

4. The instructions given as to the law of self-defense were aptly applied by the court to the facts in the case, were full and complete, and there was, therefore, no necessity for giving the further instructions on that point requested by defendant.

5. The court refused to instruct the jury as follows: "The object of the law in permitting parties charged with crime to testify in their own behalf is not merely to enable them to disclose facts wholly within their own knowledge, but to explain their own acts and motives with which they were performed, and to explain, if need be, what they meant, or intended to be understood as meaning, by what they may have said or done at the time of the alleged criminal occurrence." There is nothing in this proposed instruction that would enlighten any person of ordinary intelligence, and nothing in it necessary to be stated to a jury. The court made no mistake in refusing it.

6. Further objections are made to the giving of certain instructions, and to the refusal to give certain others. We have carefully examined the same, and are of opinion that none of them are of sufficient importance to warrant a discussion. The instructions given were full and fair upon every point involved in the case, and were pertinent to the case as made by the evidence, and this was sufficient.

7. Complaint is made that the prosecution was permitted to prove that the conductor, when taken to the hospital, had not a $5 piece on his person. It is urged now that the material thing was, not whether the defendant did in fact give the $5 piece to the conductor, but the important fact to ascertain as bearing on his motives is whether he thought he had delivered it. We take it that, if it could be demonstrated that the defendant had not in fact delivered any $5 piece to the conductor, and it was also shown, as some evidence indicated, that in his first account of the matter he had made statements in conflict with his testimony given at the trial as to the time when he first discovered that he had parted with the $5 piece, all this would tend to show that the defendant was acting in bad faith as to his $5 claim. We think it was proper to show that the conductor was not possessed of a $5 piece, because that fact, taken with the other evidence, tended to show that he had not received a $5 piece from defendant. And his nonreceipt of the piece, taken with the other evidence, tended to show that defendant's claim as to the $5 piece was not in good faith. In this connection, we should not overlook the fact that the defendant was armed with a deadly weapon. Surely the defendant was in a better position than any other person to know whether he had lost a $5 piece, and, if he claimed to have given it to a person to whom he knew he did not give it, this might justify the argument that he was hunting for trouble of a nature that would bring into use the deadly weapon with which he went armed.

8. There was no error in permitting the evidence to stand which tended to show conflicting statements of defendant as to the time when he discovered the loss of his $5.

We can discover no error in the record. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

WILSON v. FISHER, Auditor. (S. F. 4,396.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1905.)

1. Elections—Contest—Appeal—Statutes.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1127, provides that whenever an election is annulled or set aside by the judgment of a superior court, and no appeal has been taken within 10 days thereafter, the commission, if any is issued, is void and the office vacant. Held, that the term "commission," as so used, included a "certificate of election" issued to petitioner as superintendent of schools, so that, on no appeal being taken within 10 days after judgment declaring petitioner's certificate of election invalid in a contest regularly instituted, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1111–1127, the judgment rendered petitioner's certificate finally ineffectual as evidence of title to the office.

2. Same—Application of Statute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1127, declaring that whenever an election is annulled by a judgment of the superior court, and no appeal is taken within 10 days, the commission is void, applies only to contests specified in the title of which the section is a part, and has reference only to contests in regard to offices "to be exercised" in "a county, city and county, city or any political subdivision of either," as provided by section 1111, in every which case, except that of the office of judge of the superior court, the only "commission" is their certificate of election.

3. Same—Salary Pending Appeal.

Pol. Code, § 936, provides that, when the title of the incumbent of any office of the state is contested by proceedings instituted in any court for that purpose, no warrant can thereafter be drawn or paid for any part of his salary until such proceedings have been finally determined, except in case of one who holds the certificate of election or commission of office and discharges the duties of the office, who shall receive the salary as if no contest was pending. Held that, where a judgment annulling petitioner's certificate of election to the office of superintendent of schools of a county had become final by his failure to appeal within 10 days, as required by section 1127, Code Civ. Proc., he was not entitled to recover salary pending an appeal subsequently taken.

In Bank. Petition by S. B. Wilson for writ of mandate against John P. Fisher, as auditor of El Dorado county. Writ denied.

W. F. Bray, for petitioner. C. A. Swisler, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is a proceeding instituted in this court to obtain the issuance of a writ of mandate requiring the defendant, as auditor of El Dorado county, to draw his warrant for the salary of plaintiff, Wilson, as superintendent of schools of said county, for the month of July, 1905. Plaintiff has been holding said office ever since January, 1903, and discharging the duties thereof, under a certificate of election issued in pursuance of a declaration that he had been duly elected to said office, made by the board of supervisors of said county on their canvass of the returns of the general election of November 4, 1902. A contest of his right to said office was regularly instituted, under the provisions of title 2, part 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the contesting of certain elections (sections 1111–1127) by one T. E. McCarthy, who had been a candidate for the same office at said election. Upon the first trial of said contest judgment was entered confirming the election of plaintiff; but upon appeal to this court such judgment was reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings. McCarthy v. Wilson, 82 Pac. 243. A new trial of the contest was thereupon had in the superior court, resulting in a judgment, entered June 12, 1905, annulling and setting aside the election of plaintiff herein, and declaring the contestant, McCarthy, to have been duly elected at said election. On June 17, 1905, notice of the entry of said judgment was served on the plaintiff herein. No appeal was taken by plaintiff herein from said judgment within 10 days after the entry of said judgment, or within 10 days after the service on him of the notice of entry thereof; but on June 29, 1905, he served and filed his notice of appeal from said judgment, and on July 1, 1905, he filed his undertaking on appeal.

The claim of defendant is that, by reason of the failure of plaintiff to take an appeal from the judgment annulling and setting aside his election within 10 days from the service of notice of the entry of said judgment upon him, the certificate of election theretofore issued to him became void, and the office vacant, and that consequently he is not now entitled to any salary for the month of July, 1905. This claim is based upon section 1127 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows, viz.: "Whenever an election is annulled or set aside by the judgment of the superior court, and no appeal has been taken within ten days thereafter, the commission, if any has issued, is void, and the office vacant." We think that there can be no doubt that, under the plain terms of this statute, its effect is to render a judgment of the superior court annulling and setting aside an election in a proceeding brought under the provisions of title 2, part 3, Code Civ. Proc., final upon the question as to the validity of any commission or certificate of election that may have been issued to the incumbent whose election has thereby been set aside, unless an appeal be taken from such judgment within 10 days from the entry thereof; in other words, that such judgment, after the lapse of 10 days without appeal taken therefrom, finally renders such certificate ineffectual as evidence of title to the office. There can be no question that the word "commission," as used in this section, includes a "certificate of election" issued by the clerk of a county upon the declaration of election made by the board of supervisors thereof, sitting as a canvassing board. There is no material difference, in effect, between a "commission" and a "certificate of election." They both simply constitute official notice of election or appointment to the person named therein (People v. Perkins, 85 Cal. 509, 512, 26 Pac. 245; People v. Shaver, 127 Cal. 347, 350, 59 Pac. 784), and evidence of title to the office (Bledsoe v. Colgan, 138 Cal. 34, 36, 39, 70 Pac. 924). As to all officers elected by the people, "whose commissions are not otherwise provided for," the Governor of the state must issue a "commission" (Pol. Code, § 891, subd. 1), and this commission constitutes the only tangible evidence of title to the office. In the case of persons elected by the people to an office to be exercised in a single county, or subdivision thereof, the only commission provided for by law, except in the single case of a person elected to the office of judge of the superior court, is what is called a "certificate of election," to be issued by the county clerk under the seal of the superior court. Pol. Code, §§ 1283, 1284. It has never been doubted that this certificate constitutes a commission, within the meaning of subdivision 1, section 891, Pol. Code, so as to obviate the necessity of the issuance of a commission by the Governor, and is the legal evidence of the person's title to the office. Section 1127, Code Civ. Proc., is, of course, applicable only to the contests specified in the title of which it is a part, and that title has reference only to contests in regard to offices "to be exercised" in "a county, city and county, city, or any political subdivision of either" (section 1111, Code Civ. Proc.), in every which case, except in that of the office of judge of the superior court, the only commission is the "certificate of election." The language of the section clearly shows that the word "commission," therein used, was intended to cover any such official evidence of title to the office as had been issued by the proper authority, whether the same be technically known as a "commission" or a "certificate of election." Under the express terms of this statute, if no appeal be taken within 10 days, this official evidence of title to the office is finally invalidated and annulled, rendered of no further legal force or effect, and a subsequent appeal could not operate to restore it to its original status. An appeal only operates, at most, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, to preserve the status existing at the time of the appeal.

The only question involved in this proceeding being the question as to whether plaintiff is now entitled to the salary claimed, it is unnecessary, in view of other provisions of the law, to determine further as to the effect of this section. It being determined that his certificate of election to such office has been finally annulled and is void, it follows, under section 936, Pol. Code, that if his subsequent appeal, taken after the expiration of the 10 days, is effectual for any purpose, and the contest may therefore be held to be still pending, no warrant can be drawn for any part of his salary until the contest has been finally determined. That section in effect provides that, when the title of the incumbent of any office in the state is contested by proceedings instituted in any court for that purpose, no warrant can thereafter be drawn or paid for any part of his salary until such proceedings have been finally determined, except in the single case of one "who holds the certificate of election or commission of office, and discharges the duties of the office," who shall receive the salary of the office "the same as if no such contest or proceeding was pending." To entitle him to salary during the pendency of a contest involving his title to the office, the incumbent must bring himself within this exception to the general rule declared by the section; in other words, he must not only be the incumbent discharging the duties of the office, but he must also hold the certificate of election or commission of office. Bledsoe v. Colgan, 138 Cal. 34, 70 Pac. 924. This means, of course, a certificate of election or commission of office that is in force, and not one that has been irrevocably nullified. One cannot be said to hold the certificate of election or commission of office, where the effect of a judgment of the superior court has been to finally render what was originally such a certificate or commission of no further legal force or effect. The plain intent of section 936, Pol. Code, was to allow the payment of salary pending contest only to the incumbent who possesses such legal evidence of title to the office as is furnished by a certificate of election or commission of office, and, when the certificate once held by him has been finally rendered void, it no longer constitutes such evidence.

It has been suggested that the effect of section 1127, Code Civ. Proc., is to make a judgment of a superior court annulling and setting aside an election in a proceeding of this character final for all purposes unless an appeal be taken within 10 days. As to this, however, as already stated, it is unnecessary to express an opinion here. Of the effect of the judgment in this case upon the certificate of election or commission of office, and consequently upon the right of the incumbent to salary, we have no doubt, and that is sufficient for all the purposes of this proceeding. The case of Wilson v. Fisher, 140 Cal. 188, 73 Pac. 850, is, of course, not applicable here. The incumbent there was held entitled to his salary pending an appeal from a judgment in his favor. His election had there been confirmed, and his certificate of election was in full force. In Anderson v. Browning, 140 Cal. 222, 73 Pac. 986, a case more nearly in point, as there was an appeal by the incumbent from a judgment annulling and setting aside his election, the appeal was taken within 10 days from the date of the judgment, and the effect of the appeal taken within the prescribed time was to stay the operation of the judgment and continue the certificate in force unimpaired during the pendency of the appeal.

The alternative writ heretofore issued must be discharged, and the proceeding dismissed; and it is so ordered.

(Sac. 1,185.)

1. MINES—APPLICATION FOR PATENT—CERTIFICATE—ASSESSMENT WORK—FORFEITURE FOR NONPERFORMANCE.

Where, after an application for a patent to a mining claim and full payment of the price, the purchasers received their final certificate of purchase in due form, their claims were not subject to forfeiture for nonperformance of assessed labor, nor were they subject to forfeiture or to relocation as long as such certificate remained uncanceled.

2. SAME—NOTICE TO ADVERSE CLAIMANTS—PUBLICATION—ERRORS.

Where by mistake of the officers of the Land Department the published notice to adverse claimants of an application for a patent to certain mining claims did not contain a legally sufficient description of the premises, but notwithstanding this a final certificate of purchase was issued to the claimants, and 10 years after an order was made by the Commissioner of the Land Office requiring publication of a supplemental notice to cure such defect, an order subsequently entered, after such publication, canceling the certificate of purchase as of the date of the republication order, was erroneous.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Rehearing denied October 20, 1905.

John M. Fulweiler, for appellants. Tuttle & Tuttle, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Defendants, as the owners of certain mining claims, applied to the United States Land Office for a patent. Within due time after the publication of the notice of the application, plaintiff filed its protest and adverse claim to the issuance of the patent, the Land Office suspended all proceedings in the matter of the application, and plaintiff then regularly commenced its suit upon the equity side of the court for the determination of the adverse and conflicting claims. It obtained judgment, and the defendants appeal.

It appears that prior to 1884 the appellants and their predecessors in interest had made valid mining locations on the premises in controversy, and were in the lawful possession of the mining claims on the 6th day of January, 1885. On this day they filed in the United States Land Office at Sacramento their application for a patent for the mining claims, together with the necessary and proper papers and proofs required by law and the rules of the Land Office. On the 6th of January, 1885, the officers of the Land Office made an order for the publication of the notice of application for the patent, and the notice for publication was drafted by the land officers and delivered to the printer and publisher of the designated newspaper to be published for the statutory length of time. The plat and field notes posted and filed in the land office show a legally sufficient description of the premises in controversy, but in the published notice of application for a patent there was an error in the omission of a connecting line with its course and distance. No adverse claims of any kind were presented. The necessary final proofs were made. The applicants paid the full price required by law, and received their final certificate of purchase in due form of law. The final proofs and papers and evidence of payment were forwarded to the General Land Office at Washington, where they remained unquestioned until the 23d day of July, 1895. No patent, however, had been issued. On the 23d day of July, 1895, an order was made by the Commissioner of the Land Office, in which all these matters were set forth, directing that a "supplemental notice of the application for a patent" be published for the statutory period, to cure the defect in the former published notice; it being stated in the letter and order that "in view of the above omission the locus of said claim could not be ascertained by parties who might have desired to protect interests of their own by filing adverse claims." From time to time extensions were regularly granted to the applicants within which to perform the acts required by the last decision, and the publication was actually commenced on the 14th day of December, 1900, and ended on the 15th day of February, 1901. The original complaint in this action was filed on the 22d day of December, 1900. The second amended complaint, upon which trial was had, was filed February 5, 1902. During all of this time the final certificate of purchase remained unrecalled and uncanceled. In November, 1901, this respondent, as adverse claimant, moved the department, asking that the final receipt or certificate be canceled. The Commissioner, on November 22, 1901, formally denied the motion. It then appealed, and the Secretary of the Interior, on April 22, 1902, reversed the decision of the Commissioner, and in it not only ordered the certificate canceled, but declared that it must be treated as canceled of date July 23, 1895, when the Commissioner called for the publication of a supplemental notice; the honorable Secretary using this language: "The original notice being fatally defective, it was rejected for that reason. Under the law, when the notice fell, the entry fell also. It no longer had any basis to support it. It must be treated, therefore, as though it had been canceled of record at the time the notice was finally adjudicated to be insufficient. The adjudication of the insufficiency of the notice was equivalent to a determination that the entry had been erroneously allowed, and should be canceled." On July 9, 1900, plaintiff made its entry upon the property and its discovery of a lode, and caused notices of location to be posted and recorded. The defendants, relying upon their certificate of purchase, had performed no labor upon the lands since its issuance. It is undisputed that as long as the certificate remained uncanceled the claims were not forfeited for nonperformance of labor and were not subject to relocation. Richter v. Riley, 22 Cal. 639; Combs v. Jelly, 28 Cal. 498. It appears, moreover, that the appellants had furnished in 1885 accurate descriptions of their claims, sworn to by the United States Surveyor General, and that the error in the original published notice was exclusively the error of officers of the United States in not properly copying the description correctly made by the Surveyor General.

The situation thus presented is that appellants, having done all in their power to do, and having made final proof and payment and received their final certificate of purchase, were, 10 years after the date of it, informed by the Commissioner of the Land Office that there must be published a supplemental notice of their application for a patent or their certificate would be canceled. In the order so promulgated it was set forth that the original publication was not sufficient to give notice to adverse claimants of the locus of the land. The adverse claimants thus referred to could have been those, and those only, whose claims existed at and prior to the time of the original application. Appellants proceeded duly to comply with the orders of the department, and the supplemental notice required was published. Application was made to the department during this time for a cancellation of their certificate, and the application was denied. They relied, as they had a right to rely, during all of this time, upon the fact that the certificate relieved them from the necessity of performing annual labor upon their claims. Subsequently the Secretary, without a hearing given to the appellants, ordered the certificate canceled as of a date many years previous, the legal effect of which, if this retroactive order of cancellation of the Secretary is to be deemed valid in point of law, being to strip the appellants of all their rights, through no fault of their own, with no charge of fraud gainst them, and while they were relying upon the security of their uncanceled certificate of purchase, which the department, upon application, had formally refused to cancel. "It is a well-established principle," says the Supreme Court of the United States in Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How. 314, 13 L. Ed. 153, "that, where an individual in the prosecution of a right does everything which the law requires of him to do, and he fails to attain his right by the misconduct or neglect of a public officer, the law will protect him." This principle is peculiarly applicable to a case like the present, where an appeal is made to the equity side of the court. We think the honorable Secretary was without power to order a retroactive cancellation, so as to cut out the right of the original entryman who was without fault, and to clear the way for the jumping of his claims by one who not only never asserted an adverse claim at the time of the original entry and application, but who makes his entry 15 or more years later, basing his right wholly upon the default of the appellants to perform annual labor. The officers of the Land Department are not above the law. As is said in Hosmer v. Wallace, 47 Cal. 461, they cannot constitute themselves an imperium in imperio; and, as said in Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. 72, 20 L. Ed. 485, "courts of equity have a power to inquire into and correct mistakes, injustice, and wrong in judicial and executive action when it invades private rights." We believe that the Secretary, in promulgating the order for retroactive cancellation of the certificate without notice to the bona fide owners thereof, under the circumstances presented without controversy in this case, acted arbitrarily and in excess of his powers, and, as matter of equity, his ruling cannot be given judicial effect. For, as is said in Parsons v. Venzke, 164 U. S. 89, 17 Sup. Ct. 27, 41 L. Ed. 360, the jurisdiction of the Land Department "is not an arbitrary or unlimited one, to be exercised without notice to the parties interested, nor one beyond judicial review under the same conditions as other orders and rulings of the Land Department." This language was itself used in reference to the power of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior to cancel and set aside a pre-emption entry. Appellants had a perfect right, under the orders and rulings of the department, the original error having arisen through no fault of theirs, to rely upon the certificate of purchase, and, thus relying, to refrain from doing annual labor upon their claims until such time as notice was brought home to them that they could no longer rely upon the security of their certificate because it had been canceled, and it was not within the power of the department, under the indicated circumstances, to order a retroactive cancellation in impairment of the appellants' rights.

The cancellation must therefore, in point of law and equity, be deemed to have been made and to be effective from the date of the Secretary's letter, and the judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 19, 1905.)

1. DEEDS—CONSIDERATION—FUTURE SUPPORT.

Where defendants contracted to maintain and support plaintiff during every alternate two months of his natural life and pay all his existing debts and obligations in consideration of a conveyance of certain real estate, and for a long period of time performed services and paid money thereunder, the deed was based on a sufficient consideration.

2. CONTRACT—VALIDITY—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Where defendants agreed to furnish support to plaintiff, and to pay certain of his debts for the remainder of his life, in consideration of a conveyance of certain land, which was made to them, and defendants performed a portion of such contract, it could not be held invalid because it was not a proper subject of specific performance.

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PAROL CONTRACT—PART PERFORMANCE.

A parol contract by defendants to furnish certain support and pay certain debts of plaintiff in consideration of a conveyance of real estate, having been partially performed by defendants and the land having been conveyed, was not within the statute of frauds.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by J. M. Norris against Sarah Lilly and another. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Warren Sexton and R. H. Latimer, for appellants. J. M. McGee, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued for a cancellation of a deed to certain real property which he had made to defendants, and for the recovery of the value of certain personal property, farming utensils, and the like, which were upon the land at the time of the conveyance. His complaint alleged that he was an old man, 74 years of age, and that, induced by the promises of the defendants that they would provide support and maintenance for him during every alternate two months of his natural life and would pay all his existing debts and obligations, he executed to them a deed of all his realty. He alleged that the promises and representations were made in bad faith with intent to deceive and defraud him of his property, that the promises were made without any intent on the part of defendants to perform them, and that in fact they had wholly failed and neglected to provide him with support and maintenance, nor had they paid any of his debts. The answer denied the bad faith and fraud. It agreed with the complaint upon the question of the moving consideration for the deed, and averred complete performance upon the part of defendants—the payment of his debts and his maintenance and support until plaintiff refused further to accept such support and maintenance. The performance of defendants' contract is alleged to have continued from the winter of 1896 until October, 1902. They specifically aver a payment of doctor's bills, funeral expenses, etc., on behalf of the plaintiff in excess of the sum of $135, and, finally, they allege that they never have refused to comply with any of the terms of the contract, and stand ready and willing at all times to perform them all. Such, in brief, are the pleadings in the case, and upon them the court rendered its judgment that the deed of plaintiff to defendants be canceled, that the defendants execute a deed of conveyance of the property to plaintiff, and that plaintiff have his costs of suit. From the judgment so rendered on the pleadings the defendants appeal.

From the argument of the respondent upon this appeal it appears that the trial court based its decision and judgment upon the case of Grimmer v. Carlton, 93 Cal. 189, 28 Pac. 1043, 27 Am. St. Rep. 171, and in effect held that, putting out of consideration the issue raised upon the question of fraud, the contract itself, being one that could not be specifically enforced against the defendants, made the deed void, or, at least, voidable, and subject to cancellation at the instance of the grantor without any further evidence upon the matter. It is but just to the learned judge of the trial court to say that his ruling in this regard draws support from the case to which we have adverted. That case itself, however, is at variance with other adjudications of this court, as well as with the whole current of authority upon the subject, and cannot longer be considered as an authoritative expression of the law. The mere fact that a contract is not specifically enforceable does not render it either void or voidable. An agreement to do any act or series of acts which the promisor, but for his agreement, was under no obligation to perform, has always been deemed an ample consideration for any contract, transfer, or conveyance, whether the doing of such act or acts could be specifically enforced or not. If in such a case as this, the promisor had refused to execute the contract, an action for rescission would lie, but this rescission would involve a cancellation of the deed only upon terms meet in equity. In the very case here pleaded, if the defendants, after the payment of this money and after years of personal service, had refused to proceed further with the contract, plaintiff unquestionably would have been entitled to rescind; but in rescinding the court in equity would take cognizance of the value of the services rendered and the moneys paid, the value of the occupation of the land by the promisors, and reach its conclusion under the evidence as to the terms upon which a cancellation of the deed would be decreed. Under the case, however, presented by these pleadings, issue was squarely joined upon the question of the breach of the contract, and, if it be that defendants have performed the obligations imposed upon them and stand ready for a continued performance of them, plaintiff has no cause of action whatever. This contract was executed by the plaintiff by his deed. The consideration of the defendants was oral, but such oral consideration is not in dispute between the parties, and is sufficient to support the contract. Hays v. Montgomery, 118 Ind. 91, 20 N. E. 646; Nichols, etc., v. Burch (Ind. Sup.) 27 N. E. 737. And if any doubt could exist upon this point, the continued performance of the contract by the promisors, as alleged, is sufficient execution to take the case out of the statute of frauds. Such, indeed, was held to be the case in Manning v. Franklin, 81 Cal. 205, 22 Pac. 550, where the whole contract, involving the erection of a dwelling house upon the one hand for a life estate to be granted upon the other, was held to be taken out of the statute of frauds by a part performance in the erection of the building and the rendering of the personal services. Grimmer v. Carlton, as we have said, seems to have entertained the mistaken notion that a contract such as this was void because not specifically enforceable, whereas, in truth, such a contract, in the absence of fraud, is absolutely valid, and is no more voidable because not capable of specific performance than would be any other of the myriad forms of like contracts which are daily entered into and daily performed, and for the breach of which upon the part of the promisor the promisee has his action for rescission or for damages, as the circumstances may justify and warrant. It is only necessary upon this proposition to refer to the footnote to the case of Grimmer v. Carlton, as reported in 27 Am. St. Rep., at page 171, and also to the footnote to Devlin on Deeds, par. 807, where the same case comes under review. That case having been decided upon the mistaken proposition of law that the contract was void, it is, perhaps, superfluous to point out that issues in this action are joined upon all the vital matters, and that, where issue is joined upon any single material proposition, a judgment on the pleadings is improper. Widmer v. Martin, 87 Cal. 88, 25 Pac. 264; Ghiradelli v. McDermott, 22 Cal. 539; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 332, 7 Pac. 753.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

WARD LAND & STOCK CO. v. MAPES.

(Sac. 1,167.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 19, 1905.)

1. Trover and Conversion—Ownership of Property—Question for Jury.

Where, in an action to recover the value of cattle sold to defendant under an execution against H., plaintiff claimed that the cattle had been sold to H. under a conditional sale, and plaintiff's manager testified that H. agreed to pay for the cattle if he took them, and H. denied that he made any agreement to pay for the cattle in case he did not take them, whether the transaction amounted to an absolute sale of the cattle or was a mere agreement to sell was for the jury.

2. Same—Instructions.

Where, in an action for the value of certain cattle alleged to have been sold to H. under a conditional sale, the only important condition about which there was any controversy was that the title should not pass to H. until the price was paid or secured, concerning which the court properly charged that if the sale was understood to be a conditional sale, and that the title was not to pass to H., then the jury should find for plaintiff, but, if it was intended and agreed that title should pass or vest in H. unconditionally, then the jury should find for defendant, it was immaterial that the court's definition of a "conditional sale," as used in some of the instructions given, was too broad.

3. Trial—Misleading Requests.

In an action to recover the value of cattle alleged to have been sold to H. under a conditional sale, a requested instruction containing a statement concerning the policy of the law in reference to secret liens and charges on personal property and the requirements of the law in reference to chattel mortgages or pledges of personal property to secure indebtedness, not being applicable to the evidence in the case, was properly refused as misleading.

4. Foreign Corporations — Actions—Articles of Incorporation—Filing.

Civ. Code, § 299, providing that no foreign corporation shall maintain any action until it shall have filed a certified copy of its articles of incorporation in California, does not prevent a corporation not having complied with such section from commencing an action, and hence an objection for such disqualifiation was not sustainable where the corporation filed a certified copy of its articles prior to the filing of its amended complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Rehearing denied October 20, 1905.

Goodwin & Goodwin and Garoutte & Goodwin, for appellant. N. J. Barry, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This action was brought to recover the alleged value of cattle sold to the defendant on execution as the property of E. H. Hamlin, Jr., by the defendant on the 26th of April, 1901. The plaintiff claimed that the cattle so sold belonged to it, whereas the defendant claimed that the cattle belonged to Hamlin. The verdict in the court below went for the plaintiff, in the sum of $4,358.72⅙, for which sum judgment was thereupon rendered, together with interest and costs. The appeal was taken from the judgment within 60 days, upon a bill of exceptions containing the evidence. The plaintiff is a corporation organized in the state of Nevada, engaged in the business of raising and selling live stock, particularly cattle. The corporation was managed and controlled by O. M. and A. M. Ward. In the latter part of the winter of 1900–01, the plaintiff brought two bunches of cattle to Honey Lake Valley, Lassen county, this state, to be fed for beef and sold. E. H. Hamlin was then engaged in buying beef cattle as the agent of W. & P. Nichols, bankers of Dutch Flat, Placer county, Cal., the cattle to be disposed of by Hamlin in certain markets controlled by him. In order to meet the demands of his market it was necessary for Hamlin to secure cattle ahead, place them on feed, and be prepared to meet the demands of his market as they arose. Plaintiff made an agreement with Hamlin in reference to the sale of cattle, and set a price upon the cattle of different grades, and Hamlin agreed to pay for the feeding of the cattle and was to have the right to take the cattle out for market in such numbers as he desired as his needs required; but it is claimed on the part of the plaintiff and respondent that under the agreement made between it and Hamlin before he took any cattle out of the corral he should place a check covering the value of the cattle taken out in the Nevada Bank, at Reno, Nev., or pay the amount to one of the Ward brothers; and that it was agreed that the title to the cattle was at all times to remain in the plaintiff until payment was made by Hamlin, as stated. Hamlin became indebted to the defendant on account of feed sold to him, and, the defendant supposing the cattle in question to have been bought by Hamlin from the plaintiff and that they were Hamlin's cattle, in an action based on such indebtedness the cattle were attached, and after judgment recovered were sold upon execution, as already stated.

The contention on the part of the appellant is that the sale of the cattle by the plaintiff to Hamlin was an absolute sale, and they therefore became the property of Hamlin, notwithstanding the purchase price had not been paid. On the trial, in Hamlin's testimony, he says: "I made no agreement to pay for these cattle in case I did not take them." And O. W. Ward, one of the managers of the plaintiff, says: "He agreed to pay for them if he took them." Whether the transaction between the plaintiff and Hamlin amounted to an absolute sale of the cattle, or was a mere agreement to sell, generally termed a "conditional sale," was a question to be ascertained and found by the jury from the evidence produced at the trial. "An agreement to sell is a contract by which one engages, for a price, to transfer to another the title to a certain thing." Civ. Code, § 1727. It is shown in this case that the plaintiff and Hamlin agreed upon the price of the different grades of stock to be sold, and that, when the prices thus fixed should be paid by Hamlin, then such stock so paid for became his. A similar question arose in Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 56 Pac. 339, and the court in discussing that case says: "The nature of the contract between plaintiffs and Van Allen first invites consideration. By appellants it is insisted that it shows an absolute sale of the property; by respondent, that the contract is one of conditional sale. We think the latter construction is the true one. Conditional sales are recognized in this state to the fullest extent [citing a long list of cases]. And it is well settled that even bona fide purchasers from the person to whom the personal property is delivered under an executory contract of sale get no valid claim to the property [citing cases]." Benjamin on Sales, 320, says: "Where the buyer is by contract bound to do anything as a condition either precedent or concurrent on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer." Without reviewing the evidence in detail in this case, it is enough to say that it is sufficient to support the verdict.

Appellant's counsel in his brief takes exception to instructions given by the court numbered 4, 5, 7, and 8. It is contended that the definition of a conditional sale given in some of these instructions is too broad, and conflicts with that given in the others, and that the phrase "conditional sale" is used in others without qualification or definition, and that, consequently, the instructions were misleading and could only have served the purpose of mystifying the jury. It may be conceded that if the case involved a contract of sale containing conditions not affecting, or not preventing, an immediate transfer of the title, and there had been, on the trial, a controversy over some such conditions, some of the instructions given would have been confusing, and possibly erroneous. But the only condition of the contract of sale in question which was at all important, or about which there was any controversy at the trial, was the condition that the title to the cattle should not pass to Hamlin until the price was paid or secured. The quesion of the existence of this condition was the decisive point of fact in the case to be decided by the jury. Concerning this the court, in instruction 7, properly instructed the jury as follows: "(7) If you find from the evidence that the sale of the cattle by plaintiff to Hamlin was intended, agreed, and understood to be a conditional sale, and that the title to the cattle was not to pass or vest absolutely or unconditionally in Hamlin, then you should find for plaintiff. But if you find, from the evidence, that it was intended, agreed, and understood by plaintiff and Hamlin that the title to the cattle was to pass to and vest in Hamlin absolutely and unconditionally, then you should find for the defendant." In view of the issues and the evidence given at the trial, all the references to a "conditional sale" in the other instructions must have been intended by the court, and would necessarily have been understood by the jury, to refer to the condition concerning the transfer of title, which had been the chief subject of dispute. When so understood, all the instructions on the subject were substantially correct. It must be presumed that the jury was composed of intelligent men, and as such they could easily understand the distinction between an absolute sale and one with a condition to be complied with before the title passed, to which their attention was called by the instructions.

It is also contended by appellant's counsel that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction No. 3 asked defendant: "(3) The court instructs you that conditional sales as defined by the court are enforced by the courts of this state when clearly established, but that the policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges upon personal property, and that in this state neat cattle can be pledged or mortgaged to secure the payment of a debt upon the observance by the parties of certain formalities designed by the law to insure good faith and to give notice to the world of the character of the transaction. These provisions are, as to pledge, that the party to be secured must retain the possession of the property pledged, or some person other than the pledgor, or must retain such possession for him, and, as to a mortgage, that it must be signed and acknowledged by the mortgagor, and must have attached thereto an affidavit by the mortgagor and mortgagee that the same is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors of the mortgagor, and it must be immediately recorded with the recorder of the county in which the property affected is situated. These provisions cannot be evaded by any mere shuffling of words. And therefore the court instructs you that where it is clear from the whole transaction that the ownership of the property was intended to be transferred for all practical purposes, and that the seller only intended to reserve a security for the price, any characterization of the transaction by the parties, or any mere denial of its legal effect, will not be regarded. The question, it is true, is one of intention, but the intention must be collected from the whole transaction, and not from any particular feature of it; and if you believe from the evidence that the Ward Land & Stock Company intended by its agreement to transfer to E. H. Hamlin, Jr., or through him to W. & D. Nichols, the ownership of the cattle on the James Mapes place for all practical purposes, and that its intention in making the agreement was only to reserve a security for the price, then the court instructs you that title passed from the corporation, and you must find for the defendant." A great portion of this offered instruction is taken up with a statement concerning the policy of the law in reference to secret liens and charges upon personal property and the requirements of the law in reference to chattel mortgages or pledges of personal property as security for indebtedness. These questions are entirely outside of the evidence in the case, and calculated to mislead the jury. The policy of the law in reference to any particular question may aid the court in its interpretation or construction of the law in any question that may arise in any case before it; but this is not the duty of the jury. It is the province of the jury to arrive at and determine the ultimate facts from the evidence produced in the case. Portions of the instruction in question, if detached from the objectionable portions referred to, might have been properly given; but they are embraced substantially in those given, and, consequently, the appellant suffered no harm in the refusal of the judge to give the instruction in question.

The plaintiff, as already stated, is a corporation organized in the state of Nevada, and is a foreign corporation as to this state, and had not filed its articles of incorporation in this state, as required of foreign corporations, prior to the commencement of the action; but it did do so prior to filing its amended complaint. The language of the law is that the foreign corporation which has not complied with said act shall not "maintain or defend any action or proceeding in any court of this state until such corporation shall have complied with the provisions of section 1 of this act." Upon this state of the case, appellant contends that a compliance with the act in question is a condition precedent to the commencement of the action, and therefore that the action should have been dismissed. This question, however, was directly decided by this court adversely to the contention of appellant in California Sav. & L. Soc. v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525. In the opinion in that case it was said: "At the commencement of this action the plaintiff had not filed the certified copy with the county clerk of Madera county; but it did file it with that officer several months before defendant filed his amended answer setting up this defense, so that at the time this defense was pleaded by the defendant the plaintiff had complied with the statute. The defense pleaded by the defendant was therefore unavailing to him to prevent the plaintiff from thereafter maintaining the action. Section 299, Civ. Code, does not declare that the plaintiff shall not commence an action in any county unless it has filed a certified copy in the office of the county clerk, but merely declares that it shall not maintain an action until it has filed it. To maintain an action is not the same as to commence an action, but implies that the action has already been commenced." Appellant's counsel intimate that the case just cited was not well considered, and suggest that the subsequent case of Keystone, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 738, 72 Pac. 398, practically overruled the former case. This latter case involved a different question, however. The Paraiso Oil Company, a foreign corporation, had filed its petition in voluntary insolvency in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and the Keystone Driller Company, its creditor, made application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the superior court from entertaining said petition in insolvency or acting upon the case. In the opinion, passing upon the question, it is said: "By the very terms of the insolvent law, a corporation whose residence is outside of the state cannot become a voluntary insolvent, inasmuch as the petition must be filed in the county in which the petitioner resides. Insolvency Law, § 2. This privilege of becoming a voluntary insolvent can be availed of only by a resident of the state, whether a natural or artificial person. The act itself declares that it is for the relief of insolvent debtors, as well as for the protection of creditors. The state is under no obligations to relieve a foreign corporation from its obligations, particularly of a class of the Paraiso Oil Company, very appropriately designated by counsel as a 'tramp corporation.' The only mention of 'foreign corporations' that is made in the insolvency law is in section 16, which is part of chapter 3, entitled 'Involuntary Insolvency.'" And it was held that said foreign corporation could not become a voluntary insolvent, and that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco had no jurisdiction to entertain its petition in that behalf, or to proceed further in the matter, and this court, therefore, ordered a peremptory writ of prohibition to issue. The case of California Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Harris, already cited, was not referred to in the latter case, and there is nothing to show that there was any intention to overrule or qualify it. In Ryan Live Stock & Feeding Co. v. Kelly, 81 Pac. 470, decided August, 1905, by the Supreme Court of Kansas, the same question was raised as in the case at bar, and the court there say: "The plaintiff in this case is a private foreign corporation, and it was conceded upon the trial that it had not at the commencement of the action complied with the corporation laws of the state of Kansas; but it was proven that prior to the trial in the case it had complied therewith, and had received a certificate from the Secretary of State evidencing that fact. The sole question presented in this case is whether the corporation, not having filed a statement and procured the certificate required by law before the commencement of the action, could comply with the law thereafter, and maintain the action. The court below decided this question in the negative, and dismissed the action. Its judgment is reversed"—citing in support of the opinion a number of cases to the same point. The court, therefore, had jurisdiction to try the cause.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte HOLLAND.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1905.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LIBERTY—POLICE POWER—RIGHT TO CONTRACT.

The provisions in the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution and in Const. Cal. art. 1, § 1, guarantying liberty, prohibit the Legislature from prohibiting or interfering with the right of the citizen to make contracts touching the acquisition, protection, management, and enjoyment of property, which do not wrongfully affect the rights of others or the public safety, health, or morals.

2. SAME—TRADING STAMPS AS CONTRACTS—PROHIBITING USE—VALIDITY.

A trading stamp given by a merchant to a customer buying goods, which entitles him after accumulating a certain number to use them to the extent of their face value in payment for other goods of the merchant or goods of one who has agreed to redeem them, has none of the characteristics of a lottery or a gambling scheme, but is a contract which the Legislature cannot prohibit, or with which it cannot interfere under the guise of regulation under its police power, and the anti-trade stamp or coupon act (St. 1905, p. 67), attempting to do so, is void.

3. SAME—ELEMENT OF CHANCE.

The anti-trade stamp or coupon act (St. 1905, p. 67), prohibiting the issuance of trading stamps by a merchant to a customer buying goods, is not valid, because it prohibits the giving of a trading stamp "for anything unidentified or unselected by the purchaser at or before the time of sale," and which at the time of sale shall not be "completely identified beyond the necessity of any further selection"; there being no element of chance in the transaction, whether the purchaser is allowed to make his selection when ready to do so, or whether he be compelled at the time of the purchase to limit his choice.

4. SAME.

The act cannot be sustained on the ground that it is proper as protecting the holders of trading stamps from the fraud of those who issued them.

In Bank. Separate applications for writs of habeas corpus by Charles F. Drexel and by J. C. Holland against Jeremiah F. Dinan, chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, for the discharge of the petitioners from an alleged imprisonment. Petitioners discharged.

W. C. Van Fleet, Mastick, Van Fleet & Mastick, H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, and H. M. Anthony, for petitioners. Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty. (John Garber, Allen G. Wright, Charles A. Son, and John Garber, of counsel), for respondent. Geo. S. Hupp, amicus curiæ.

McFARLAND, J. These two causes are submitted together and involve the same questions. Each is a petitioner upon habeas corpus to be discharged from what is alleged to be an illegal imprisonment. Each petitioner is imprisoned upon a charge of misdemeanor for violating a certain act of the Legislature of this state, approved March 7, 1905, which may be generally designated as the "Anti-Trade Stamp or Coupon Act" (St. 1905, p. 67); and each contends that said act is invalid and is violative of section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of California, which declares that all men have the inalienable rights "of enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and defending property, and pursuing and obtaining life and happiness," and of section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of the United States. If said act of March 7th is constitutional, then each petitioner should be remanded; if unconstitutional, then each should be discharged.

It is not necessary to enter here upon a wide discussion of the personal rights of citizens which are guarantied by the constitutional provisions above noticed. They are established and declared by numerous decisions of many American courts. It is sufficient to quote the following declarations from two or three of the leading cases, each aptly stating the law upon the subject. The law as established in other states is very clearly expressed in Young v. Commonwealth, 101 Va. 853, 45 S. E. 327, where the Supreme Court of Virginia say: "The word 'liberty,' as used in the Constitution of the United States and the several states, has frequently been construed, and means more than mere freedom from restraint. It means, not merely the right to go where one chooses, but to do such acts as he may judge best for his interest, not inconsistent with the equal rights of others; that is, to follow such pursuits as may be best adapted to his faculties, and which will give him the highest enjoyment. The liberty mentioned is deemed to embrace the right of the citizen to be free in the enjoyment of all his faculties, to be free to use them in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood by any lawful calling, and for that purpose to enter into all contracts which may be proper, necessary, and essential to his carrying out to a successful conclusion the purpose above mentioned. These are individual rights, formulated as such under the phrase 'pursuit of happiness,' in the Declaration of Independence, which begins with the fundamental proposition that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—citing many cases. And the court further declare that a statute prohibiting, regulating, or interfering with private business can be upheld only under the police power, and that the police power can be rightfully exercised only when the statute in question is for the protection of the public safety, the public health, or the public morals. Its language on this subject is as follows: "It has been repeatedly held that the only authority which a state or municipality has for enacting legislation of this character grows out of what is known as its 'police power.' This has been generally defined to be that power which a state or municipality has to enact laws or ordinances which pertain to the public safety, the public health, or the public morals. The proposition above stated is so universally recognized that it does not require the citation of authorities. It follows, therefore, that, unless the statute in question is one which in some way provides for the public safety, pertains to the public health, or concerns the public morals, it is not a valid exercise of the police power." In our own state this court, in Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 44 Pac. 803, 32 L. R. A. 664, say as follows: "It may be suggested in passing that our government was not designed to be paternal in form. We are a self-governing people, and our just pride is that our laws are made by us, as well as for us. Every individual citizen is to be allowed so much liberty as may exist without impairment of the equal rights of his fellows. Our institutions are founded upon the conviction that we are not only capable of self-government as a community, but, what is the logical necessity, that we are capable, to a great extent, of individual self-government. * * * The spirit of a system such as ours is therefore at total variance with that which, more or less veiled, still shows in the paternalism of other nations. * * * In brief, we give to the individual the utmost possible amount of personal liberty, and, with that guarantied him, he is treated as a person of responsible judgment, not as a child in his nonage, and is left free to work out his destiny as impulse, education, training, heredity, and environment direct him. So, while the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurks no small danger to the republic. For the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the Legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws, none the less dangerous because well meant." We will indulge in only one more quotation on this general subject, which is taken from a recent decision of this court in bank. Ex parte Hayden, 82 Pac. 315. In the opinion in that case many leading authorities are cited. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Henshaw, say: "Putting out of consideration, therefore, the fundamental right of the government to subject private property to taxation and to take such property in time of public calamity or peril, the right of the state to impose burdens upon such property where the business is legitimate and innocuous—in other words, to regulate harmless vocations—is found in the police power alone. Young v. Commonwealth (Va.) 45 S. E. 327; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780. The police power, deriving its existence from the rule that the safety of the people is the supreme law, justifies legislation upon matters pertaining to the public welfare, the public health, or the public morals. Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) p. 837; Ruhstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 57 N. E. 41, 49 L. R. A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30. But the Legislature, under the guise of police regulations, cannot enact laws which do not pertain to one or the other of these objects, and which impose onerous and unnecessary burdens upon business and property. By this court it has been said (Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152): 'But it is not true that, when this power is exerted for the purpose of regulating a business or occupation which in itself is recognized as innocent and useful to the community, the Legislature is the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to pursue such business or profession. As the right of a citizen to engage in such a business or follow such a profession is protected by the Constitution, it is always a judicial question whether any particular regulation of such right is a valid exercise of legislative power. * * * This principle is stated very forcibly in the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 297, 31 L. Ed. 205, in the following language: "The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretense. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the Legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the constitution."'" See, also, Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 68 Pac. 481, 57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116; Ex parte Kelso (Cal.) 82 Pac. 241.

The law, therefore, being settled that the Legislature cannot prohibit or seriously interfere with the right of the citizen to make harmless contracts touching the acquisition, protection, management, and enjoyment of property—contracts which do not wrongfully affect the lawful rights of others, or the public safety, health, or morals—the remaining question in these cases at bar is whether trading stamps or coupons constitute contracts which are outside the protection of the constitutional principles above declared. Neither of the complaints in these cases contains a copy of the stamp or coupon which the petitioner is charged with issuing, and the act of the Legislature in question does not definitely describe such stamp or coupon. But the general character of trading stamps or coupons is a matter of common knowledge. They are somewhat different in form; and one in common use is substantially this: Each time a customer purchases goods from a merchant and pays for them in cash, the merchant gives him a memorandum in writing—called a stamp or coupon—which expresses in money value a small percentage of the price of the goods bought and paid for, and entitles him, after he has accumulated a certain number of such coupons, to use them, to the extent of their face value, in payment for any other goods of the merchant which he may afterwards desire, or goods of some other person or trading company who has undertaken to redeem the coupons. There is generally issued with the stamp or coupon a catalogue of articles from which the holder of the coupon may afterwards select; and such, as we understand it, was the fact in the cases at bar. And such a stamp or coupon, whether or not accompanied by such a catalogue, is prohibited by the act in question. (There is a reference in the act to property which at the time of the purchase is "unselected or unidentified," which the respondent contends distinguishes it from other anti-trading stamp acts which have been declared unconstitutional; and this contention will be noticed hereafter.) We see nothing in such a stamp or coupon which is outside of the constitutional rights of citizens to make contracts concerning property, nothing which wrongfully interferes with the lawful rights of other persons, and nothing which the police power can reach as touching the public safety, the public health, or the public morals. Of course, contracts containing lotteries, advantages dependent upon chance, or any kind of gambling scheme, may be regulated or suppressed. But a trading coupon has none of these characteristics, it is not a lottery, its redemption does not depend upon chance, and it has no element of gambling of any kind. Its holder selects what goods he wants. He is not compelled to take what chance may give him, or to get nothing if the throw of the dice, or the event of some other gambling devise, shall so determine. It is, therefore, a contract which, under the principles above stated, the Legislature has no constitutional power to prohibit, or to seriously interfere with under the guise of regulation; and as the act in question undertakes to do this it is unconstitutional and void.

The view above stated is amply supported by the current of judicial authority. Anti-trading stamp statutes have been passed in many states, and they have been almost invariably held unconstitutional by the courts. A leading case on the subject is People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. 343, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465. The act of the Legislature under review in that case provided that "no person shall sell, exchange or dispose of any article of food or offer or attempt to do so upon any representation, advertisement, notice or inducement that anything other than what is specifically stated to be the subject of the sale or exchange, is or is to be, delivered or received or in any way connected with or a part of the transaction as a gift, prize, premium or reward to the purchaser." The act was held void, and in an elaborate discussion the court, after stating the constitutional rights of citizens as hereinbefore declared, said, among other things, as follows: "It is quite clear that some or all of these fundamental and valuable rights are invaded, weakened, limited, or destroyed by the legislation under consideration. It is evidently of the kind which has been so frequent of late, a kind which is meant to protect some class in the community against the fair, free, and full competition of some other class; the members of the former class thinking it impossible to hold their own against such competition, and therefore flying to the Legislature to secure some enactment which shall operate favorably to them or unfavorably to their competitors in the commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, or producing fields. By the provisions of this act a man owning articles of food which he wishes to sell or dispose of is limited in his powers of sale or disposition. A liberty to adopt or follow for a livelihood a lawful industrial pursuit, and in a manner not injurious to the community, is certainly infringed upon, limited, perhaps weakened or destroyed, by such legislation." And, further: "It cannot be truthfully maintained that this legislation does not seriously infringe upon the liberty of the owner or dealer in food products to pursue a lawful calling in a proper manner, or that it does not, to some extent at least, deprive a person of his property by curtailing his power of sale, and, unless this infringement and deprivation are reasonably necessary for the common welfare, or may be said to fairly tend in the direction or to that result, the legislation is invalid, as plainly violative of the constitutional provision under discussion. * * * The learned counsel for the people claim that the act is a valid exercise of the police power, in furtherance of the policy of the state to prohibit the setting up of lotteries and the sale of lottery tickets. A careful reading of the statute fails to show any such purpose. * * * It says nothing as to any lottery, and does not confine its prohibition to the giving away or distribution of any other article of property by virtue of any scheme founded upon chance. The act, in effect absolutely prohibits the giving away of any other thing with the food sold and as part of the transaction of sale, wholly regardless of the means used to effect the giving away or delivery of such other article." Afterwards another anti-trading stamp act was passed by the Legislature of the state of New York, which prohibited the giving of trading stamps redeemable by any person other than the one issuing them; and this act was held unconstitutional in People v. Dycker, 72 App. Div. 308, 76 N. Y. Supp. 111, where the court said: "Just what there is in the thing prohibited, differing from the thing expressly authorized, that makes it inimical to the public welfare and general safety, does not appear. This record does not disclose any element of chance in the transaction. Even the possibility of some of the stamps never being offered for redemption is largely eliminated by there being no time or boundary limit to the collection of the stamps, and nothing in the arrangement preventing holders of small lots of stamps from combining with others to make a sufficient number for redemption. The transaction is not a species of lottery, and does not appeal to the gambling instinct [citing cases]. * * * The mere fact that the stamps are redeemable by an agent of the principal or by a third person does not seem to affect the transaction, so far as public safety and the general welfare of the community is concerned, or make it differ from the transaction declared to be within the prohibition of the Constitution by the Gillson Case. * * * If the giving and redeeming of trading stamps is at any time so conducted as to be in fact a lottery or a gambling scheme, it can be punished under the provisions of the Penal Code relating to lotteries and gaming, as the same are therein fully defined, and the acts as so defined prohibited." And another anti-trading stamp act was held unconstitutional in People v. Zimmerman (App. Div.) 92 N. Y. Supp. 497. In Pennsylvania an act purporting to be for the suppression of "lottery gifts by storekeepers and others to secure patronage" was held to be unconstitutional, as far as it undertook to suppress ordinary trading stamps, in Commonwealth v. Moorehead, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 513; the court saying: "A mere chance to draw a prize, a ticket which may bring the holder a prize worth one cent, or one worth $100, or nothing, the result depending on chance, is one thing. A memorandum or check entitling him to demand and receive money or another article of like value to be selected by himself is a very different kind of thing." Similar decisions have been made in Rhode Island (State v. Dalton, 46 Atl. 234, 48 L. R. A. 775), in Alabama (State v. Shugart, 35 South. 28), in Virginia (Young v. Commonwealth, 45 S. E. 327), in Vermont

Petitioners also present a certified copy of a recent decision of the United States Circuit Court in and for the Western District of Washington, holding that a statutory provision exactly similar to the one here under review is unconstitutional. It was a habeas corpus case, and by the decision it is declared that: "Being fully advised in the premises, the court finds that 'An act making it a misdemeanor to sell or exchange property under the representation, advertisement, notice or inducement that an unidentified, unknown, unselected, or chance prize, premium or premium gift, or that a stamp, trading stamp, coupon, or other like device, entitling the holder to receive a prize, premium or premium gift, or that the redemption of such a stamp, trading stamp, coupon or other like device so given is to be part of the transaction, or to sell or exchange any trading stamp, stamp, coupon, or other like device, to aid such sale or exchange as aforesaid, and providing a penalty therefor,' is unconstitutional and void, and is in violation of the rights of petitioner secured to him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States; that the petitioner's arrest and imprisonment is illegal."[1] In Ex parte McKenna, 126 Cal. 429, 58 Pac. 916, the unconstitutionality of the statute here in question was, we think, satisfactorily declared. In that case there was involved the validity of an ordinance which imposed a license tax upon merchants doing business to a certain amount who did not use trading stamps, and a tax eight times greater upon merchants doing business, no matter how small, who did use such stamps. The ordinance was held invalid, and the court in bank, speaking through Beatty, C. J., said: "In support of the ordinance, it is contended that the trading stamp device is a lottery in disguise, and therefore immoral. But we cannot see that it has any resemblance to a lottery. There is in it no element of chance, and nothing in the nature of gaming. It appears to be simply a device to attract customers, or to induce those who have bought once to buy again, and in this aspect is as innocent as any form of advertising. And, besides, if it were a lottery in disguise—a mere device to cloak a gambling scheme—it would be unlawful, and not the subject of a license. The ordinance, therefore, cannot be upheld on this ground. It is not an ordinance to prohibit an immoral practice, or to regulate a hazardous or offensive business, or the conduct of a lawful game or public exhibition. It is, under the guise of a revenue measure, an evident attempt to put an end to the issue and redemption of trading stamps by levying a discriminating and prohibitory tax upon the dealers who resort to that method of attracting customers."

Respondent's counsel cite a few cases which, they contend, go directly to the subject of trading stamps, and support the validity of the act here in question, notably, State v. Hawkins, 95 Md. 146, 51 Atl. 850, 93 Am. St. Rep. 328, Humes v. City of Ft. Smith (C. C.) 93 Fed. 857, and Lansburgh v. Dist. of Columbia, 11 App. D. C. 512. With respect to these cases, we do not deem it necessary to consider the suggestion of petitioners that they are distinguishable from the mass of cases above cited. Whatever they may hold, they are not of sufficient consequence to ruffle the great current of authority which runs the other way. The statute in question here makes it a misdemeanor to issue a trading stamp or coupon for "anything unidentified by or unselected by the purchaser at or before the time of the sale," and which, at the time of the sale, shall not be "completely identified beyond the necessity of any further or other selection"; and it is contended by respondent that this feature of the statute takes it out of the principle declared in many of the authorities above cited. We do not see any merit in this contention. There is still no element of chance or gambling in the transaction, whether the purchaser is allowed to make his selection when he is ready to do so, or whether he be compelled, at the time of the purchase, to then and there limit his choice to some one article which he might not want when, in the future, he has accumulated sufficient coupons to be used. Usually a list of articles from which a selection may be made accompanies the coupon; but, whether so or not, he is in either event forced by the statute to make his selection at the time he receives his first coupon. This requirement destroys in a great measure the efficiency of the system, and has no relation whatever to the protection of the public safety, the public health, or the public morals. On this point respondent relies greatly on the Maryland case of State v. Hawkins, supra. That case was afterwards construed by the criminal court of Baltimore to refer only to the case where the article to be obtained by the holder of the stamp "was to be determined by some lot or chance." State v. Frankel, decided September 12, 1902, cited in petitioners' closing brief, where the opinion is quoted in full. If this construction be correct, then the Hawkins Case is not out of harmony with the current of decisions; but, if it necessarily goes to the extent claimed by respondent, then we cannot approve it.

We see no force in the contention that the act is proper as protecting the holders of trading stamps from the fraud and deceit of those who issue them. Of course, the value of any contract depends upon the good faith of each contracting party; and the contracts evidenced by trading stamps are no more subject to the failures of those issuing them to comply with their promises than are any other valid contracts. Such failures would soon end the business.

The act in question has a clause prohibiting the coupon when the selection of the property "will depend upon chance or hazard in any manner whatever"; but this clause need not be here considered, because there is no averment in the complaint, nor is it claimed, that there is here any chance or hazard involved, unless the general nature of the business of issuing trading stamps inherently includes chance or hazard, and, as we have before stated, it does not. Indeed, an ordinary trading stamp or coupon is, in substance, a mere form of allowing discounts on cash payments, and its issuance is entirely harmless and within the constitutional right of contract. It may be distasteful to certain competitors in business; but the latter should remember that, if a statute suppressing it be upheld, then other oppressive statutes might be enacted unlawfully interfering with and hampering business and the right of contract, to which these competitors would strenuously, but vainly, object.

Our conclusion is that the said act of March 7, 1905, so far as it undertakes to make the issuance of trading stamps and coupons such as were used by the petitioners herein a misdemeanor, is unconstitutional and void. The petitioners, Charles F. Drexel and J. C. Holland, are discharged from custody.

Ex parte WEST. (Cr. 1,263.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1905.)

In Bank. Application for writ of habeas corpus by Charles P. West against Jeremiah F. Dinan, chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, for the discharge of petitioner, held under an alleged illegal imprisonment. Writ granted.

W. C. Van Fleet, Mastick, Van Fleet & Mastick, H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, and H. M. Anthony, for petitioner. Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty. (John Garber, Allen G. Wright, Charles A. Son, and John Garber, of counsel), for respondent. Geo. S. Hupp, amicus curiæ.

PER CURIAM. This cause is entirely within and governed by the decisions in the cases of Ex parte Drexel and Ex parte Holland (this day decided) 82 Pac. 429; and upon the authority of those cases the petitioner, Charles P. West, is discharged from custody.

WOOLWINE v. STORRS. (S. F. 4,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1905.)

1. LIMITATIONS—EXTENSION OF NOTE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEBT—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a note, evidence held to sustain findings that a requested extension of the debt sufficient to suspend the statute of limitations had not been granted, and that there had been no written acknowledgment of the debt by deceased within four years prior to the commencement of the action.

2. BILLS AND NOTES—EXTENSION.

A written request for an extension of a note was ineffective in the absence of an acceptance.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—NEW NOTE—EFFECT.

Where, after maturity of a note on which testator was jointly and severally liable, he gave a new note for a part of the debt, due in four months, which note was subsequently fully paid before the commencement of an action on the original note, the mere giving of the additional note did not suspend the holder's right of action on the original note against testator for the remainder of the indebtedness.

4. SAME—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a note, it was not error for the court to sustain an objection to a question asked of the holder's agent as to whether he remembered having had a conversation with the maker concerning the original guaranty and the demand for payment; such evidence not being material on the issue as to the extension of the note, so as to toll the statute of limitations.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by W. P. Woolwine against H. E. Storrs, as executor of the will of S. Merrill, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Lawler & Allen and Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for appellant. Aylett R. Cotton, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is the same suit as that of Pierce et al. v. Merrill et al., in which on a former appeal a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed. 128 Cal. 464, 61 Pac. 64, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56; 128 Cal. 473, 79 Am. St. Rep. 63. The present plaintiff is the assignee of the former plaintiffs, and has been substituted for them. The defendant, Storrs, has been substituted as executor of the will of the deceased defendant, Merrill. The case was tried on the answer of the defendant, Storrs, and judgment was entered in his favor. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The other defendants are not parties to this appeal, or to the judgment appealed from.

The original defendants were sued as guarantors of a note of the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company; the amount of the note being $50,000, the date June 1, 1889, and the date of maturity June 1, 1891. The suit was commenced January 31, 1896, more than four years after the maturity of the note; the theory of the plaintiff apparently being that the liability of the defendants on their guaranty did not accrue until other security given by the makers of the note, consisting of a mortgage, had been exhausted. It was held upon the former appeal that upon the facts stated in the complaint the liability of the defendants on their guaranty accrued at the maturity of the note, and that therefore the demurrer, based on the statute of limitations, should have been sustained. The court said: "If plaintiffs relied upon a written acknowledgment of indebtedness within four years prior to the commencement of the action, or upon any other other fact, to take the case out of the statute of limitations, they should have pleaded the same in their complaint." 128 Cal. 472, 61 Pac. 66, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56. Upon the going down of the remittitur plaintiff, in order to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations, so amended his complaint as to allege a request by the maker of the note and defendants for an extension of one year from May 21, 1891, within which to pay the balance remaining unpaid on said note, and the granting of the same by the owners of the indebtedness. The request was made on May 21, 1891, when the principal debt had become due, under the provisions of the note, by default in the payment of interest, and notification to the maker and guarantors that the holders declared the same due and demanded payment. The request was in writing, a copy of which was set forth in the complaint, and was as follows, viz.: "Office of Semi-Tropic Land & Water Co. Samuel Merrill, Pres. Geo. H. Bonebrake, Vice P. F. C. Howes, Treas. Jos. L. Merrill, Secy. Robert D. Wade, Supt. Palace Hotel. San Bernardino Co., May 21, 1891. Henry Pierce, Esq., San Francisco: Our Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co. ask a year's extension. Messrs. Bonebrake, Howes, and Merrill pledge that the payment shall come at that time without fail and without litigation or expense. Yours, S. Merrill, Prest." It was alleged that, pursuant to and in reliance upon this writing, the holders of the note granted an extension of one year from May 21, 1891, within which to pay the balance due.

It is clear that the above letter could not, standing alone, have operated to save plaintiff's demand against defendant from the bar of the statute for a longer period than four years from its date. If, taken in connection with the existing circumstances and the previous demand for payment, the letter be considered as a sufficient acknowledgment of an existing indebtedness of Merrill, under section 360, Code Civ. Proc., its utmost effect as such an acknowledgment was simply to waive so much of the period of limitations as had already run in Merrill's favor, and give a new period of four years, commencing at that date, May 21, 1891, within which action might be brought against him. It could only be in the event that the requested extension was agreed to by the holders of the note that any extension might be effected. If no such extension was effected, there was, of course, no moment of time after June 1, 1891, when the statute was not running, or when the holders of the note could not have maintained an action against Merrill upon his guaranty. The allegations of the amended complaint in regard to the granting of an extension were denied by the amended answer, and the trial court found that such requested extension was not granted. If this finding is sufficiently supported by the evidence, it necessarily disposes of plaintiff's contention in this behalf. We are unable to see how it can be held that this finding is not supported by the evidence. It is not claimed that there was any written assent to the proposition contained in the letter, and, if it be assumed that an oral assent would have been sufficient, a perusal of the record shows that there was no oral agreement for the extension requested thereby. It affirmatively appears that the proposition contained in the letter, viz., that a year's extension on the $50,000 note should be granted, was not accepted; for it is shown that Mr. Pierce, who was managing the matter for the holders, continued to press the matter to the extent of threatening a foreclosure "if they did not come to time," so that on May 23, 1891, two of the guarantors, Merrill and Bonebrake, gave their personal note for $25,000, payable four months after date, in order that the same might be negotiated, and the holders thereby enabled to at once obtain a portion of the amount due, which note was negotiated by the holders, and payment insisted on by them in accordance with its terms. This note was partially paid at or about its maturity, and a new note given for the balance by the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company, which was ultimately paid in full.

The utmost that the record shows in favor of plaintiff's claim in this behalf is that in consequence of other arrangements, utterly inconsistent with the proposition for an extension of the note for a year, including the giving of the $25,000 note above referred to and payments on the same and on the new note given in its place for the balance due thereon, until in 1893 the same was fully satisfied, the holders of the $50,000 note did in fact refrain from bringing suit upon their accrued cause of action thereon for nearly three years from May 21, 1891, when they instituted the proceeding for a foreclosure of their mortgage for the balance then due. There is nothing in this to compel even the conclusion that the holders of the $50,000 note ever orally agreed to forbear suit for any time, or to indicate anything more than that they were satisfied to refrain from pressing their accrued cause of action so long as satisfactory arrangements for the speedy payment of a large portion of the indebtedness were made. Much less does it tend to show the agreement for an extension of the note alleged by the amended complaint, which was the only agreement alleged by plaintiff for the purpose of taking the case from the operation of the statute, and consequently the only agreement within the issues. Upon the evidence the trial court was necessarily compelled to find that the alleged agreement for a year's extension was never made, and this was, in effect, the finding under discussion. The above-mentioned allegation as to the request for an extension of time and the granting of the same was the only allegation of matters affecting the running of the statute, except that there was an allegation to the effect that defendant Merrill was absent from the state of California between June 2, 1891, and June 2, 1895, for a period of more than 8 months, and also one to the effect that prior to April 27, 1895, and within 4 years prior to the commencement of the action, said Merrill had made, signed, and delivered to plaintiff's predecessors a certain writing wherein he unconditionally admitted his liability. Upon both these matters the findings were against plaintiff. The unchallenged finding as to absence from the state was that Merrill was absent for not more than 6 months and 20 days, and this action was not commenced until the expiration of 4 years and 8 months from the time the cause of action accrued. There is no evidence whatever in conflict with the finding that there was no written acknowledgment of the indebtedness by Merrill within 4 years prior to the commencement of the action.

It is urged that the letter of May 21, 1891, contains a promise on the part of Merrill to pay the debt at the expiration of one year from its date, and that such promise was enforceable at any time within four years after the expiration of the year, but manifestly the promise therein contained was conditioned upon the acceptance of the proposition for a year's extension, and was enforceable only in the event of such acceptance. It is further urged that by the taking of the four-month $25,000 note of Merrill and Bonebrake on May 23, 1891, an extension of at least four months was granted on the $50,000 note, which, added to the period of Merrill's absence from the state would bring the action within time. The evidence does not show any express agreement for such extension. The mere taking of this note would not have the effect of suspending the right of the holders of the note to maintain an action against Merrill for the remainder of the indebtedness, and what is here sought to be recovered was included in such remainder; for the $25,000 note was fully satisfied before the commencement of the foreclosure action. A sufficient answer, however, to the contention in this behalf, is that no such agreement for an extension of four months is embraced within the issues made by the pleadings. The findings already discussed being sufficiently sustained by the evidence, it follows, in view of what was decided upon the former appeal, that it must be held that plaintiff's claim against Merrill's estate is barred by the statute of limitations, and that therefore no recovery can be had thereon.

The trial court did not err in sustaining the objection to the question asked Pierce as to whether he remembered having had any conversations with Merrill on or about May 2, 1891, or shortly subsequent thereto, concerning the original guaranty and the demand for payment made April 27, 1891. The question was not such as to indicate that it called for any competent evidence material to the issues being tried, or for any evidence material upon the issue as to the extension for a year. Counsel for appellant stated to the court, in effect, that the question was merely preliminary, and it is apparent that it was never suggested that there was anything said in any conversation prior to the letter of May 21st that could have affected the determination of the question as to whether an agreement for the extension alleged in the amended complaint was made. The ruling of the court admitting certain testimony on the question of the assignment of the indebtedness to plaintiff was not prejudicial, for the court found for plaintiff upon that issue.

It is unnecessary to consider any other point made on this appeal by either party.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MATTESON et al. v. WAGONER et al.

(Sac. 1,144.)

1. ACTION—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES.

A complaint to rescind certain notes and a mortgage for fraud alleged that the borrowers secured the loan by promising to pay off a prior lien on the land with the proceeds, without any intention to do so, but, instead, used the money to purchase and discharge liens on other land, and still had a portion of the money in their hands, and that they were insolvent, and that the land mortgaged was not worth the amount of the loan in addition to the lien thereon. The complaint prayed a cancellation of the notes and mortgage, a judgment against the borrowers for the amount of the loan, with interest, and a lien on the land purchased with part of the proceeds and also on the tract released from a mortgage by a part of the money. Held not objectionable, as stating more than one cause of action.

2. Parties—Purchasers Pendente Lite.

Where an amended complaint to cancel certain notes and a mortgage for fraud, and to impose liens on certain land, alleged that subsequent to the beginning of the action defendant B. had purchased part of the land on which plaintiffs desired the lien, with full notice of plaintiffs' claims and rights, B. was properly made a party defendant.

3. Pleading—Demurrer.

A complaint will be held sufficient on demurrer for want of facts, if it appears from the facts alleged that plaintiff is entitled to any relief against defendants, though the facts may not be clearly stated, or may be mingled with other irrelevant facts, and though plaintiff may have demanded relief to which he was not entitled.

4. Contracts—Rescission—Fraud.

Where defendants procured a loan from plaintiff, evidenced by note and mortgage, on the promise to pay off a prior lien on the property mortgaged with the proceeds of the loan, without any intention to perform such promise, and after obtaining the money used it for other purposes, plaintiff was entitled to rescind the contract for fraud, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1572.

5. Same—Diligence—Pleading.

Where an action to rescind a contract for fraud was begun November 25, 1895, less than five months after it was made, and the complaint alleged that a considerable time elapsed after July 3, 1895, before the fraud was discovered, and it did not appear that the delay had resulted in any injury to defendants, the complaint was not demurrable for failure to show that the contract was rescinded and the action begun promptly on the discovery of the fraud, as required by Civ. Code, § 1691.

6. Same—Waiver of Fraud.

Where, in an action to rescind a contract by which defendants procured a loan from plaintiff on their agreement to use the proceeds to pay off a prior lien on lands mortgaged to secure the same, which agreement they did not intend to keep, the complaint alleged the receipt by plaintiff of $165 paid on account of interest on the loan, but did not allege whether such payment was received after the discovery of the fraud and with an intention thereby to affirm the contract, or that plaintiff was then aware of the effect of the acceptance of the money, it was not demurrable for want of facts on the ground that such receipt amounted to a waiver of the fraud.

7. Same—Return of Consideration.

Where, in an action to rescind a contract for fraud, plaintiff was entitled to retain a payment made under the contract, whether it was rescinded or not, he was not bound to tender a return thereof as a condition of his right to rescind.

8. Limitations of Actions — Relief on Ground of Fraud.

Plaintiff loaned certain money to defendants W. on their promise to pay off a prior lien on property mortgaged to secure the loan, which promise they had no intention to, and did not, keep, but with a portion of the proceeds of the loan paid off a mortgage on another tract of land, which, after action brought by plaintiff to rescind the contract, B. purchased, with notice of plaintiffs' claim of lien thereon, on April 26, 1897. Plaintiffs filed a supplemental complaint to declare such lien as against B. on July 20, 1901, but did not allege that B.'s purchase was not discovered at the time it was made. Held, that plaintiffs' cause of action against B. was barred by either Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, limiting actions for fraud to three years, or by section 343, requiring actions for relief not otherwise provided for in the Code to be brought within four years.

9. Lis Pendens—Purchaser Pendente Lite.

Where a lis pendens is duly filed, a purchaser pendente lite is bound by the judgment, though not made a party to the action.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. J. Nilon, Judge.

Suit by Albert Matteson and another against T. J. Wagoner and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment affirmed as to defendant Elam Biggs, and reversed as to the other defendants.

John Caldwell and C. W. Kitts, for appellants. A. D. Mason, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants upon demurrers to the second amended and supplemental complaints. With respect to the defendants, other than Biggs, we think the demurrers were improperly sustained. The complaint alleges in substance that on July 3, 1895, the defendants T. J. Wagoner and Louisa J. Wagoner were the owners of a tract of land of 160 acres or thereabouts, upon which there was an existing lien of more than $3,000, secured by a trust deed; that the Wagoners requested of the plaintiffs a loan of $3,300, for which they were to give their notes, bearing interest at 10 per cent. per annum, payable one year after date, and secured by a mortgage upon the said tract of land, and offered that, if the plaintiffs would make the said loan upon said security, they (the Wagoners) would, upon receiving the money on the loan, forthwith pay the same upon and in discharge of the pre-existing lien on the land and cause the same to be released, thus leaving the plaintiffs' mortgage as a first lien thereon, and affording the plaintiffs ample security for its payment; that said promise was made without any intention on the part of said defendants to perform the same, and with the intention of using said money for other and different purposes; that the plaintiffs accepted the proposition of said defendants and agreed to make the loan upon the terms proposed. In pursuance of this agreement, the mortgage and notes were executed and delivered to the plaintiffs, who thereupon, in reliance upon the promise of said defendants that they would take the money and pay the same in discharge of the prior lien and procure its release, delivered to the said defendants the $3,300 so agreed to be loaned upon said mortgage, to be used in discharging the prior lien according to the agreement. The defendants did not pay the money upon the prior lien, except the amount of about $400 thereof, and they have entirely failed to obtain a release of the prior lien. The land upon which the plaintiffs' mortgage was taken is not worth more than $4,000, and the defendants T. J. and Louisa Wagoner are insolvent. As soon as plaintiffs learned that the prior lien had not been released or the money paid thereon, they demanded that the prior lien be forthwith released or said money returned. Prior to the beginning of the action they offered to cancel and return the notes and mortgage given by said defendants to them. It is alleged that said notes and mortgage have not been paid, except that said defendants had paid $165 on account of interest thereon. It is further alleged that the said defendants used $1,750 of the said money in payment of a mortgage upon a different tract of land containing about 50 acres, and about $2,000 thereof in the purchase of another tract known as the "Hubie Ranch," and that they have $1,000 of it still remaining in their hands. The allegations of the supplemental complaint will be considered hereafter. The prayer of the complaint is that the mortgage and notes given to the plaintiffs be canceled; that the plaintiffs recover of the defendants the Wagoners the sum of $3,300 so loaned, with 10 per cent. interest thereon from January 3, 1896; and that they have a lien declared upon the Hubie ranch and also upon the track described in the mortgage for $1,750, which was released with a part of the money. The demurrers to the second amended and supplemental complaint assign as grounds of demurrer that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and that there was a misjoinder of causes of action and parties. So far as the Wagoners are concerned, it cannot be claimed that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, nor that there is a misjoinder either of actions or of parties. The original complaint was filed November 23, 1895, less than five months after the mortgage was made, and the amended complaint is substantially the same as the original. The complaint does not state more than one cause of action, and the defendant Biggs was properly made a party upon the allegation that subsequent to the beginning of the action he purchased the part of the land upon which the plaintiffs desired to have the lien for $1,750 declared; the purchase being made with full notice of the plaintiffs' claims and rights.

In determining whether or not the complaint is sufficient, as against the demurrer upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the rule is that if, upon a consideration of all the facts stated, it appears that the plaintiff is entitled to any relief at the hands of the court against the defendants, the complaint will be held good, although the facts may not be clearly stated or may be intermingled with a statement of other facts irrelevant to the cause of action shown, or although the plaintiff may demand relief to which he is not entitled under the facts alleged. There appears to be some confusion in the minds of counsel in regard to the precise nature of the cause of action attempted to be stated. It is clearly not an action to foreclose the mortgage, nor to recover upon the notes the amount due thereon according to their terms. At the time the action was begun neither notes nor mortgage were yet due. It is plainly an action in equity to rescind the contract by which the loan was made, and secure a restoration of the money obtained from the plaintiffs thereon, upon the ground that the contract was induced and the money obtained by fraud. The right to rescind is clear. A promise made without any intention of performing it constitutes fraud, and if by means of it a party has been induced to alter his position to his injury, it is ground for relief in equity. Civ. Code, § 1572. A contract obtained by such means may be rescinded. Civ. Code, §§ 3406, 1689; Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 18 Pac. 791; Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 910. Rescission must be made promptly on the discovery of the fraud. Civ. Code, § 1691. It is claimed that there was not sufficient diligence shown in offering to rescind and beginning suit after discovery of the fraud. The complaint does not give the date of the discovery of the fraud, nor of the offer to rescind. But ambiguity and uncertainty on these points are not made grounds of demurrer, and, so far as the general ground is concerned, we think the complaint shows sufficient diligence. It is alleged that a considerable time elapsed after July 3, 1895, before discovery of the fraud, and the action was begun November 25, 1895, less than five months after the money was loaned. It does not appear that the delay which may have occurred after the discovery was, or could have been, at all injurious to the Wagoners, and such a short delay does not of itself constitute such laches as to defeat the action.

It is urged that the mortgage transaction was affirmed and ratified after discovery of the fraud. By this we suppose respondent means that the receipt of $165, paid on account of interest, was an affirmance of the contract and a waiver of the fraud. If this payment had been received as interest on the loan after the discovery of the alleged fraud, and with the intention thereby to affirm the contract, the plaintiffs being then aware of the effect of their acceptance of the money, it would doubtless constitute a waiver of the fraud and an election to treat the contract as valid, and would defeat the action. These facts, however, do not all appear from the complaint. Indeed, they are properly matters of defense, and would more appropriately appear by way of answer. If a complete defense appears on the face of the complaint, the defendant may avail himself thereof by means of a demurrer; but where a part, only, of the necessary facts appear, it will not render the complaint demurrable. The allegation that defendants had paid $165 on account of the interest on the mortgage does not, taken alone, show an election to affirm.

It does not appear when it was paid, nor that plaintiff then knew of the fraudulent character of the promise to procure the release of the prior lien, nor that it was accepted by plaintiffs with a conscious knowledge of its legal effect on the transaction and an intention to affirm the same. Neither of these facts can be presumed in favor of the defense, at least in the absence of anything showing knowledge of the fraud at the time of accepting the payment. If the defendant desires to avail himself of such a defense, he must aver the facts in his answer.

It was not necessary, under the circumstances of this case, as alleged, to offer to return the $165 as a condition precedent to rescission. In Richards v. Fraser, 122 Cal. 461, 55 Pac. 247, it is said: "One who attempts to rescind a transaction on the ground of fraud is not required to restore that which in any event he would be entitled to retain"—quoting from Kley v. Healy, 127 N. Y. 561, 28 N. E. 593. In Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 511, 47 Pac. 371, in treating of this subject it is said that an offer to restore is not necessary, "where it clearly appears that the defendant could not possibly have been injuriously affected by a failure to restore." The same rule was followed in Gilson v. Gilson, 47 Cal. 601, and Wilson v. Moriarty, 77 Cal. 596, 20 Pac. 134. In Kley v. Healy, supra, the New York Court of Appeals says that, if there are any circumstances of hardship upon the defendant arising from such failure to restore, "such conditions as might be essential to the protection of the defendant could be inserted in the judgment ultimately recovered." This is authorized by section 3408 of the Civil Code. The doctrine here stated is fully supported by the New York cases. Fisher v. Bishop, 108 N. Y. 30, 15 N. E. 331, 2 Am. St. Rep. 357; Gould v. Cayuga Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 81; Guckenheimer v. Angevine, 81 N. Y. 394; Allerton v. Allerton, 50 N. Y. 670. See, also, Judge v. Stone, 44 N. H. 601. The decision in Marten v. Burns Wine Co., 99 Cal. 356, 33 Pac. 1107, is contrary to this rule; but, in view of the subsequent decisions above cited, it cannot be considered a precedent. The case at bar comes clearly within the rule. If the plaintiffs fail in the present action, they will be entitled to retain the $165 as a payment of interest on the notes. If they succeed in the action, they will be entitled to retain the $165 as a partial restoration of the sum loaned, and to have judgment for the balance. The defendants, therefore, cannot possibly be injured. The law does not require idle acts (Civ. Code, § 3532), and nothing would seem more idle than to require the plaintiffs, as a mere formal prerequisite to trial and judgment, to offer to return to defendants that which defendants would in no event be entitled to keep, and which, defendants being insolvent, plaintiffs could not hope to recover. The prayer for relief is no part of the statement of fact, and the fact that too much is asked for does not affect the cause of action stated. Under the prayer for general relief the court can give such judgment as plaintiffs show themselves entitled to, and as may be necessary to effect justice between the parties and protect the rights of both. The discrepancies in the amounts of money alleged to have been paid out by the Wagoners, which make it appear that they have used more money than they received, show carelessness on the part of the pleader, but they do not affect the substantial merits of the cause of action.

The demurrer of Biggs to the amended and supplemental complaint should have been sustained, upon the ground that the action is barred either by subdivision 4 of section 338 or by section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The cause of action stated, as against Biggs, was either an action for relief on the ground of fraud, and therefore barred within three years from the time the action was begun against him, as provided in section 338, or an action for relief not otherwise provided for in the Code, and therefore barred within four years after the cause of action accrued, as provided in section 343. The allegations of the supplemental complaint are that on April 26, 1897, Biggs purchased of the Wagoners the tract of land described in the $1,750 mortgage, above referred to, upon which the plaintiffs desire to have a lien declared, and that he purchased this property with full notice of the rights and claims of the plaintiffs. The cause of action existed and was complete against Biggs on April 26, 1897, at the time he made the purchase. There is no allegation that the plaintiffs did not discover the fact of this purchase at the time it was made, and, if ignorance thereof would prevent the running of the statute, it should have been alleged; for it cannot be presumed in favor of the plaintiffs that they did not discover it until less than three years prior to the time of filing the supplemental complaint. The supplemental complaint was not filed until July 20, 1901, which was more than four years after Biggs' purchase. Prior to the time of filing this supplemental complaint it cannot be said that any action was pending against Biggs. The statute of limitations began to run as soon as the cause of action against him was complete; that is, on April 26, 1897, and it continued to run without interruption until the filing of the supplemental complaint. The time provided by either section above referred to had therefore expired before any action was begun against Biggs. It does not appear that any notice of action was filed, and under such circumstances he has a right to invoke the bar of the statute. Lawrence v. Ballou, 50 Cal. 258; Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 151; Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 198, 53 Pac. 563; Newman v. Marvin, 12 Hun, 242; Shaw v. Cock, 78 N. Y. 194; Magaw v. Clark, 6 Watts, 528; Brown v. Goolsby, 34 Miss. 437; Gray v. Trapnall, 23 Ark. 510. If a notice of action was duly filed, he would be bound by the judgment, although not made a party to the action.

As to the defendant Biggs, the judgment is affirmed. The judgment is reversed as to the defendants T. J. and Louisa J. Wagoner, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule their demurrer.

CHURCHILL v. RUSSELL et ux.

(Sac. 1,193.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 26, 1905.)

1. STATUTE OF FRAUDS—WATERS AND WATER COURSES — IRRIGATION — TRANSFER OF RIGHTS.

A transfer of a right to a certain amount of the waters of a stream for irrigation purposes is an agreement for the transfer of an estate in real property, within the statute of frauds.

2. SAME—PART PERFORMANCE.

Where plaintiff's grantor, while the owner of the waters of a stream, orally agreed in 1888 to convey to defendants 20 inches of water of such stream for irrigation purposes, to induce them to purchase the interest of another in certain adjoining land and to acquire such land from the United States, and pursuant to such agreement defendants purchased and acquired the land, used such amount of water to irrigate the same for a period of 14 years, and made valuable improvements upon the land, there was such part performance of the contract to convey such water right as saved the same from the operation of the statute of frauds.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—EQUITABLE INTEREST — BONA FIDE PURCHASERS — NOTICE.

Where defendants had acquired a mere equitable right to certain waters of a stream from plaintiff's grantor, they were not entitled to rely thereon in a suit by plaintiff to restrain the diversion of such water, in the absence of proof and a finding that plaintiff purchased with notice, actual or constructive, of defendants' rights.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought to restrain the defendants from diverting the waters of Butte creek, in Siskiyou county. There is no question in the case but that the predecessor in title of the lands to which said water right is appurtenant, Charles B. Boyes, as early as 1877 appropriated for purposes of irrigation the waters of said stream to the extent of 1,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, which is practically the full flow of said stream in the irrigation season, and that the appellant succeeded to said water right by purchase from the original proprietor of the Boyes ranch and this water right appurtenant thereto, unless by reason of the facts alleged in the answer of defendants, and found by the court to be true, the judgment in their favor that they are the owners, by a right prior to the plaintiff, of 20 inches thereof, is warranted. In their answer the defendants, while in effect admitting that as early as 1877 Charles B. Boyes had appropriated the waters of said creek, alleged, as a defense to the claim of plaintiff as his successor in interest to all said waters and as a basis for their asserted claim that they were the owners of 20 inches thereof, facts which the court found supported by the evidence, and upon which it made the following finding: "That since the year 1888, defendant Meta A. Russell has been the owner of and in the possession of the N. E. ¼ of section 24, township 45 N., of range 2 W., Mt. Diablo meridian. That said land is agricultural land, and needs water to irrigate the same. That in the year 1888 Charles Boyes, the predecessor of plaintiff, as an inducement to said Meta A. Russell to take up said land as a homestead, promised and agreed that, if she would do so, then she should always have and own and use at all times 20 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, of the said waters of Butte creek. That, relying upon such promise, said defendant took up said land as a homestead and purchased the improvements thereon, belonging to one Snell, and thereafter took and used said 20 inches of water each and every year for the period of 14 years, and made valuable improvements upon said land." Upon this finding a judgment declaring the defendants to be the owners of said water to the extent of their claim to 20 inches was entered, and plaintiff appeals from said judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal, though not the only, attack in the case, is made upon this finding. It is insisted, not only that it is not supported by the evidence, but that, even if so supported, it furnishes no warrant in law for the judgment based upon it. As far as the first point is concerned, it is enough to say that the finding is supported by the direct evidence of the defendant J. F. Russell, which was substantially sufficient to warrant the court in making it. This would make any further reference to the evidence on this subject unnecessary, if it were not for the other point made by appellant as to the legal sufficiency of the finding to support the judgment.

The evidence, briefly stated, shows that after Boyes had appropriated the waters of Butte creek, including the 20 inches in controversy, and prior to August, 1888, one Snell was in the occupancy of the quarter section mentioned in the quoted finding as a squatter. The defendant J. F. Russell had in contemplation the purchasing of Snell's right and interest in the land—possession and improvements—for the benefit of his codefendant, and went to see Boyes in relation to it. Upon this subject he testified: "Before we bought the Snell place, I went to see Charlie Boyes; and I told him I was thinking of purchasing the Snell place, so that my wife could take it up—she and I was not married then—and I told him I didn't want it unless I had some water to go with it, and he said he didn't want Snell there, and, if I would get him off, he said, 'I will give you 20 inches of water.' And I says: 'Will you give it to us for all time?' And he said, 'Yes, the title to it.' And that is the title I have of it." Immediately after this interview, and as a result of their agreement, the defendants in August, 1888, purchased Snell's possessory right to the land, went into possession, and the defendant Meta Russell made a homestead entry upon it as public land of the United States. They forthwith constructed a ditch and conducted therein from Butte creek to and upon their premises the 20 inches of water which Boyes had agreed to convey to them. This land upon which they had settled, though agricultural land, required water for irrigation, and without it profitable crops could not be raised thereon. The defendants immediately commenced improving their property, utilizing this water for that purpose. There was but comparatively little land cleared off when they took possession—some 11 acres. In 1889 they cleared off and broke up some 30 acres additional and planted it to hay and grain. In 1891 they set out a small orchard. The following year more land was cleared, bringing the cultivable land up to near 50 acres. All this land, aside from the orchard, was planted in part to grain and hay, and part to timothy and clover, and produced profitable crops through the use of this water. Subsequent to 1892 additional land was cleared off and brought under cultivation, said water also being used in irrigating the same up to the commencement of this action—some 14 years—and improvements of a permanent character were placed upon the premises by the defendants. It is unnecessary to particularize further as to these matters, because what we have especially referred to is sufficient for the consideration of the point made by appellant relative to the agreement between Boyes and defendants and the right of the defendants to the 20 inches of water in question which they claim under it. Boyes died in 1890. Plaintiff purchased the Boyes ranch, to which the appropriated waters of Butte creek were appurtenant, probably about 1895. The date is uncertain from the testimony. This action was commenced in 1901. There was no conveyance in writing of the 20 inches of water in question made by the original appropriator, Boyes, or any one else, to defendants. Whatever interest the defendants acquired to it rested in parol, and the point made by appellant is that the interest which the defendants asserted in the water right so appropriated by Boyes is an estate in real property, and that the agreement for the conveyance thereof, not being in writing, is within the statute of frauds, and void.

That the interest asserted by defendants to have been acquired under the agreement with Boyes is an estate in real property, and that an agreement for the conveyance of such an interest is within the statute of frauds, is the settled law of this state. Hayes v. Fine, 91 Cal. 398, 27 Pac. 772. And, were this the only matter for consideration relative to the finding, it is obvious that the appellant's contention would be unanswerable. But, although the court finds that the agreement is in parol, still the other facts found by it show such an execution of a parol agreement as, under the authorities, takes it out of the statute. It is found by the court that the agreement with reference to the acquirement of the land by defendants and their right, if they did so, to the absolute ownership of 20 inches of the water theretofore appropriated by Boyes, was in fact made, that defendants performed in every particular their part of the agreement, and that they actually took possession of the quantity of water agreed on, conducted it to their land, and utilized it thereon until the commencement of this action under the circumstances and conditions particularly disclosed by the evidence to which we have referred, and which are in general terms stated in the finding in question. Had the defendants brought an action against Boyes during his lifetime for a specific performance of the agreement, by compelling a conveyance to them of the interest in the water right which they now claim, and the court had made the same finding which it made in the case at bar, which, save as to the 14 years' use, the evidence would have fully justified, there could be no question but that they would have been entitled to a decree for specific performance. The statute of frauds could not have been there interposed as a barrier. Neither can it be interposed here. Performance on the part of defendants of their part of the agreement, their possession of the water under it, together with the equitable considerations which are disclosed by the finding, create a perfectly equitable title in defendants to this water right, which they could effectually assert against appellant, notwithstanding the agreement between his predecessor and the defendants rests in parol. Without referring to the general authorities in support of the conclusion we have reached that the facts in this case, as found by the court, take the agreement in question out of the statute of frauds, the cases of Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234, and Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 300, 57 Pac. 79, discuss the same general principles involved here, with reference to parol contracts for the conveyance of water rights, and sustain the view we have announced in the case at bar.

But, while satisfied that the objection of appellant to the legal sufficiency of this finding, considered by itself, to support the judgment, is not well taken, we are satisfied that for another reason urged by appellant—the absence of an essential finding—the judgment will have to be reversed. It is nowhere averred in defendants' answer, nor is it found by the court, that appellant, when he purchased the Boyes ranch and the right to the waters of Butte creek as appurtenant thereto, had any notice of the equitable interest of defendants to any part thereof. It is conceded in the answer that the legal title to all of such water right, including the interest therein now claimed by defendants, was originally vested in Boyes, and that plaintiff succeeded to the legal title therein which Boyes had acquired. The only interest which the defendants acquired, and which they asserted in the 20 inches thereof, accrued subsequently, and was an equitable one. Proof of its existence rested solely in parol. There was nothing of record to charge the plaintiff with knowledge of its existence or the claim of defendants thereto. The legal title to the entire water right being then in Boyes, the plaintiff, having acquired it by purchase from him, took it free from any equitable claim of defendants, unless plaintiff purchased it with actual or constructive notice of their equitable rights. Under these circumstances it was necessary for the defendants, in asserting their equitable interest, to allege and prove, and for the court to find, the existence of such notice in order to support their equitable claim. This proposition is so familiar that no citation of authorities is necessary to support it. No such averment or finding of notice was made, and, as it was not only essential for the court to find that at the time of the purchase by plaintiff of the legal interest of Boyes in the water right, an equitable interest therein in fact existed in favor of defendants, but also that plaintiff purchased with either actual or constructive notice of it, the failure of the court to find upon this essential matter of knowledge renders the findings which were made insufficient of themselves to support the judgment.

Other findings, besides the one which we have heretofore discussed, are challenged as also unsupported by the evidence. It is unnecessary to give this claim any extended consideration. All these findings are to the effect that plaintiff is entitled to the waters of Butte creek, except as to the 20 inches which have been used by defendants. The point made is that the evidence does not sustain this exception. But, as we have held that the evidence supported the principal finding in favor of defendants, it necessarily follows that it supports the exception referred to in the other findings. These are the only points presented on the appeal which have been urged or which require consideration.

As the judgment cannot be supported in the absence of a finding as to the knowledge of plaintiff of the existence of defendants' equitable interest in the waters of Butte creek at the time plaintiff acquired the legal title of the original appropriator, Boyes, thereto, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. ELDRIDGE. (Cr. 1,204.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1905.)

1. Murder—Escape—Conspiracy—Evidence.

In a prosecution for murder of a prison guard, evidence held to sustain a finding that the homicide was committed by one of defendant's fellow prisoners in carrying out a conspiracy to escape to which defendant was a party.

2. Witness — Impeachment — Conviction of Felony.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, authorizing proof of conviction of a felony to impeach a witness, either by the evidence of the witness himself or by the record of his conviction, evidence is admissible, not only to show that the witness had been convicted of one or several felonies, but also to prove the name of the particular felony or felonies of which he had been convicted.

3. Criminal Law—Instructions.

Where, in a criminal prosecution, several instructions as to a conspiracy in which it was charged defendant participated were given, the refusal to give other instructions on the same subject was not error.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Harry Eldridge was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas H. Christiansen and C. H. S. Bidwell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., and A. M. Seymour, Dist. Atty., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. During an outbreak which occurred on July 27, 1903, among a number of the convicts in the State Prison at Folsom, inaugurated with a view of effecting their escape, and in which the defendant participated, W. L. Cotter, one of the prison guards, was stabbed and killed by a convict named Andy Myers. Some of the convicts engaged in the outbreak succeeded in escaping from prison, the defendant among them. A year subsequently he was recaptured at Seattle, Wash., brought back to this state, tried for the murder of Cotter, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged. He appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The theory upon which defendant was convicted was that the killing of Cotter was committed by Myers in consummation of an unlawful conspiracy to escape from prison, to which conspiracy Myers, in common with defendant and the other convicts engaged in the outbreak, were parties. There is no question made in the case but that a conspiracy was entered into among the convicts to escape from prison, that the defendant was a party to it, that he participated in the outbreak made as a result of such conspiracy, and that, in the general assault which was made upon the prison officials at that time, the guard, Cotter, was killed by Myers. It is, however, insisted by appellant that there was not sufficient evidence produced before the jury to show that Myers was a party to the conspiracy, or was conversant with its object or purpose; the claim of appellant's counsel being (to state his position as he assumes it) that there was nothing in the evidence to show but that Myers "was acting independently, taking advantage of the mêlée to vent a grudge on Mr. Chalmers or Mr. Cotter, and that Mr. Cotter received a death wound at that time."

While it is true, as contended by counsel for appellant, that there was no direct evidence of any express agreement entered into by Myers to join with the defendant and the others in their unlawful scheme to escape, still it was not essential that there should be evidence produced before the jury of such express agreement, in order to establish the fact that he was a party to the conspiracy. It is competent to prove that one was a party to a conspiracy for the commission of crime by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence. That a conspiracy to commit crime was explicitly or formally agreed to is rarely capable of being proved by direct evidence, and must be developed from such circumstances as reasonably tend to prove its existence. As these criminal combinations are uniformly entered into in secret, and hence are rarely susceptible of direct proof, the law, on account of the necessity of the case, has deemed it wise and proper that circumstantial evidence of their existence should be permitted. As was said by this court in People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 Pac. 179: "The ultimate fact here, of course, was the conspiracy on the part of the defendant with the other parties named in the commission of the crime; but it is not necessary, in order to establish that fact, to prove that the parties met and actually agreed to jointly undertake such criminal action. From the secrecy with which unlawful undertakings are adopted it would be generally impossible to make such proof by direct testimony. Evidence is indirect, as well as direct, consisting of inferences and presumptions; and it is Code law that upon the trial of a case evidence may be given of any facts from which the facts in issue are presumed, or are logically inferable; and the jury, by the exercise of their judgment or reason, warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, may make such deductions or draw such inferences from the facts proven as will establish the ultimate fact or facts in issue." Having in mind these principles of law, we find that the evidence in the case established—aside from the fact, of which there can be no question, that a conspiracy to escape from the prison existed between the defendant and other convicts who participated in the outbreak—that on the morning of July 27, 1903, while the convicts were proceeding on their way to prison work, issuing in line from one of the small wicket gates of the prison for that purpose, and being counted by the gatekeeper, Chalmers, as they passed, a sudden rush from the line was made by defendant, Myers, and some 10 or 12 others. Nearly all of them were armed with either knives or razors. A number of them, including defendant, immediately made for the office of the captain of the guard, and the prison officials found therein were, after a struggle, made prisoners. Other convicts speedily assailed the guards outside the prison and overpowered them. In making these assaults and overcoming the resistance of the officials, the convicts used the weapons with which they were armed, inflicting severe injuries upon several of them. Myers rushed from the line with the others, and with drawn knife, assisted by another convict named Leverone, who accompanied him, assailed the prison gatekeeper Chalmers. In the struggle that ensued, the guard, Cotter, started to the assistance of Chalmers, and was stabbed and killed by Myers. It is unnecessary to detail what took place subsequent to the killing of Cotter—the procurement of arms from the prison armory by the convicts and their escape from the prison, taking with them the officials they had overpowered, as a protection against being fired on by the other guards—as Myers does not seem to have participated in these subsequent proceedings, and neither he nor Leverone escaped.

It is quite apparent from the evidence to which we have referred, and we are satisfied that the jury were warranted in finding, that the outbreak was the result of a carefully considered plan, in which, evidently, the details of the work necessary to be accomplished in order to secure escape were agreed on, and that the particular part Myers and Leverone were to take in it, as well as the particular parts that the other convicts in groups were to take, was prearranged. The rush was made from the line by all the convicts engaged in the outbreak at the same moment. There was no hesitancy or confusion accompanying it. As they rushed out they quickly formed into groups, the members of each group immediately proceeding to the particular task which had been assigned to them, and the office, the guards, and the gatekeeper were simultaneously assailed. In order to secure the success of their attempt to escape, it was necessary, in any scheme which was devised for that purpose, that provision should be made for overpowering the gatekeeper, as well as the other officials. He was not attacked by any other of the convicts except Myers and Leverone, the first, principal, and more persistent assault being made by the former; and, if it were not part of the conspiracy that these particular convicts should attack him, an important detail of the scheme for escape was evidently overlooked—an omission which, from the otherwise apparent completeness of its details and the prompt and concerted manner in which they were executed, cannot be reasonably supposed. The assault of Myers upon both the gatekeeper, Chalmers, and the guard, Cotter, was obviously made in furtherance of the success of the conspiracy which certainly existed among all the other convicts engaged in the outbreak, and it was only a logical and reasonable inference for the jury to make from all the evidence in the case that Myers himself was one of the conspirators. All the evidence warranted the jury in drawing that inference, while there is not a particle of evidence in the case that Myers entertained any grudge or animosity against either Chalmers or Cotter for any reason, either imaginary or real. This is the only point made in the case upon the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

It is insisted that the court erred in the admission of certain evidence over the objection of appellant. This is predicated on the fact that the court permitted the prosecution, on cross-examination of many of the witnesses of appellant—principally prisoners under sentence at the State Prison when the outbreak occurred—to inquire of them, after each had answered that he had been convicted of a felony, as to what the felony was. In the case of People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 607, 41 Pac. 700, this court sanctioned such an inquiry in the following language: "In order to impeach the credibility of a witness, including a defendant when he testifies, the witness may be asked if he has ever been convicted of a felony. The details and circumstances comprising the offense should not be gone into. But, in view of the statute (section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure), which allows the proof of the fact to be made either by the evidence of the witness himself or by the record of conviction, it would appear that not only the fact of the conviction could be shown, but the name of the particular felony of which the witness had been convicted." The Hane Case was cited approvingly on the same point in People v. Putnam, 129 Cal. 258, 61 Pac. 961. It is claimed, however, by appellant that it does not appear from the opinion of the court in the Hane Case that this point was before the court on that appeal, and hence the rule announced there, that such an inquiry was proper, was obiter dictum. While it is true that the opinion in the Hane Case does not specifically state that any point was made on appeal to which the rule announced was pertinent, yet, from the record on appeal and the briefs of counsel on file in this court in that case, which we have examined, it appears that the point was in fact presented for determination, and was undoubtedly intended to be, and was, disposed of by the rule announced with reference to it. But, if it be conceded that the opinion of the court on this point in the Hane Case was but obiter, we are satisfied that, to the extent which we have quoted its language, it correctly states the rule upon the subject, and that it was proper for the lower court in the present case to have permitted the inquiry which is complained of. But it is further complained in the same connection that the court erroneously permitted the prosecution to show that some of the witnesses had been convicted twice of felony. We perceive no valid objection to allowing such proof. None is suggested by counsel for the appellant. Section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which permits proof of the fact that a witness has been convicted of a felony to be given for the purpose of impeaching him, places no limitation upon the number of felonies of which it may be shown he has been convicted, and, considering the purpose of allowing the proof at all, it is obvious that no such limitation could have been intended.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions asked by defendant, and numbered 41, 47, and 55 in the transcript. We do not set them forth, because their consideration does not involve any proposition of law. The instructions tendered dealt with the question of Myers' connection with the conspiracy, and the duty of the jury, should they find he was not so connected, or entertained any reasonable doubt on the subject, to acquit the defendant. This proposition was presented in a large number of separate instructions tendered by the defendant, varying from each other only in phraseology. Defendant's instructions, numbered 27, 29, 33, 34, 35, 36, 43, and 45, which were given by the court, were full and complete on this subject. They presented the same proposition of law which was embraced in the instructions which were refused, and this is all to which the defendant was entitled. A court is not required to give all the instructions asked by a party. It is sufficient if the instructions which are given clearly embrace the same proposition for the guidance of the jury which the refused instructions contained.

There are some other errors assigned, principally relative to the admission of evidence over the objection of defendant. All of these appear to be without substantial merit, and on that account we make no particular reference to them.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GRINNELL v. HILL.

BILLS AND NOTES—DEFENSES—FRAUD.

In an action on a note, an answer alleging that plaintiff, who was on friendly terms with defendant, represented to him that he had purchased shares of a corporation at 25 cents a share, which was less than its market value, and would sell one-half of his purchase to plaintiff at the price he had paid for it, and that the stock would not be issued until some time in the future, at which time, if defendant should so elect, plaintiff would return to him the note given for the stock and take it in his own name; that in fact plaintiff had paid but 10 cents a share, which was the full market value of the stock; and that, before the time when plaintiff represented the stock was to be issued, defendant demanded the return of his note, which plaintiff refused—stated a defense.

SMITH, J. This is a suit upon a promissory note, of date December 27, 1900, for the sum of $625, given for 2,500 shares of Famosa Oil & Investment Company. In the answer, besides the allegations as to the familiar and friendly, if not confidential, relations existing between the parties, it is alleged that the defendant was induced to purchase the stock, and to give the note sued on, by certain fraudulent representations, set forth specifically in the answer, which were, in effect, first, that the plaintiff represented to the defendant that he had purchased 5,000 shares of the stock referred to in the note at 25 cents a share, which was less than its market value, and that on account of the friendly relations existing between them he was willing to let the defendant have one-half of the stock purchased at the price he had paid for it; second, that the plaintiff had in fact purchased the stock at the price of 10 cents a share, which was its full market value; third, that, the defendant saying that he had not the money to invest, the plaintiff proposed to him to give his note, representing to him that the stock could not be issued prior to about the 15th day of September, 1901, at which time the plaintiff, if the defendant should so elect, would return the note to him and have the stock issued to himself; and, fourth, that about the 1st of July, 1901, the defendant having discovered the falsity of the plaintiff's representations, rescinded the contract and demanded the return of the note, which the plaintiff refused to return. There was ample evidence to sustain all of the facts alleged. The case was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment thereon entered, and from an order denying this motion for a new trial.

Numerous points are urged by the appellant for the reversal of the judgment and the order appealed from; but they may be all summed up in the general proposition that the facts above alleged do not constitute a defense to the action. But the contention is too obviously untenable to require serious consideration; the case being, in our opinion, one of aggravated fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572; Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 674, 58 Pac. 271; Langley v. Rodriguez, 122 Cal. 580, 55 Pac. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NOTES—DEFENSES—RIGHT TO RESCISSION.

The answer of P., in an action by the assignee of a note executed by W. and P. to R., alleging that he received no consideration for the note, that it was given for an antecedent debt of W. to B., that P. signed it at the request of W. and B. and in ignorance that it was to secure a pre-existing debt, that W. was insolvent at the time to the knowledge of R., that plaintiff paid no consideration for it, and that at and for a long time prior to the time of signing it he was mentally incapacitated for transacting business, so that he did not comprehend what he was doing, or the nature and obligation of the contract, or the liability he was assuming, is sufficient to constitute a defense; the facts alleged warranting a rescission.

ALLEN, J. Plaintiff declares upon a promissory note executed to one Wright, plaintiff's assignor, by one Wakeley and appellant, Plummer. Wakeley suffered default. Plummer answered, alleging that he received no consideration for the note; that the same was given by Wakeley for an antecedent debt due Wright; that appellant signed the same at the request of said Wakeley and said Wright, and in ignorance of the fact that it was to secure a pre-existing debt; that Wakeley was insolvent at the time, and Wright knew it; that plaintiff paid no consideration for the assignment to him. For a further answer he alleges that at the time of such signing and for a long time prior thereto he was mentally incapacitated for transacting business; that his mind was so impaired that he did not comprehend what he was doing, and did not understand the nature and obligation of the contract, or the liability he was incurring. When the case was called for trial, appellant moved for a continuance, that he might procure the deposition of an absent witness by whom alone he could establish the mental condition and incompetency set out in his answer. It is conceded that this affidavit was sufficient in form, and that due diligence had been used in an attempt to procure the deposition. The motion was denied, and the case proceeded to trial, and judgment went for plaintiff. The motion for a new trial being denied, appellant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying such new trial.

The sole question presented, as conceded by counsel, is as to the sufficiency of the answer to constitute a defense to plaintiff's action; for, if the answer was sufficient, then appellant was, by this action of the court, prevented from an opportunity to present evidence in support thereof. We are of opinion that the answer was sufficient. While the contract was only voidable, the appellant not being shown by the answer to be a person entirely without understanding, yet it was a contract which he might have rescinded under the Code. That right of rescission is exercised when a party who desires to rescind gives seasonable notice of such intent, and when a consideration has been received, returns the same, placing the other party in statu quo, thus terminating the contract. He may sue for a rescission and obtain a judgment of court decreeing his release upon such terms as the court may deem just. Moore v. Moore, 56 Cal. 92. This right also includes the defensive right which authorizes him, if the other party seeks by action to enforce the contract, to set up and establish such matters as would justify a decree of rescission, which is the effect of a judgment in defendant's favor upon such an answer as is before us. Toby v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 98 Cal. 498, 33 Pac. 550; Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 382, 63 Pac. 692. The mere fact that a party does not avail himself of the right to rescind or sue, therefore, is not to be taken as barring him from his right of defense, when the other party seeks to enforce a contract which is voidable, or where the consideration has wholly failed or failed in part. And where no intervening rights or equities are involved, and where, as in this case, no prejudice could possibly exist by reason of delay, this defensive right is still open. The allegations of the answer are sufficient, if established, to warrant a decree of rescission. They certainly are sufficient as a defense, where the contract is sought to be enforced.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

FRESE v. MOORE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 15, 1905.)

1. Shipping—Charters—Contract for Cargo—Assignment.

Where plaintiff chartered a vessel from the owners, who also contracted to furnish plaintiff with a cargo of sawed lumber at a specified basis price, to be shipped to a port in Australia on certain specified terms, and the covenants of the charter and contract were such as another could perform as well as plaintiff, the charter and contract were transferable without the consent of the owners of the vessel.

2. Same—Burden of Obligation.

Under Civ. Code, § 1457, declaring that the burden of an obligation may be transferred with the consent of the party entitled to its benefit, but not otherwise, a charterer of a vessel, holding a contract from the owners for a cargo in addition, could not release himself from performance of such charter and contract by an assignment thereof without the consent of such owners.

3. Same—Suretyship.

Where plaintiff, having a charter party and contract for cargo of a vessel for a certain voyage, transferred the same to defendant without the consent of the other party to the charter and contract, he became a surety for the transferee to secure the latter's faithful performance of plaintiff's obligations.

4. Same—Discharge of Charter—Liability of Assignee.

Where plaintiff, having a charter party and contract for cargo for a certain voyage at a specified rate, assigned the charter and contract to defendant at a higher freight rate, and defendant without plaintiff's consent released the owners from such contract, he was liable to plaintiff for all the benefits which plaintiff would have obtained if the contract had been performed as contemplated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by W. Frese against J. J. Moore. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Young, for appellant. Nathan H. Frank and S. Bloom, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The facts upon which the question as to whether or not the defendant is liable are in substance as follows: On November 3, 1897, the plaintiff (as party of the second part) entered into a contract with the Brunette Sawmill Company (as party of the first part) by the terms of which plaintiff chartered from said company the American barkentine Wrestler for a voyage from Frazer river, in British Columbia, to Freemantle, in Australia. The company agreed to furnish for plaintiff to said vessel at designated loading place or places a full cargo of sawed lumber at the basis price of $7 net for rough merchantable, payable when cargo should be loaded. The charter party or contract contained the following clauses: "The said party of the second part agrees to pay to said party of the first part, or agent, for the use of said vessel during the voyage aforesaid, in cash, without discount, at current rate of exchange on day of settlement, on the right and true delivery of cargo at port of discharge, for each one thousand feet board measure of lumber and/or timber delivered at fifty (50/—) sterling. * * * Vessel to pay a commission at port of loading of (5) five per cent. on amount of charter, in U. S. gold coin, at the exchange of $4.86 per £ sterling to W. Frese & Co., or order, to be consigned to charterer's agent at port of discharge (inward only) free of commission at port of discharge. * * * While at Puget Sound or British Columbia, as above, vessel to be consigned to charterer's agent, outward, and if in ballast also inward, free of commission, but paying them usual fee for doing custom-house business (not to exceed $25), and also to clear in the name of charterers. * * * To the true and faithful performance of each and all of the foregoing agreements, we, the said parties, do hereby bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, each to the other in the penal sum of estimated amount of charter." The above shows not only a charter party, but a contract by the owners of the vessel to furnish a cargo of lumber for the vessel at a specified rate per thousand feet, and by plaintiff to pay, not only the freight as per the charter party, but $7 per thousand for the cargo of lumber when loaded on the vessel. On December 4, 1897, without the consent of the company, the plaintiff agreed to recharter to defendant the vessel, and assign the contract and charter party on the following terms: "57/6 to Freemantle, West Australia, other terms as per original charter party, copy herewith, combined with the cargo of lumber, at the basis price of $7.00 net for rough merchantable, difference of freight between the above and the original rate of 50/— to be paid to us in cash on completion of loading, less the usual 6½% (six and one-half per cent.)." On December 9, 1897, the plaintiff wrote to the mill company, informing it of the transfer to defendant of the charter party and the cargo, and in the letter stated as the reason for the transfer: "We did so because our constituents, not knowing your mill and the quality of lumber you turn out, instruct us to draw only 80% of the f. o. b. price, leaving 20% guaranty of good delivery. We decline to entertain this proposition." December 14th the company wrote to plaintiff acknowledging the receipt of his letter, and stated to plaintiff: "But cannot consent to the transfer of the charter party. However, as the party who purchased the cargo has refused to comply with the terms, we will release you from the charter party, as the owners of the Wrestler contemplate selling her on her arrival here." On December 21, 1897, the plaintiff again wrote to the company, declining to accept the release from the charter party, and calling attention to the fact that he had sold to the defendant, and in the letter stated: "We of course are responsible to you for the strict fulfillment of contract as signed by us." December 21, 1897, the defendant wrote to the company, informing it of the transfer by plaintiff of the charter party and the right to the cargo of lumber to him, and asking for certain changes as to freight rates and place where the vessel was to land. On the receipt of the above letter, December 23d, the company telegraphed to defendant: "We canceled charter on 14th instant with Frese, account purchaser refusing cargo on our terms." Defendant immediately telegraphed to the company that he held indorsed charter party and had promised cargo, and that the charter must be carried out. On the following day, December 24th, the company again telegraphed to defendant stating: "Frese cannot recharter without our consent, which we refuse. Charter canceled." Defendant then on the same day wrote the company, calling attention to the various correspondence and telegrams, and stated that he had purchased the cargo and charter party from plaintiff, and in the letter said: "What you mean by stating that Frese & Co. could not recharter the vessel without your consent is a conundrum to us. A charter party can be transferred the same as any other negotiable document, be it promissory note, bill of exchange, or anything else, and is an everyday occurrence, and till we received your message we never heard of the right to do so being questioned, and we cannot think that you were serious in believing that such could not be done. * * * Trusting that you will understand your position, and that there will be no more difficulty and annoyance about the transaction, we are," etc. On the 28th the defendant again wrote to the company, inclosing specifications for the cargo and insisting on the company keeping its contract, and in the letter defendant said: "This morning we are in receipt of your wire as follows: 'Wrestler awaiting your orders to load. We refuse sell cargo on terms made Frese, he having already canceled.' To say that we are surprised at your actions in this matter would be putting it mildly, and that any responsible and respectable institution would try the various ways that you have tried to get out of this contract is astonishing. First it is one thing, and then it is another, one of which is as flimsy as the other. In fact, your own telegrams to us would show in a court of justice that you yourselves know that you had no grounds wherewith to cancel the charter party or the lumber contract with Frese & Co." On January 1, 1898, the lumber company wrote to defendant, acknowledging telegrams and letters and stating that it could not agree with defendant, and continuing: "However, we cannot supply the cargo your specifications call for and wired you as follows: 'Refuse to supply cargo; will charter you Wrestler to Sydney at 38/—. You buy cargo in Vancouver, and give you option for recharter coals from Sydney'—which we think is a very fair offer. Our mill is shut down at present, undergoing repairs." On January 8, 1898, defendant wrote to the company, agreeing to charter the Wrestler on certain terms named in the letter, to load at Hastings Mills, Vancouver to Sydney, and in this letter defendant, without consulting plaintiff, stated: "And we agree to release both the Wrestler and the Brunette Sawmill Company from all our interests in the charter party entered into with W. Frese & Co., for a voyage to Freemantle, under date November 3d, 1897, as well as our interests in the cargo of lumber which went with the charter party." Defendant, after releasing the sawmill company from the first charter party and contract, entered into a new charter party with the company by which he shipped to Sydney, instead of Freemantle, 564,000 feet of lumber, which at the rate of profit per thousand that Frese & Co. would have made, had the defendant held the sawmill company to its contract, would amount to $961.08, being the amount with interest for which plaintiff recovered judgment.

We are of opinion that plaintiff was entitled to judgment. His charter party and agreement to purchase lumber were property which he had a right to sell upon such terms as he saw fit. Defendant purchased the charter party and right to purchase the cargo of lumber for a consideration which he agreed to pay. The consideration was the difference in the freight rate in the original charter party and the rate named in the recharter. Defendant has not paid plaintiff. He purchased plaintiff's property, and must, under the circumstances, pay the amount he agreed to pay. The charter party and contract did not require any personal skill on the part of plaintiff, was one the covenants of which the defendant could perform as well as plaintiff, and was transferable. Civ. Code, §§ 1044, 1459; Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to obtain the consent of the company in order to transfer the charter party and contract. Of course, the burden of the obligations could not be transferred without the consent of the company. Civ. Code, § 1457; Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, supra. Plaintiff did not attempt to transfer the burden of the obligations, but took the pains to inform the company that he was responsible for the strict fulfillment of contract signed by him. Defendant, by the assignment of the charter party and contract, assumed its burdens on his part as to plaintiff. Plaintiff was not released by the company, and was still responsible to the company as surety to the effect that the defendant would faithfully carry out the charter party and contract. There was an implied contract on the part of defendant to plaintiff that he would carry out the plaintiff's contract which he had purchased. Cutting Packing Company v. Packers' Exchange, supra. The indorsement and transfer of the contracts to defendant transferred all of the plaintiff's rights thereunder. Civ. Code, § 1459; Myers v. South Feather W. Co., 10 Cal. 579; McCarthy v. Tecarte L. & W. Co., 110 Cal. 691, 43 Pac. 391; Allen v. Randolph, 4 Johns. Ch. 693. It follows that, when defendant released the company, the release was conclusive as to plaintiff. Plaintiff could not maintain an action against the company upon obligations which he had transferred and assigned to defendant. His remedy, therefore, was against defendant. After having transferred the obligations to defendant for a valuable consideration, defendant could not relieve himself of the payment of the consideration by releasing the company.

Defendant contends that he was not liable to plaintiff for the freight under the recharter and assignment until the cargo was delivered, and, as it was never delivered, and the company refused to deliver it, the event never happened upon which defendant's liability depended. It is a conclusive answer to this contention that defendant by his own act released the company from its obligation to deliver the cargo of lumber. Defendant will not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. By his own act he prevented the performance of the obligation of the company to deliver the lumber, and the plaintiff is entitled to all the benefits he would have obtained if the contract had been performed by the company. Civ. Code, § 1512. If the defendant had not released the company, and if after due diligence on his part he had failed to enforce the contract with the company, a different question would be presented; but, after plaintiff sold to defendant the charter party and contract for a consideration, the defendant was bound to act in the utmost good faith in the matter.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GREEN.

1. Indictment—Conviction of Offense Included in Charge—Assault with Intent to Rape—Simple Assault.

Assault with intent to ravish, involving a continuous violent assault by defendant upon prosecutrix, includes in its commission a simple assault, of which the jury, when so authorized by an instruction, may convict defendant, although the evidence is amply sufficient to authorize a conviction of assault with intent to ravish.

2. Criminal Law—Appeal—Harmless Error—Instructions.

Instructions relating only to the offense of assault with intent to ravish, with which defendant was charged, were harmless, where defendant was acquitted of that offense and convicted only of simple assault.

Lafayette Gill, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

GRAY, P. J. On a charge of assault with intent to commit rape upon a girl under the age of consent, the defendant was convicted of simple assault, and sentenced to 45 days in the county jail. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying him a new trial.

At the request of defendant, the jury were instructed that they could find the defendant guilty of simple assault. The evidence consisted principally of the testimony of the prosecutrix, setting forth facts which, if fully believed, should have satisfied the jury that the defendant was guilty of the very crime charged in the information, and the testimony of defendant in denial of the more material parts of the testimony of the prosecutrix. It is clear that, if the defendant had been convicted of the greater crime of assault with intent to commit rape, such verdict would, on appeal, have been treated as supported by the evidence. It is also clear that the evidence of the attempt to ravish contained in the record showed that such attempt was instituted with a violent assault and battery, and involved a continuous violent assault from its beginning up to the time the attempt was abandoned, on the approach of the mother of the girl. It is clear on the testimony of the prosecutrix that the defendant assaulted her, and it was none the less an assault because the defendant may have intended also to effect a sexual connection with her. An assault with intent to ravish, committed as indicated by the testimony of the prosecutrix herein, always includes an assault. It was for the jury to say whether this assault was accompanied by the intent necessary to constitute the higher crime. By finding the defendant guilty of simple assault, the verdict shows us that the jury saw fit to believe only that part of the story of prosecutrix that established an assault, and rejected everything that indicated an intent to ravish, refusing to draw any inference of a felonious purpose on the part of defendant. This the jury had the power to do. There is no rule of law requiring the verdict of a jury to be absolutely consistent, according to the ideas of the appellate court. It is the province of the jury to draw their own conclusions from the evidence, and where, as here, they are instructed that they may do so, it is for them to say that the defendant is guilty of one crime, and not guilty of another, as they see fit. And this court will only interfere with a verdict of guilty of assault where there is no evidence showing that an assault was committed. An indecent assault always embraces a simple assault, on the theory that the greater includes the less.

Complaint is made as to many instructions of the court in relation to the age of the prosecutrix, defining the higher crime charged, as to the consent or want of consent of the prosecutrix, as to sexual intercourse with other men, etc. All these instructions related only to the higher offense. The defendant was acquitted of that offense, and we are at a loss to understand how instructions relating only to a crime of which defendant was acquitted can be said to have harmed him. Therefore we will not stop to consider whether such instructions were erroneous or otherwise. There was no instruction given relating to the crime of simple assault that was in any degree erroneous. In instruction 11, given at the request of defendant, the jury were given clearly to understand that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt before they could convict him of simple assault. In instruction 5 they were also told that, "to warrant a conviction of the defendant, he must be proved to be guilty so clearly and conclusively that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent." The appellant is mistaken in assuming that the court did not inform the jury that, before they would be warranted in convicting of assault, they must be satisfied from the evidence that such an offense was committed. Nor was there anything contained in any of the instructions that would mislead, or confuse, or lead the jury into error concerning the crime of which the verdict convicts him. Appellant is also mistaken in his assumption that instruction 10 as proposed by him was intended to apply to a simple assault, or to in any way guide the jury in its determination as to whether they would return a verdict of guilty of simple assault. The word "assault" in that instruction is never used by itself, but in all instances in connection with "to commit rape upon," or "to have sexual intercourse with, the prosecutrix by the defendant." It applies only to the higher crime charged in the information, and, as we have already seen, the defendant having been acquitted of that crime, the giving or refusing of it, or the qualifying of it by the court, worked no injury to the defendant.

ELLIS et al. v. DOHERTY.

PLEADINGS—ISSUES RAISED—FINDINGS.

A complaint alleged that defendant was indebted to plaintiffs for money delivered to defendant for plaintiffs' use and benefit, and further alleged nonpayment by defendant of a balance due. Defendant admitted the receipt of the money, and alleged payment to plaintiffs' creditors except a certain sum, which by agreement with plaintiffs he paid to himself, and denied that there was any balance due, other than a specified sum less than that claimed by plaintiffs. Held, that the answer presented an issue which warranted the court in finding, according to the evidence, that there was no agreement that defendant should pay himself the sum alleged by him, but that the agreement was that defendant should have such sum, if sufficient profit should result from the transaction out of which the agreement arose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by B. F. Ellis and another against J. Doherty. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

ALLEN, J. Plaintiffs in their amended complaint, and for a third cause of action, allege that defendant is indebted to them in the sum of $43,244.59, upon an account for lawful money delivered by the plaintiffs to defendant for plaintiffs' use and benefit, which sum defendant promised and agreed to pay; the nonpayment of which, except the sum of $41,315.57, is alleged, and that there was unpaid the sum of $1,929.02, with interest from May 13, 1902. Defendant in his answer admits receipt of such money, but avers that he paid out of the same to other parties, creditors of plaintiffs, the sum of $41,495.32, and that by agreement between plaintiffs and defendant he paid to himself $1,000, and denies that any balance in excess of $749.27 is in his possession. Upon the trial the court found that the defendant had not paid out of said moneys any sum in excess of $41,315.57; that there was no agreement that defendant should pay himself $1,000, but, on the contrary, the agreement was that, after the payment to plaintiffs of $4 per day each, for time employed in the construction of a building in connection with which plaintiffs' money was received by defendant, if sufficient profit remained growing out of such construction, that defendant should have $1,000. The court finds that, when the building was completed and the per diem due plaintiffs deducted, there remained but $200 of profit applicable to the payment of defendant's demand. It was further found that, pending the action, defendant had paid plaintiffs $729.02; and judgment was rendered for $1,000, which was the balance found by the court remaining in defendant's hands, after crediting him with the $200. From this judgment defendant appeals, the sole question presented by appellant being that the findings and judgment do not rest on the pleadings. There is no merit in this contention. The answer, setting up the agreement by which defendant was to pay himself out of the funds $1,000, presented an issue, and in its determination the court properly found the facts in relation to the agreement under which the payment, or any payment, was due defendant. The findings are within the issues, and they support the judgment, and the judgment is affirmed.

TRUSTS — MORTGAGE BY TRUSTEE—LIABILITY OF BENEFICIARY.

Where, after land is conveyed to W. for the benefit of herself and H., it is decreed in a suit against W. by B. that the land should be conveyed to B., unless redemption was made from execution sale under a judgment which was a lien on the land before the conveyance to W., and to obtain money to redeem W. gives a mortgage on the land, the interest of H. in the land is subject to his proportion of the mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Suit by F. H. Hentig against C. B. Williams and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Modified.

Rehearing denied September 15, 1905.

Bower & Hutchinson and C. E. Bower, for appellants. F. G. Hentig and J. L. Murphey, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This suit was brought to enforce a resulting or constructive trust in an undivided half of the lot of land described in the complaint, conveyed by one Zeigler to the defendant Mary Williams. The defendants Johnson and Heidel were joined as mortgagees. The plaintiff had judgment, from which all the defendants appeal. The record contains a bill of exceptions, setting forth the evidence, with specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings. The appeal of the defendants Williams was taken within 60 days after the entry of the judgment. The appeal of the other defendants was made after the expiration of that period.

The complaint sets forth at length all the particulars of the transactions involved, all of which are denied by the joint answer of the defendants; and in the separate answer of the defendant Mary Williams her account of the transaction is set up. The court finds all the allegations of the complaint to be true; all the allegations in the joint answer of the defendants to be untrue, except one, which is of no materiality; and the allegations of the separate answer of defendant Mary Williams to be untrue. It also finds specifically the facts as to the various transactions involved in the suit. To all and singular of such findings, or nearly all, objection is made that the evidence was insufficient to justify them; and it is also claimed that some of them are contradictory. Many of these objections are to immaterial matters, and whether they be well founded or not need not be considered; but on one material point relating to the mortgage of the defendant Heidel, the objections made are well taken. As to the rest of the findings, though the evidence is conflicting, they are fully supported by the evidence.

Briefly stated, the case as shown by the findings is this: Prior to the execution of the deed from Zeigler to the defendant Mary Williams, one Mrs. Casenave was indebted to Hentig and Williams in several small sums, and was proposing to sell cèrtain lands belonging to her to Zeigler, who, in part payment of the purchase money, was to convey to her the lands in controversy; and with reference to this land, it was agreed between her and Hentig and Williams that the lands of Zeigler should be taken as part of the purchase money, upon their agreement to raise the sum of $600 thereon by mortgage, and to pay the same to Mrs. Casenave, which was done. Afterwards it was agreed between the parties that the land should be conveyed to Mrs. Williams for the benefit of Hentig and Williams, and that the mortgage thereon should be executed by her. Accordingly, the conveyance was made to Mrs. Williams, who took with full notice of the facts; and contemporaneously with the deed, or a few days thereafter, the mortgage on the lot was executed by Mrs. Williams to one McConnel for the sum of $600, which was paid to Mrs. Casenave. This mortgage was afterwards assigned to the defendant Mrs. Johnson, and is now held by her; and by the decree of the court the interest of the plaintiff and the defendants Williams is made subject to her mortgage. The defendant Mrs. Johnson, therefore, has no cause to complain, and the judgment as to her must be affirmed.

The only serious question in the case is as to the mortgage of the defendant Mrs. Heidel, as to which the facts disclosed by the evidence are as follows: Prior to the date of the transaction involved, one Bamberger held a judgment against Mrs. Casenave for the sum of $834, which constituted a lien upon her lands, and in order to complete the transaction it was necessary that this judgment should be satisfied. Accordingly, it was agreed between him and Williams, as the agent of Mrs. Casenave, that Bamberger would take the sum of $433.56 in satisfaction of the judgment, and that to carry out this agreement he would deposit the acknowledgment of satisfaction with the Title Insurance & Trust Company, in escrow, to be delivered to Williams upon the payment of the amount agreed upon. Accordingly, the acknowledgment of satisfaction was executed, and, with escrow instructions, was delivered to Williams to be delivered to the trust company; but Williams fraudulently filed the satisfaction of judgment with the county clerk, and did not deliver it to the trust company, and thus the conveyances of Mrs. Casenave and of Zeigler were effected. Thereafter, February 9, 1901, upon the discovery by Bamberger of the fraudulent satisfaction of the judgment, he by appropriate proceedings had said satisfaction vacated; and afterwards, March 11, 1901, the land was sold under execution and purchased by Bamberger for $250. Following this transaction, a suit was commenced by Bamberger against Mrs. Casenave and the defendants Williams, setting up the above facts, which resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff therein, of date November 27, 1901, adjudging that the title to the land in question was held by the defendant Mary Williams in trust for the said plaintiff, and that, in case no redemption should be made, a deed should be executed to him accordingly. The rendition of this judgment is found by the court, and the judgment itself, with an agreed statement of the record, appears in the bill of exceptions. It is also found by the court that the mortgage to Mrs. Heidel, which was for the sum of $200, was executed by Mrs. Williams, March 18, 1902, and that with the sum so obtained she settled the claim of Bamberger under his judgment and purchase for the sum of $218.50. It is, indeed, also found "that the plaintiff * * * was in no way responsible for or chargeable with said Bamberger judgment, or any part thereof," and, in effect, that no benefit was received by the plaintiff from the money borrowed from Mrs. Heidel. But the contrary appears from the facts specifically found. Upon these facts it appears that upon the vacation of the satisfaction of Bamberger's judgment against Mrs. Casenave it became a lien upon the land in controversy, and that the judgment of Bamberger against Mrs. Williams, the plaintiff's trustee, was binding upon plaintiff. The money paid, therefore, by Mrs. Williams, for the removal of this lien and the satisfaction of the judgment, was expended for the common benefit of the plaintiff and the defendants Williams, and the former is chargeable with his proportion thereof. The judgment must therefore be modified by adjudging the interest of the plaintiff in the land to be subject, not only to the mortgage of Mrs. Johnson, but also to the payment to Mrs. Williams of one-half the sum of $218.50, with legal interest thereon from the 18th day of March, 1902 for the use and benefit of the defendant Mrs. Heidel.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the judgment as above indicated, and that the judgment, so modified, shall stand affirmed.

1. DAMAGES — PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVENESS.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, evidence held insufficient to show that a verdict for $2,000 was excessive, or that the jury were influenced by anything outside of the evidence.

2. TRIAL — EXPERT TESTIMONY—CAUTIONARY INSTRUCTIONS—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, refusal to give a cautionary instruction as to the weight to be given expert medical evidence was not reversible error.

3. EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTIONS — FAILURE TO CALL WITNESS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger, it appeared that she had been visited by four different physicians, one of whom, at least, was in defendant's employ, and two of them were merely called in consultation with the physician who had charge of the case, who was called as a witness, defendant having failed to call the others, it was not error for the court to refuse to charge that, where a party offers weaker or less satisfactory evidence, when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory evidence was within his power, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust.

4. SAME.

Where the court charged that each item of damage claimed by plaintiff must be shown to a reasonable degree of certainty by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the law authorizes such reasonable damages as the jury deem plaintiff entitled to under the evidence, an instruction that in reaching a verdict the jury should not only consider all the evidence, but also all surrounding circumstances, and draw all inferences from such circumstances and from the testimony as may be reasonably drawn, was not objectionable, as authorizing the consideration of facts in addition to the evidence.

Action by F. G. Wood and wife against the Los Angeles Traction Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Millikin, for appellant. S. P. Mulford and Harris & Harris, for respondents.

GRAY, P. J. This is an action by a husband and wife to recover damages for an injury suffered by the wife as a passenger upon the defendant's street car, by reason of a collision between two of defendant's cars. The plaintiffs had a verdict and judgment for $2,000. At the trial of the case the liability of the defendant for the injury was conceded; the only thing contested being the amount of damages the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying it a new trial.

The evidence in the case showed that in the collision Mrs. Wood was hurled violently from the car and struck the street upon her head and shoulder; that she received a severe cut of the scalp, through to the skull and about 2½ inches in length; that she sustained a severe injury to her arm and shoulder, and apparently a concussion of the brain, which rendered her stupid and unable to recognize her immediate relatives and friends for some hours thereafter; that she was confined to her bed and under the care of physicians for about three weeks after the injury; that her arm continued in a paralyzied and lifeless condition, as she described it; and that she was compelled to wear bandages thereon for three months after the accident. She testified that at the time of the trial, nearly a year after the accident, she could still feel the effects of the injury, and that she did not have the same use of her arm that she had before the injury, and that still at times she could feel sharp shooting pains, from which she could locate the very spot of the scar in her head, and that she had resulting swelling of the glands of her neck from the injury that she had received to the side of her head. She also testified that she suffered much wakefulness and loss of sleep since the injury; that prior thereto she had been a good sleeper, but a poor sleeper since; and the evidence also showed that the shock which she had received had apparently permanently affected her memory. This, perhaps, is not a very full statement of the evidence; nor does it seem necessary to state the evidence fully. It is sufficient to say that with a doctor's and nurse's bill of about $300, and the injuries already indicated, we can see nothing in the verdict for no more than $2,000 that would warrant any interference on the part of the court, or the indulgence of any presumption that the jury, in returning a verdict for that amount, must have been influenced by anything other than the evidence.

Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give, at the request of defendant, the following instructions: "And you are further instructed, in this connection, that the opinion evidence of medical experts should always be examined with great caution, and weighed carefully in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and that in weighing the evidence you have a right to exercise your judgment in the light of your own general knowledge upon the subject or subjects concerning which the evidence has been introduced." We are aware that the Supreme Court of this state has held, where it was objected that an instruction similar to the above was improperly given, that the instruction was proper, and have refused to reverse a case for the giving of it. Haight v. Vallet, 89 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 465. But similar instructions in other cases have been criticised by our Supreme Court as an unwarranted interference with the province of the jury; the theory being that to single out a particular class of evidence, or the testimony of particular witnesses, and tell the jury that it should be examined with great caution, might lead the jury to infer that the court had a poor opinion of such evidence. Our attention has not been called to any case where a judgment has been reversed for the refusal to give an instruction of this character. It is clearly intimated in one case (People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 13, 52 Pac. 112) that such an instruction ought not to be given, though the court in that case declines to reverse the judgment on account of its having been given. Section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for certain cautionary instructions that may be given in proper cases to the jury. It provides, however, for no instruction to the effect that great, or any, caution should be used in examining expert evidence. Nor does the Code of Civil Procedure anywhere authorize the giving of a cautionary instruction as to expert evidence; and in this condition of the law we think that a case should not be reversed for the refusal to give a cautionary instruction of this character. Indeed, it is held in People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 77 Pac. 907, and in People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744, that a case should not be reversed for a refusal to give certain of the cautionary instructions particularly authorized by the subdivisions of said section 2061; and on the authority of those cases it is clear that no material error was committed in the refusal to give the instruction now under discussion.

It is also contended that the court should have given instructions requested by the defendant to the effect that, where a party offers weaker and less satisfactory evidence, when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory evidence was within his power, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust. It was held in the case of People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 591, 55 Pac. 407, that the giving of such an instruction as this in a criminal case was error. In that case Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 283, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124, was cited; the same principle having been applied there in a civil case as was applied in the case of People v. Cuff. In the last-mentioned case it is said: "The danger lurking in these subdivisions of the section is found in the fact that they attempt to deal with the weight and effect of evidence—matters for the jury, and not matters for legislative action. The aforesaid section of the Code declares that the principles stated in the various subdivisions thereof may be given by the court to the jury upon all proper occasions. In criminal cases the proper occasions are so few, and the improper occasions are so many, that it were best they should be given rarely, if at all." We do not think the present case is one presenting a proper occasion for giving the instruction requested. It appeared that the plaintiff was visited by four different physicians, and that one of these physicians at least, if not more, was in the employ of the defendant. Two of them were merely called in consultation with the physician who had charge of the case. Dr. Jenkins was the attending physician, and he made some 50 visits upon Mrs. Wood during the time that he was treating her for the injuries. He was called as a witness, and we cannot see how his testimony can be said to have been less satisfactory than would have been the evidence of physicians who saw the patient only once or twice, and who undoubtedly received most of the knowledge they possessed concerning the symptoms of her case secondhand from Dr. Jenkins. There was nothing in Dr. Jenkins' evidence, as it appears in the record, that would indicate that anything different or more satisfactory might have been obtained from any of the other physicians; and, if the defendant had been possessed of any notion that any more satisfactory expert evidence, or direct testimony, could have been obtained from any of the other three doctors, it was the defendant's privilege to call the same. This is not a case of the suppression of any evidence, as we view it from the record. Nor is it a case of the offering of weaker and less satisfactory evidence, when it appeared that stronger evidence was within the power of the party offering it. So far as we can see, the testimony of the other three doctors was equally "within the power" of both parties, and the instructions requested, if they affected the jury at all, might have been taken as reflecting quite as severely on the defendant as on the plaintiff. We think, however, that, as there is nothing to indicate that the testimony of the four doctors, added together, would have been stronger and more satisfactory than was the testimony of the one attending physician, it would have been idle to give the instructions. We think they were properly refused.

The court, at the request of plaintiffs, instructed the jury as follows: "You are instructed that in reaching a verdict in this case it is your duty, not only to take into consideration all the evidence given by the witnesses and weigh the same with care, but to take into consideration, in weighing such evidence and in reaching a conclusion, all of the surrounding circumstances, and draw all the inferences from such circumstances and from the testimony of witnesses as may be reasonably drawn." It is objected that in this instruction the jury were told that it was their duty, not only to take into consideration all the evidence given by the witnesses, but also to take into consideration something beyond that and in addition to the evidence. We hardly think the instruction, standing alone, would bear that construction, but are of opinion that the jury would understand that the court, in referring to "the surrounding circumstances," meant only such circumstances as might be developed by the evidence. But, be that as it may, the instructions should all be read and construed together. In addition to the instruction complained of, the jury were told that "the existence of each item of injury or damage claimed by the plaintiffs must be shown to a reasonable degree of certainty by the preponderance of the evidence." They were also told that the law "authorizes you to give such reasonable damages as in your honest and candid judgment you deem the plaintiffs entitled to under the evidence." Listening to these instructions, we think the jury could not fail to understand that their verdict was to be based upon the evidence, and upon that alone.

We see no error in the record, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re JEFFREYS' ESTATE.

ABBOTT v. KERRIGAN et al.

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION—"BOOKS AND PAPERS."

A bequest of all testator's books and papers was insufficient to convey a bank deposit, evidenced by bank books, especially where such interpretation would render other provisions of the will nugatory.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Judicial accounting by Frank H. Kerrigan and others, executors of the estate of Albert Jeffreys, deceased, and others. From a final decree of distribution, William M. Abbott appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied September 23, 1905.

L. A. Gibbons, for appellant. Chas. W. Slack and J. J. Lermen, for respondents.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by William M. Abbott from a decree of distribution, and the only question involved is as to the proper construction of the will of Albert Jeffreys, deceased. The will is holographic, and is as follows: "My will. April 10th, 1902. I owe William M. Abbott $600, which I wish paid. To the Rev. M. D. Connolly I give the sum of $1,000. To William M. Abbott I give all my books and papers. To Eugenie M. St. Paul I give the rest and residue of my estate of every kind and nature. [Then follows a statement naming two persons to whom he leaves nothing, a provision as to persons who may claim to be heirs, the appointment of executors, a revocation of former wills, waiver of bonds, and a provision for sale of real estate without order of court.] Albert Jeffreys."

The appellant contends that under the clause, "To William M. Abbott I give all my books and papers," there passed to him 14 certain bank books, and in consequence the moneys on deposit represented by such books. The court below ordered distribution of a large number of books, consisting mostly of law books, a promissory note, and a certificate for 143 shares of stock, to appellant, $1,000 to Rev. Connolly, and the residue of the estate, consisting of an interest in four parcels of land, one typewriter, and $1,661.97, to Eugenie M. Roberts, described in the will as Eugenie M. St. Paul, but since married to Roberts. The money, to wit, the $2,661.97, thus distributed, was what was left of the deposits represented by the bank books. At the death of the testator the 14 bank books represented deposits in various banks to the credit of testator, aggregating upwards of $8,700. If the contention of appellant be correct, this entire sum of money passed to him, and should not have been charged with the payment either of expenses of administration, debts, or the legacy to Connolly until the property given to the residuary legatee had been exhausted. Civ. Code, §§ 1359, 1360. It must be confessed that a bank book is a book, and yet the average mind, we think, would not ordinarily understand that by a bequest of "all my books" a testator meant to bequeath money in bank. Appellant himself does not seem to have realized the full possibilities of his case until late in the proceedings of this estate, for he seems to have remained silent while the executor appropriated upwards of $6,000 out of the bank deposits to the payment of expenses of administration and debts. There was left for distribution but $2,661 out of the $8,700 on deposit at the death of the testator; and, as we have shown, if appellant's contention be correct, recourse should have first been had to the real estate and typewriter, which passed under the residuary clause, for the payment of all expenses and debts. While bequests of books are quite common, and many persons leave bank books among their effects, we have been cited to no case, and we know of none, where a court has held that under a bequest of "books" or "all my books," bank books, and, in consequence, bank deposits, passed.

We are cited to Perkins v. Mathes, 49 N. H. 107, as sustaining appellant's contention. In that case it was held that under "all my books and papers of every description" a promissory note passed. Unless this construction had been adopted, nothing would have passed to the particular legatee save a Bible, some ordinary books, and a manuscript, all of very little pecuniary value. In the companion case (Mathes v. Smart, 51 N. H. 438), construing the same words in the same will, it was held that two bank books showing deposits in the Newmarket Bank did not pass, and the court said: "In Perkins v. Mathes we were influenced not a little by the consideration that, unless the promissory notes were to be regarded as comprehended in the bequest of books and papers, there was in reality no bequest of practical value to the plaintiff." Indeed, in Perkins v. Mathes the court said: "A testator is to be considered as intending a benefit to the object of his gift." In Webster v. Wiers, 51 Conn. 569, it was held that the words, "I give to M. all my household effects, books, and papers of value, and everything the house contains," did not pass a bank book showing a deposit of $2,500, although found in the house. In Jackson's Ex'r v. Piscataqua Savings Bank et al., 70 N. H. 283, 47 Atl. 613, it was held a bank book showing deposits in the name of Nathaniel Jackson, Jr., where testator had retained the book in his possession till death, and did not by making the deposit intend a gift, did not pass by a bequest of "certain books marked with his name"; there being found three ordinary books marked "Nathaniel Jackson." "Words of a will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected, and that other can be ascertained." Civ. Code, § 1324. Applying this rule to the words in question, would the ordinary man understand by the words "my books," used in ordinary conversation, that the speaker meant bank books? If a man should say, in ordinary conversation, "I am the possessor of 100 books," would any listener suppose for a moment that he meant to include in such statement "bank books"? We think that the answer to both these questions is obviously "No," notwithstanding the definition of the word "book" given in dictionaries is broad enough to include bank book. "The words of a will are to receive an interpretation which will give to every expression some effect, rather than one which will render any of the expressions inoperative" (Civ. Code, § 1325); "and a testator is to be considered as intending a benefit to the object of his gift" (Perkins v. Mathes, supra; Wallace v. Wallace, 23 N. H. 149).

If the construction of this will asked by appellant be adopted, the residuary legatee would receive nothing, and the residuary clause would have no effect; for the entire residue, including the $1,661 in money distributed to said legatee, amounted in value to but $2,160. The inheritance tax charged to said legatee was $108, which is the tax on a valuation of $2,160. The real estate and typewriter, which, according to the theory of appellant, constitute the residue of the estate, therefore, were worth but $700. This would not be sufficient to pay the Connolly legacy of $1,000, not to mention the $600 debt owing by testator to appellant and by the will directed to be paid, and the other debts and expenses of administration, all of which, under the law, are first chargeable against the property given to the residuary legatee before resort could be had to any property given to appellant. Civ. Code, §§ 1359, 1360. Neither Connolly nor Mrs. Roberts could have properly received anything from this estate, if the contention of appellant be correct; for, exclusive of the $8,700 represented by the bank books, the entire estate seems to have consisted only of the typewriter and real estate, valued at $700, about $600 received from the employers of testator, and some rentals from the real estate, while the debts and expenses of administration seem to have exceeded $6,000. It is true that the debts and expenses seem to have been paid by the executor out of the moneys in bank; but, if the contention of appellant be correct, these moneys should not have been resorted to until the property given to the residuary legatee had been exhausted. Civ. Code, §§ 1359, 1360. Thus it is seen that if the lower court had adopted the construction asked by appellant, and such construction had been fully carried out in the settlement of this estate, both the bequest to Connolly and to Mrs. Roberts would have been rendered nugatory, and the rule laid down in section 1325, Civ. Code, as well as the rule followed in Perkins v. Mathes, supra, violated. Where a testator leaves among his effects a large number of law books and other ordinary books, we do not think that a court ought to assume that by a bequest of "all my books and papers" a testator meant to give several thousand dollars on deposit in banks, although such deposits are evidenced by bank books, especially where, as in this case, such an interpretation would render of no effect other provisions of the will.

The decree of distribution is affirmed.

SANTA ROSA BANK v. STRIENING et al.

1. Appeal—Motion to Dismiss—Determination.

A motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file briefs within the time required must be determined by the facts existing at the time the notice of motion was given.

2. Court Rules — Application — Briefs — Filing.

Where appellant's brief was not filed within 30 days after the transcript was filed, as required by Supreme Court rules 2, 5 (64 Pac. vii, viii), applicable to the Appellate Court, nor within the time as extended by various court orders, nor until after notice of motion to dismiss had been given, the appeal would be dismissed, though briefs were filed prior to the hearing of the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by the Santa Rosa Bank against John M. Striening and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant H. B. Schindler appeals. Dismissed.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellant failed to file his brief in time. The transcript was filed May 16, 1904. Time in which to serve and file brief was extended by counsel for respondent to and including July 13, 1904. On July 13, 1904, counsel for appellant filed application in the Supreme Court asking 20 days' further extension of time to file brief, which was granted on that day. On August 2, 1904, that court granted 20 days' further time from and after that date, and on August 25, 1904, that court granted 15 days' further time from that date, and in the order stated that "no further extension of time will be granted." Under these orders the time in which to serve and file points and authorities expired on September 9, 1904. The cause was transferred to this court on January 30, 1905, and was placed upon the present August calendar. On August 14, 1905, respondent served notice of motion to dismiss on appellant's attorneys, and filed said notice in this court on August 24, 1905, and on the latter day appellant filed in this court his points and authorities. Appellant had sent to the clerk's office his points and authorities on August 18th, but, not having previously served same on respondent's attorney, they were not filed until evidence of such service was furnished, which was on August 24, 1905.

Rule 5 of the Supreme Court (64 Pac. viii), which is made a rule of this court, provides that, if the points and authorities of appellant be not filed within the time prescribed (which, by rule 2 [64 Pac. vii], is 30 days after the transcript is filed), the appeal may be dismissed on motion, upon notice given. If, however, the points and authorities "be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion." In McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359, it was decided that a motion to dismiss must be determined by the facts existing at the time the notice of motion was given; and the right of the respondent to have the appeal dismissed under the rules cannot be affected or destroyed by any subsequent filing and service of the appellant's points and authorities.

Conceding, without deciding, that the court has discretion to refuse to dismiss the appeal, notwithstanding the rule above stated, upon a sufficient showing, we do not think such showing has been made. The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. PROCTOR.

1. Larceny—Proof—Sufficiency.

Defendant proposed marriage to prosecutrix, and was accepted. He represented that he had property which he was trading for a new house, and that he needed a specified sum in addition to what he had in bank to make the deal. The prosecutrix agreed to loan him money, for which he agreed to give a bill of sale as security. The loan was made, but his representations were false. Held, that he was not guilty of larceny; title to the money loaned being transferred to him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Larceny, § 35.]

2. Same—False Pretenses—Distinguished.

Where one parts with the possession of and title to personalty by means of false representations knowingly made, the crime is not larceny, but that of obtaining money by false pretenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Henry A. Melvin, Judge.

William Proctor was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

Aldrich & Gentry, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. Defendant is charged in the information with the crime of grand larceny, committed on the 19th day of December, 1904, by feloniously stealing, taking, and carrying away $108 in gold and silver coins, the property of Emeline Tyson. He was found guilty as charged, and sentenced to a term of six years in San Quentin. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion.

The facts relied on to sustain the verdict are stated by the prosecuting witness, Emeline Tyson, and are in substance as follows: Emeline Tyson was past 76 years of age on Friday, December 16, 1904, when she first met defendant at Niles Station and had a moment's conversation with him. He came to her house, which was about one mile from the station, the following morning, and sold her a pair of spectacles. While there they engaged in a general conversation. He told her that he had been a widower for about 15 years, had traveled around a great deal, but was tired of living that way; that she was just the woman he had been looking for; that it was a case of "love at first sight." His love making seems to have been agreeable, as he promised to call again that (Saturday) evening. He did not, however, call on Saturday evening, but did call Sunday morning, and made an excuse for not having called Saturday evening. He called again Sunday evening, and the prosecuting witness gives an account of the transaction in the following language: "He asked me to marry him, and I told him I would if I found him to be a perfect gentleman and able to take care of me. He said he was plenty able to do it; that he had an old house and lot in Oakland that he was trading off for a new house. He said he had $550 in the bank, and needed $60 more to make the deal, or he would lose the bargain. He said he wanted the new house for us to live in. Then I agreed to let him have the money. He said he would give me good security for it; that he had a bill of sale of an auto worth $500; and that he would give me a bill of sale as security. I promised then to try and get the $60 for him the next morning. I saw him the next morning (Monday) at my home. He said he had just received a letter from his sister in the East, and that they had sold out and she was coming on, and that he would soon have a lot of money. He said he was giving me good security, and would have the money on the 15th of January. He said, 'You just as well make it out now $108. I want a little Christmas money, too, and I am giving you good security for it, and will pay it back on the 15th.' His sister was coming, and would have a lot of money. Then I got the money, and let him have it, $108 lawful money of the United States. Then he gave me the bill of sale to an automobile. When he paid this money back on the 15th of January I was to give him back the bill of sale." The witness further testified in cross-examination: "There was no agreement on his part to use any of this money for me. I was simply lending him so much money, and he was going to give me this false bill of sale. I would not have let him have this money on this bill of sale if he had not have been going to marry me. The only reasons I had for handing this money to this defendant upon that 19th day of December, 1904, were that we were engaged to be married, that he said he would give me good security, this bill of sale of a fine automobile, and that he would be plenty able to pay it back on the 15th of January."

The only question that need be discussed is as to whether or not the verdict of larceny is supported by the facts as stated. Larceny is the felonious stealing or taking away of the personal property of another. The title to the property is not changed, but remains in the party from whom the property was taken. Where the owner parts with the possession and title by reason of false and fraudulent representations, knowingly and designedly made, the crime is not larceny, but that of obtaining money by false pretenses. The distinction that runs through the books, as stated by the judges and text-writers, is that, to constitute larceny, the owner of the property stolen must not have intended to part with the title to it, while in false pretenses he did intend to part with the property and the title thereto, but the intention was brought about by fraudulent circumstances. If the transaction has not been completed, and the owner did not intend to part with title to the property, and the defendant procured the possession by means of false and fraudulent representations, the crime is larceny. The court below correctly stated the law to the jury in its instruction, wherein it said: "If you find from the evidence that the money, which is the subject of the alleged larceny in this action, was obtained by the defendant from the prosecuting witness, Emeline Tyson, and that the said Emeline Tyson voluntarily gave the money to the defendant, and that she (Emeline Tyson) did not expect to get any part of this money back from the defendant, and that said Emeline Tyson intended to part with the ownership as well as the possession of said money, and that at the time the money was so obtained it was understood by the said Emeline Tyson that said money was to be used by the defendant on his own account, then the defendant is not guilty of larceny, even though you should find that the defendant fraudulently obtained the money by means of false pretenses. You must judge of the intent which governed the acts of the complaining witness, Emeline Tyson, in handing over the money, by the knowledge possessed by her at the time she handed over the money, and not by any facts which she may have learned afterwards." The prosecuting witness loaned the money to defendant. She parted with the possession and title to it. She believed at the time that defendant was to be her future husband. She believed him him to be a perfect gentleman, and that the automobile was good security. She was the victim of misplaced confidence and affection, but defendant did not commit larceny in getting her money.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. BOWERS.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 30, 1905.)

1. Criminal Law — Appeal — Conflicting Evidence.

Where a conviction is based on conflicting evidence, and a new trial has been denied, the appellate court will not set the same aside on the mere ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 3068, 3084.]

2. Homicide—Arsenical Poisoning—Symptoms—Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, it was claimed that deceased died from arsenical poisoning, and there was evidence that he was afflicted with purging and vomiting, symptoms of arsenical poisoning, evidence that the clothing and bed linen used by deceased during his illness, and shortly before his death, were in a dirty and soiled condition, was admissible, as tending to corroborate the evidence of such symptoms.

3. Same.

Such evidence was also admissible to rebut testimony that defendant was kind and attentive to the comfort of deceased, her husband, during his last illness.

4. Same—Motive.

In a prosecution of defendant for murdering her husband, evidence of amorous conduct between defendant and L. immediately prior and subsequent to the killing was admissible to establish a motive.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 326.]

5. Criminal Law—Examination of Experts—Medical Books.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, it did not appear, except from the statements of defendant's attorney, that the jury could have known that the district attorney was in fact reading from a medical book, or from any book, while asking a question of an expert witness with reference to the progress of arsenical poisoning, and the question was asked as that of the district attorney, the fact that part of it was read from a medical book did not constitute error.

6. Same—Witnesses—Objections.

Where a physician had testified that he had been a physician and surgeon for several years past, and had given testimony without objection as an expert along medical lines, an objection to a hypothetical question that no proper foundation had been laid therefor and that it was not based on the facts presented and was incompetent as assuming a province of the jury was insufficient to raise the question that the witness had not shown himself qualified to testify as an expert.

7. Homicide—Evidence—Conspiracy.

Defendant's sister procured arsenic from a druggist on a forged prescription in defendant's handwriting, written on paper torn from a book belonging to defendant and in her possession. Deceased, who was defendant's husband, died five days subsequent to the getting of the arsenic, and nearly four grains of arsenious acid was found in his stomach after death. Held, that such facts were sufficient to authorize the admission of evidence of a druggist that defendant's sister presented to him on a certain day a prescription for arsenic signed by a certain doctor, and that he sold thereon an ounce of arsenic or arsenious acid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Martha E. Bowers was convicted of murder in the first degree, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court, October 11, 1905.

C. W. Lynch, F. G. Drury, Lynch & Drury, H. J. McIsaac, and Coldwell & Borland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree for the killing of her husband, and was sentenced in accordance with the verdict to imprisonment for life. This is an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

The first point urged as ground for a reversal of the judgment and order is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. In cases where there is simply a conflict of evidence on the question as to whether or not the defendant is guilty, this court cannot interfere with the verdict of the jury and the determination of the trial court thereon on motion for a new trial. People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 Pac. 169; People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 40, 70 Pac. 1014; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 394, 77 Pac. 177. In People v. Gonzales, 143 Cal. 605, 77 Pac. 448, the rule is laid down thus: "This court cannot interfere with the verdict of a jury, nor with the action of the court below in refusing a new trial, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, unless there was such a lack of evidence as to satisfy us that the court below abused its discretion in denying the new trial." In the case now before the court the evidence is largely circumstantial, and is set forth in 488 pages of the transcript. No good purpose will be subserved by discussing in detail the evidence. Such a discussion would necessarily be an argument as to what inferences should or could be drawn from the evidence. Suffice it to say that after a careful examination of the evidence in the transcript we are of the opinion that under the rules above set forth the contention of appellant on this point cannot be sustained. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and the court did not err, so far as this point is concerned, in denying the motion for a new trial.

It is next urged that the court erred in admitting, over the objection of the defendant, testimony to the effect that the clothing and bed linen used by deceased during his illness shortly before his death were in a dirty and much soiled condition. This testimony was clearly proper. It tended to corroborate other testimony to the effect that deceased was afflicted with purging, and vomiting, symptoms, as the evidence showed, of arsenical poisoning, from which it was claimed that deceased died. One of the witnesses testified that the soiling of the bed sheets was the result of vomiting and purging. Prior to the introduction of the evidence complained of defendant had drawn out testimony to the effect that during the illness of deceased, which lasted upwards of two months, defendant had appeared, at least in the presence of the witness, to be kind and attentive to the comfort of her husband. From the condition of the bed linen, etc., inferences might well be drawn that defendant was not really anxious for the comfort or recovery of her husband, as her conduct in the presence of witnesses would indicate.

It is contended that the court erred in admitting, over the objections of defendant, evidence that defendant and one Lervy had before the death of deceased visited and drank together in certain saloons; that on one occasion she had sat on Lervy's lap and they had kissed each other, and placed their arms around each other while so doing; and that on the night of the day on which deceased died and the following night she and Lervy slept in the same room. It cannot be denied that evidence of the existence or want of a motive for the commission of any particular crime is often of much importance in determining whether or not the defendant committed the crime charged. Especially is this so in cases depending on circumstantial evidence, such as this was. Indeed, the defendant procured the court to substantially so instruct the jury. The testimony now under discussion, taken as a whole, tended to show that Mrs. Bowers and Lervy were lovers. Some of it, standing alone, might be said to be too remote and inconsequential to furnish any such inference; but it should all be considered. Proof that they were lovers furnished a motive why defendant might desire the death of her husband. The evidence was properly admitted.

It is also contended that the court erred in permitting the district attorney, over the objection of defendant, "to read on cross-examination of witness Dr. Stephens extracts from medical works, and to ask the witness whether what was so read corresponded with his own judgment." The witness had given testimony as to the symptoms and effects of arsenical poisoning, and following such testimony the transcript contains the following: "Q. Is this a correct statement, Doctor: While the poison is being eliminated, the process which begins very soon after it is taken, it generally causes fatty degeneration of the liver, heart, and kidneys, the symptoms of which are often very prominent? Mr. Drury: We object to the question as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, improper, and hearsay. It appears that the district attorney is reading from certain medical books and asking this witness questions therefrom. Mr. Byington: I am making it my own question, if your honor please. The Court: Objection overruled. To which ruling of the court defendant then and there duly excepted. It will thus be seen that, except for the statement of the attorney for defendant, the transcript does not show that the jury could have known that the district attorney was in fact reading from a medical book, or from any book. He had not so stated, and so far as we can see from the transcript the book, if in fact he was reading his question from a book, was entirely out of sight of the jury. On the objection being made the district attorney said, "I am making it my own question," which in fact it was in form. It was held in Lilley v. Parkinson, 91 Cal. 655, 27 Pac. 1091, that it is not competent upon the examination of medical witnesses to read to them extracts from medical works and ask them whether what is so read corresponds with their own judgment, when it is apparent that the sole object of so doing is to place before the jury the opinion of the author of the books referred to. In the case just cited extracts were read from a book shown to be a standard work on surgery, and witnesses asked if what was read corresponded with their own judgment, and the court said, "The only effect of these questions and answers was to place before the jury the opinion of the author of the book referred to, and it is also apparent that this was the object sought." But from the record before us we cannot say that the rule laid down in Lilley v. Parkinson was violated. While the course adopted by the district attorney cannot be commended, we do not think it justifies a reversal, or that actual error has been shown.

Defendant urges that the court erred "in permitting Dr. McLaughlin, a witness for the prosecution, to testify as an expert without it being shown, first, that he was a regularly graduated and licensed physician of any medical school; and, second, that he was an expert in the general subject under discussion." The objection as it appears in the transcript was to a long hypothetical question, and was thus stated: "We object to that question on the ground that no proper foundation has been laid, and upon the ground that it is not based upon the facts presented; also upon the ground that it is incompetent, and inasmuch as it assumes the province of the jury." The witness had testified that he was and had been a physician and surgeon for several years past, and had already given testimony without objection as an expert and along medical lines, covering in narrative form 4½ pages of the transcript. Under these circumstances we do not think that the objection was either well taken, or was in fact pointed at the matter now urged as the ground of objection. The objection to the hypothetical question put to Dr. Harrison was properly overruled. We think that the facts assumed in the question might fairly be inferred from the evidence in the case.

It is lastly urged that the court erred in allowing the prosecution to introduce certain testimony of one Mr. Peterson, a druggist, to the effect that one Mrs. Sutton presented to him August 20, 1903, a certain prescription for arsenic, signed "McLaughlin, M. D.," and that he gave her thereon an ounce of arsenic; that is to say, an ounce of arsenious acid. The contention of defendant on this point is without merit. About four grains of arsenious acid were found in the stomach of deceased after his death, which occurred five days subsequent to the getting of the arsenic. Mrs. Sutton was the sister of defendant. The prescription was in the handwriting of defendant, and on paper torn from a book belonging to her and in her possession. Defendant was in sole attendance on deceased from August 20th to his removal to the hospital on the day of his death. These facts sufficiently connected Mrs. Bowers with the getting of the arsenic to allow of the introduction of this evidence. Whether Mrs. Sutton was a co-conspirator of Mrs. Bowers, or simply her innocent agent, the fact that the prescription on which the arsenic was obtained was forged by Mrs. Bowers sufficiently connects her with the obtaining of the arsenic to allow of the proof of the getting of the same.

After an examination of all the points urged by the defendant as ground for a reversal, we have found no error in the record.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FITZGERALD.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 30, 1905.)

1. Homicide—Murder in Second Degree—Evidence—Sufficiency.

Evidence on a trial for murder held to support a conviction of murder in the second degree.

2. Same—Evidence—Admissibility.

Where, on a trial for murder, it did not appear that any statement was made by decedent to his wife shortly before the homicide, and the question asked a witness as to what statement, if any, was made by decedent to his wife contained no intimation as to the nature of the statement sought to be shown, it was not error to sustain an objection to the question.

3. Same—Evidence—Instructions.

Where, on a trial for murder, there was no evidence as to the relative strength and activity of defendant and decedent, an instruction that, in determining whether defendant had reason to apprehend that he was about to receive bodily injury from decedent at the time of the killing, the jury might consider the relative strength and activity of the parties, was properly refused.

4. Criminal Law—New Trial—Newly Discovered Evidence—Affidavits.

The record in a criminal case should show that, on the hearing of a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, the affidavits in support thereof were offered or read by defendant.

5. Same—Motion for New Trial—Newly Discovered Evidence—Sufficiency.

The affidavits in support of a motion for a new trial in a murder case on the ground of newly discovered evidence tended to impeach a witness for the state by showing that on account of intoxication he could not have known the facts. At the trial, on cross-examination of the witness, he testified that he had drunk nothing but coffee on the morning of the homicide. There were many persons present at the homicide who testified. Defendant called some of them, including the witness sought to be impeached. Held, that the court properly denied the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Christopher Fitzgerald was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. D. Edwards and E. A. Williams, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, J. Defendant was tried upon the charge of murder in killing, with malice aforethought, one Charles Slater on the 18th day of September, 1904. The jury returned a verdict of murder in the second degree. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and judgment was entered directing that he be imprisoned for 10 years in the state prison at Folsom. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

The main contention of appellant is that the evidence does not support the verdict. The evidence shows that deceased and defendant were fellow laborers at McKenzie's mill, in Fresno county, at the time of the homicide. There had been no previous trouble between them, and they had been on friendly terms prior to the killing. On Sunday morning, the day of the homicide, deceased had been drinking, but appears to have been in a humorous mood and trying to entertain his companions in various ways. He was telling stories, joking, scuffling with his fellow laborers, and pretending to auction off the property of every one. He had torn the mosquito netting off of defendant's bed, and had his feet up on the bed. Defendant requested him to take his feet off of his bed, and deceased appears to have complied with the request. Defendant then, with the assistance of one Kleeper, removed the bed some distance away. Up to this time no angry words were used by either party. After this, while deceased was being shaved, his chair either fell or was pushed over by some of the boys, and he rolled upon the ground. He appears to have been lying on the ground telling a humorous story when defendant passed. Deceased arose and ran after him, overtaking him, and pushed or struck him, after which he returned and wrestled with one Lewis. While the manner of deceased was rough and boisterous, he appears to have been good-natured, and to have been more in play than otherwise. Defendant appears, however, to have become impatient and angry because of the annoyances to which he was subjected and the acts and conduct of deceased. In his own language, he states: "I then went on in the Barnes cabin, and started to shave outside by the door. Then I saw Klepper and several of the boys taking Slater away, and he tried to get away from Klepper; but they took him down to his own house. I then went back to the Long cabin, got my rifle, loaded it, and said: 'If he don't let me alone, I will put a half ounce of lead in him. If he wants a shooting scrape, he can get it.' I then went into the Barnes cabin with the rifle, laid it down in the northwest corner of the cabin, and went outside and commenced shaving." Deceased almost immediately afterwards came up unarmed, in an intoxicated condition, to defendant's cabin. Defendant went inside, deceased following after him, and defendant said twice in rapid succession, "Get out of here," and simultaneously raised the rifle which he had loaded for the purpose, and fired the bullet which passed through the body of deceased, causing almost instant death. Deceased exclaimed with his last breath, "My God, boys, what did he do that for?" The shooting appears to have been wholly unnecessary. Defendant had prepared the deadly rifle, and, not in necessary self-defense, he fired the shot at an unarmed man in an intoxicated condition. The jury, in its mercy, gave the defendant the benefit of his condition of mind caused by the annoyances to which he had been subjected. It reduced the degree, and thus in effect found that the killing was not willful, deliberate, and premeditated. The judge also appears to have dealt leniently with the defendant. The evidence fully supports the verdict.

The witness Watson testified to the effect that a short time before the homicide deceased was between two of the cabins and his wife was trying to get him away. The defendant's counsel then asked the witness the following question: "At the time Mrs. Slater was there, what, if any, statement was made by Mr. Slater to Mrs. Slater?" The court correctly sustained an objection to the question. It does not appear that any statement was made, and no intimation is made in the question as to the nature of the statement sought to be elicited. If the statement was made, and was as to some matter not connected with the homicide, it was clearly inadmissible.

The court refused to instruct the jury: "In determining whether the defendant had reason to apprehend that he was about to receive bodily injury from the deceased at the time the fatal shot was fired, the jury may take into consideration the relative size, strength, and activity of the respective parties." There was no evidence in the record as to the relative strength and activity of the parties. Not only this, but the record does not show that the instruction was requested by defendant.

The last contention of defendant is that the court erred in denying his motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. We find certain affidavits in the record, but there is not a word showing or tending to show that they were offered or read by defendant on his motion for a new trial; but we have examined them, and find nothing that would have justified the court in granting a new trial on this ground. They are all to the point that defendant has discovered evidence which would tend to impeach the witness Michael Fitzgerald (who testified for the prosecution), by showing that at the time of the homicide Fitzgerald was intoxicated to such an extent that he could not have known the facts concerning the homicide. The defendant's counsel, in cross-examination of the witness Fitzgerald, asked him if he had been drinking that morning, and the witness answered, "Nothing but coffee." If it was true that the witness was intoxicated to such an extent as to affect his credibility, it could easily have been shown at the trial. There were many parties present at the homicide, and who testified. Defendant called some of them, among whom was Michael Fitzgerald, the witness sought to be impeached. It is said in People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 685, 63 Pac. 86: "A motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence is looked upon with suspicion and disfavor, and the party who relies upon such a ground must make a strong case both in respect to diligence on his part and as to the truth and materiality of the evidence; and if he fails in either respect his motion must be denied."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

NICOLS v. BOARD OF POLICE PENSION FUND COM'RS OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 29, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—POLICE PENSION FUND—BENEFICIARIES—RIGHT TO RECOVER BENEFITS—LIMITATIONS.

Act March 4, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 56, c. 62), provides for a police pension fund by directing that certain public money shall be set apart in the custody of the city treasurer, and styles the board of management trustees, and those entitled to its benefits beneficiaries. Section 7 (page 57) gives a widow of a deceased member of the police department, on conditions specified, a designated sum from the fund. Section 14 (page 60) provides that on the last day of June in each year the surplus of the fund exceeding the average amount per year paid out on account of the fund during three years next preceding shall become a part of the general fund of the municipality. Held, that the board charged with the management of the fund are not trustees under an express trust for the persons entitled thereto, and limitations begin to run from the time of the accrual of a right to a pension, and not from the repudiation of the claim by the board; and a widow of a policeman, who waited over five years after his death before demanding her pension, was barred by limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Application for a peremptory writ of mandate by Margaret J. Nicols against the board of police pension fund commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco to compel defendants to issue a warrant on the fund in favor of the petitioner. From a judgment of dismissal, entered on sustaining a demurrer to the petition, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Madden, for appellant. P. V. Long, City and County Atty., for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. Mandate. The petitioner alleges that Watson Nicols, now deceased, was appointed a police officer and member of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco June 9, 1871, and from that time continuously and duly served as a regular officer in actual service in said department until he was retired from active service as hereinafter stated, and was a member of the said police department continuously from the time of said retirement until his death; that in September, 1889, while serving as a policeman in said city and county, he became physically disabled while in, and in consequence of, the performance of his duty as such policeman; that on September 30, 1889, the defendants, under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act of March 4, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 56, c. 62), duly and regularly retired him from active service, and placed him upon the police relief and pension roll of said police department, and granted him a pension, from the police relief and pension fund created under the provisions of said act, of $57.50 per month from the 1st day of October, 1889, and that he received the said pension from that time until his death; that the petitioner and the said Watson Nicols intermarried July 17, 1883, and from that date continuously to the time of his death were husband and wife; that said Watson Nicols died in the city and county of San Francisco January 29, 1890, from natural causes, leaving the petitioner as his surviving widow; that as his widow she is entitled under the provisions of the aforesaid act of March 4, 1889, to the sum of $1,000 from the aforesaid police relief and pension fund; that on March 22, 1895, she presented to the defendants her claim as the widow of said Watson Nicols for said sum of $1,000, and demanded of the defendants that they order the same paid to her out of said pension fund, and issue a warrant to her therefor; that the defendants refused and still refuse so to do. Wherefore she asked the superior court to issue a peremptory writ of mandate, requiring the defendants to comply with her said demand. Her petition therefor was filed in the superior court July 10, 1895. To this petition the defendants demurred, specifying, among other grounds of demurrer, that her cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. The court sustained the demurrer and ordered the proceeding dismissed, and from the judgment entered thereon the petitioner has appealed.

The provision in the act of March 4, 1889, upon which the appellant relies for recovery, is as follows, viz.: "Sec. 7. Whenever any member of the police department of such county, city and county, city or town shall, after ten years and less than 20 years of service, die from natural causes then his widow or children, or if there be no widow or children then his mother or unmarried sisters, shall be entitled to the sum of one thousand dollars from such fund." St. 1889, p. 57, c. 62. As the plaintiff did not commence the present action until more than five years after the death of her husband, it is evident that her right of recovery is barred by the statute of limitations, unless for some reason it is taken out of the operation of the statute. It is therefore contended on her behalf that under the terms of the aforesaid act the pension fund thereby created is held by the defendants under an express trust in favor of those for whom it is created, and consequently that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against her claim until a repudiation of the trust on the part of the defendants. This contention is based upon the proposition that by the terms of the act the defendants are constituted a "board of trustees," and those for whose benefit the fund is authorized are styled "beneficiaries." We are unable to accept this construction of the act. Whether a fund created for the benefit of certain designated persons is impressed with a trust which can be enforced in their favor will depend upon the terms under which it is created and the provisions made with reference to its disbursement, rather than upon the designation given to the disbursing agents or to the recipients of the fund. The "pension fund" authorized by the act is not characterized in any of the provisions for its creation and management with the elements of a trust, and the mere designation of those who are to disburse it as a "board of trustees," and those for whom it is to be distributed as "beneficiaries," is insufficient to require such construction. Persons invested with the management or control of a fund may be styled a "board of trustees," without holding any relation of trust to the fund other than such as exists in all cases where one person has the management or control of property belonging to another; and any person who derives an advantage from the beneficence of another is with equal propriety styled a "beneficiary" as one for whose benefit a trust is created.

The defendants are not made the custodian of the pension fund, but have been appointed by the Legislature to ascertain and designate the persons who are entitled to the payments authorized by the act, and in so doing are in the exercise of a public duty imposed upon them by the Legislature. The Legislature has directed that certain public moneys shall be set apart in the treasury for the purpose of making these payments, and the moneys so set apart are at all times public moneys in the custody of the treasurer of the county. The "two dollars per month" which the petitioner alleges was retained by the treasurer from Nicols' pay as a member of the police department, and paid into said fund, was not a contribution to the fund by Nicols, but, as was said in reference to a similar provision in the act of 1878, in Pennie v. Reis, 132 U. S. 464, 10 Sup. Ct. 149, 33 L. Ed. 426, "was money of the state retained in its possession for the creation of this very fund." In this case the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing the act, held that a member of the police department has no vested right or right of property in the money authorized by the act to be paid upon certain contingencies or the happening of certain events until such contingencies or events shall occur; thus refuting the proposition that the fund is held under an express trust in favor of the designated beneficiaries. The provision of section 14 (page 60), of the act that on the last day of June of each year all surplus of said fund exceeding the average amount per year paid out on account of the said fund during the three years next preceding shall be transferred to and become a part of the general fund of the city and county, and "no longer under the control of said board or subject to its order," is a direction of the Legislature for the disposition of the fund, and is inconsistent with the proposition that it is held by the board under an express trust in behalf of those to whom it is to be paid. It is not an unreasonable inference from this provision of the act that it was the intention of the Legislature that all claims against the fund should be presented for payment within one year after the right to receive such payment had accrued. The relation of the petitioner to the fund is not unlike that which exists in behalf of a beneficiary under the provisions governing a benevolent or fraternal association. Upon the happening of the event at which such beneficiary is entitled to receive the benefit provided in the articles of association a right of action accrues in his behalf, which, like any other right of action, must be enforced within the period provided by the statute of limitations. Kauz v. Great Council, etc., 13 Mo. App. 341. It would not be seriously contended that, if Nicols had neglected to seek payment of his monthly pension for more than five years after his right to it had accrued, his right would not be barred by the statute of limitations. The act, however, makes no distinction between the different classes of beneficiaries in the relation to the fund, and it must be held that the petitioner's right of recovery was barred by the statute of limitations.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re DELLOW'S ESTATE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 1, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—JUDGMENT—TIME.

Where an appeal from a judgment is taken more than 60 days from the rendition thereof, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment cannot be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 1888.]

2. APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN — INFANTS — —ISSUES.

Where both parents of certain minors were dead, the paramount issue to be determined on an application for guardianship was the best interests of the child in respect to its temporal, mental, and moral welfare, as provided by Civ. Code, § 246.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Guardian and Ward, § 23.]

3. SAME—EVIDENCE.

On cross-petitions for appointment as guardian of certain minors, evidence held to sustain the finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Cross-petitions by Rose A. Shields and by Flora Dellow to be appointed guardian of the persons and estates of Eleanor Louisa Dellow and Vincent Alexander Dellow, minors. From a judgment denying petition of Flora Dellow, and appointing her cross-petitioner, and from an order denying Flora Dellow's motion for a new trial, she prosecutes separate appeals. Affirmed.

N. H. Frank, for appellant. John M. Burnett and William Rix, for respondent.

HALL, J. There are two appeals in this case—one by Flora Dellow from a judgment of the trial court denying her petition to be appointed guardian of the persons and estates of Eleanor Louisa Dellow and Vincent Alexander Dellow, minors, and granting the petition of Rose A. Shields to be appointed guardian of the same children; and another from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial—both before us on one record.

The appeal from the judgment was taken more than 60 days after the rendition of judgment, and therefore the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain it cannot be considered on the appeal from the judgment. This is conceded to be true by counsel for appellant in his brief, and it is not contended that the findings do not support the judgment. So the judgment must be affirmed.

As to the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, it is urged by the respondent that the record does not show what motion was in fact made, nor upon what grounds the motion was predicated; that though a notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed, and a bill of exceptions settled containing such notice and specifications as to insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings, the only record as to what motion was in fact made is contained in the clerk's entry in these words: "[Title of Court and Cause.] October 7, 1904. Motion for new trial ordered denied. W. J. Kennedy, D. C. C." However, as we think the action of the lower court must be sustained on the merits, we do not think it necessary to pass on the technical point thus raised.

At the time of the application for guardianship the boy, Vincent, was aged three years, and the girl, Eleanor, was aged eight years. The mother of the children died when the boy was four months old, and the father died October 7, 1903, five days before the filing of the petition by appellant. The estate of the children consists in an insurance on the life of their father in the sum of $3,000, payable in equal shares to the children. Appellant, Flora Dellow, is an aunt of the children and their only relative in this state, while respondent is in no way related to the children, but had had the care and custody of the girl for some time before the death of the father, and immediately upon his death took the custody of the boy from another stranger, and had the custody of both at the time of filing the petition. The court heard the two petitions together, and made findings of fact, and denied the petition of appellant, and granted that of respondent. Appellant moved for a new trial, and we are now considering her appeal from the order denying such motion.

The bill of exceptions contains a stipulation that it contains all the testimony admitted in the case. Among other things the court found "that it is for the best interests of said minors that said Rose A. Shields should be appointed guardian of their persons and estates." The parents both being dead, this, under our statute, was the paramount issue to be determined by the trial court. Section 246, Civil Code, provides that, "in awarding the custody of a minor, or in appointing a general guardian, the court or officer is to be guided by the following considerations: (1) By what appears to be for the best interests of the child in respect to its temporal and its mental and moral welfare." If the finding above quoted is supported by the evidence, it is of no consequence whether the finding, also made by the court, "that said J. A. Dellow [father of the children] requested that said Rose A. Shields should have the care and custody of said minors, and should act as their guardian," is supported by the evidence or not. In the Matter of the Guardianship of Lewis, a Minor, 137 Cal. 682, 70 Pac. 926, the court said: "The question as to which one of these two parties was the proper party to be appointed guardian over the person of this child was essentially a question of fact for the trial court, and that court having decided it, and there being substantial evidence to support that decision this court will not interfere by setting aside the order for lack of evidence." In the case just referred to the prevailing party was the grandmother and the appellant was the father.

The evidence in the case now before us shows both petitioners to be worthy people. Appellant was obliged to work to support herself. She believed that her brothers and sisters in England would assist her to support the children. She came here from England at the request of her brother, the father of the children, and cared for them until, because of his drinking habits, she left his home. Respondent is the godmother of one of the children; and, upon appellant leaving the home of the father of the children, she, at his request, took the girl, and promised to take the boy when he became older. She is a dressmaker, and also takes lodgers, and has resided in the same block for 11 years. She testified that she was financially able to take care of the children, and that she could and would maintain them without using any of the money which may come to them from the insurance on the life of their father. She is of the same religious faith as was the mother of the children, is the godmother of one, as before stated, and her sister of the other child. Both petitioners were before the judge of the trial court, and their manner and appearance were open to his observation. Under these conditions we cannot say that the finding under consideration is not sustained by the evidence; and, as it is the controlling factor in the case, the order appealed from, as well as the judgment, must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

BRADLEY v. BUSH.

1. Bills and Notes — Transfer — Indorsement—Liability of Indorser.

Where the payee of mortgage notes executed by a corporation indorsed and delivered them to the corporation under an agreement that the latter should deliver them to a stockholder to secure advances to the corporation, which the corporation did, the payee was not liable to the holder as an indorser.

2. Evidence—Declarations of Decedent.

In an action on the notes by the administrator of the stockholder against the payee and indorser, it was error for the court to exclude declarations by intestate to the custodian of the notes at the time he received them, denying that he had bought the notes and stating that, as he was a large stockholder in the corporation maker, he had made advances of money to the corporation, and that the notes were to be surrendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Richard Bradley, as administrator, etc., of the estate of James A. Bradley, deceased against E. E. Bush. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court October 30, 1905.

Charles G. Lamberson, Hudson & Pryor, R. J. Hudson, and John F. Pryor, for appellant. H. Scott Jacobs and H. W. Bradley, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. This is a suit by the administrator of an alleged indorsee against the defendant as maker and indorser of two promissory notes of the Sunset Vineyard Company, of date January 25, 1892, for the sum of $1,000 each. The notes became due on January 1, 1898, and on nonpayment were duly protested, and notice of dishonor given to the defendant. The complaint alleges that the defendant, on or before February 1, 1894, for value received, duly indorsed, transferred, and delivered said promissory notes to the deceased, Bradley, the indorsee, and that at the time of his death he was the owner and holder of the notes. The answer "denies each and every material allegation" of the complaint; and as the case seems to have been tried upon the theory of the sufficiency of this denial, all of the allegations of the complaint are to be regarded as denied, with the exception of the execution of the promissory notes, which are set out at length. It is also affirmatively alleged that the note sued on was secured by a mortgage on real property, that there was no consideration for the alleged indorsement and transfer; and for separate defense, in effect, that the notes in question were 2 of 30 promissory notes made to defendant by the Sunset Vineyard Company as part of the purchase price of certain lands sold to it by the defendant, which at the time of the indorsement had been set to vineyard and were being operated as such by the company, which owned no other land, and that the company, of which Bradley was a large stockholder, was at that time heavily indebted and pressed by its creditors, and it thus became necessary for them to raise a large amount of money, which could be borrowed only from Bradley; and, further (in terms): "That plaintiff's intestate, James A. Bradley, shortly prior to the indorsement of the notes sued on by defendant, complained to defendant (who was a stockholder and director of the company) that the Sunset Vineyard Company had paid a sum for its real estate greatly in excess of its value, and desired defendant to surrender some of the notes given to him as part of the purchase price for said land, and the said James A. Bradley wanted and was anxious to continue the raising of grapes and in pursuing the business of the corporation, as aforesaid; that it was then proposed by said James A. Bradley to defendant, Bush, that, if he (Bush) would surrender the two notes in this action sued upon, said Bradley would advance to the corporation, Sunset Vineyard Company, the face value of said notes, with interest, which said proposition was accepted by defendant, Bush, and thereupon said Bush indorsed said notes, and the moneys realized thereon were applied to the payment of the debts of the said corporation and the further carrying on of its business." The court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, that the notes were secured by mortgage as alleged in the answer, that it was not true that there was no consideration for the defendant's indorsement, and (in the language of the answer) that the allegations of the defendant's special defense were true; and, on these findings, judgment was entered for the plaintiff.

The only witnesses who testified in the case were the plaintiff and defendant. The former testified that he received the notes after the death of his intestate from "Mr. Upton, of the Central California Bank"; and he says, as to one of the notes, "I think it was amongst James A. Bradley's papers," which was all he knew of the matter, except that he had received no payment upon the notes. From the defendant's testimony it appears that at the date of the transaction the notes were in the hands of Mr. Upton, as his bailee, already indorsed; and as to the terms of the transaction, he testifies that Bradley, who was the largest stockholder in the company, proposed to it, "If you will arrange with Bush to surrender those notes to you, I will let you have the money to go ahead and take care of your vineyard," and also that he said to defendant, "If you will surrender those notes to the company, I will take the matter up and advance the company sufficient money." From other parts of the testimony it appears that the understanding was that Bradley was to take from the company the notes thus surrendered to it. Thereupon the witness testifies: "I gave them (that is, the company) an order on Mr. Upton, who held the notes, to go and get them." Some little confusion is produced by answers of the witness to questions asked him on cross-examination; but, on the whole, it may be gathered that the transaction was as above stated, and on the close of his testimony the defendant's attorneys proposed to put Mr. Upton on the stand, saying: "We expect to prove by him that Mr. Bush sent him word to give up those two notes to either Mr. Bradley or some other representative of the Sunset Vineyard Company, and that Mr. Bradley came to Mr. Upton, who had the notes in his possession, and that Mr. Upton gave them to Mr. Bradley; that at the same time Mr. Upton asked Mr. Bradley whether he had been buying some notes, and Mr. Bradley said, 'No; I am a large stockholder in the Sunset, and I have got to advance some money to them, and these notes are to be surrendered up.'" But the court excluded the evidence, saying: "There is the same evidence before the court now. I don't believe there can be any dispute as to the facts of the case at all." To which ruling the defendant excepted. From this it appears that the court understood the transaction as stated above; but it will be observed that the declarations of Bradley to Upton had not been proved, and that the testimony offered as to these was not only new, but of material importance. For, the transaction being as stated, it would follow that Bush did not indorse, transfer, or deliver the note to Bradley, but to the company, as to which the transfer and indorsement could create no obligation (Civ. Code, § 3116); nor, indeed, could it have any effect other than that of a mere relinquishment or surrender of his title to the company. The ordinary effect of such a transaction would be to extinguish the obligation itself; but here, by agreement between Bradley and the corporation, assented to by Bush—who held the other notes—the note was not to be canceled, but was to be transferred by the latter to Bradley, to be held by him as evidence of its debt, with the benefit of the mortgage security. Such an agreement would doubtless be valid, and its effect would be to keep the note alive and to vest the title in Bradley. But—assuming the facts to be as stated in the offer of proof—his title would come to him from the company, and there would be no contract of transfer or indorsement between him and Bush, nor, indeed, any direct contractual relation whatever. Nor could Bradley acquire from the company any right of action against Bush, since the company itself, by the transfer or surrender to it of its own obligation, did not acquire such right of action. That such was the contract might, indeed, have been inferred from the uncontradicted testimony of Bush, without the aid of the testimony offered, or, indeed, it might be inferred from the specific facts found by the court, if they stood by themselves. But, as appears by the findings as to the transfer, indorsement, and delivery of the note, and as to consideration, the court took a different view, and it is clear that, had the rejected evidence been admitted, these findings could not be sustained. For these reasons, the order appealed from must be reversed.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

1. APPEAL—OBJECTIONS—COMPLAINT.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien, a demurrer to the complaint was overruled by consent, and when plaintiff offered his evidence defendant bank objected because the complaint was insufficient for want of facts, in that it was not alleged that there had been any declaration of lien filed in the office of the county recorder as required by law, but stated that it only desired to raise two propositions, neither of which related to the actual use of the materials in the building, and was willing to take the testimony on such matters and submit the case, defendant bank could not object on appeal to the complaint's failure to allege that the materials sued for were actually used in the building.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS—CLAIM OF LIEN.

Where a claim for a mechanic's lien, containing the matter specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, is filed within the time required, the lien attaches, and it is immaterial whether the claimant styled it a "claim of lien," or a "claim of benefit under the lien law."

3. SAME—REPAIRS—ADDITIONS.

Where certain counters and partitions placed in a building were shown to be such additions to the building as amounted to a repair and alteration thereof, they were properly styled "repairs and alterations" in a claim for a mechanic's lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by M. R. Mandary against S. G Smartt and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant Kern Valley Bank appeals. Affirmed.

Smith & Allen, for appellant. Reardan & Whitaker, Geo. W. Whitaker, and Fred E. Borton, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment and decree for plaintiff. From the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant Kern Valley Bank appeals.

The first question presented upon the appeal is as to the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint sets out an agree ment between the lessee of the owner and the contractor, by which the latter agrees to furnish all the material and labor and to make certain alterations and repairs to a building. It further alleges that he fully completed all of the work agreed to be done. Following this it is alleged that plaintiff entered into an agreement with said contractor whereby he agreed to and contracted to furnish him certain specified materials, which were to be used in making such alterations and repairs, and which alterations and repairs were made with the knowledge of the owners. A copy of the lien filed of record is incorporated in the complaint, and, after the usual and ordinary statements, concludes as follows: "Wherefore said M. R. Mandary claims the benefit of the law relative to liens of mechanics and others upon real property as found in the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California." It must be conceded that nowhere in the complaint is found the necessary allegation that the materials were actually used in the building, yet, in view of the conduct of all parties at the trial, such omission becomes unimportant. The transcript shows that the demurrer to the complaint was overruled by consent; that upon the trial, when plaintiff offered his testimony, counsel for defendant bank objected to the introduction thereof, and in such objection stated that it was "on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In other words, that the pleadings do not show that there has been any declaration of lien filed in the office of the county recorder, as required by law. I object to the introduction of any testimony with the view to prevent a lien being declared against the Arlington Hotel, and a decree of foreclosure ordered." Further along, before the court passed upon the objection, counsel for the bank said: "There are only two propositions I care about in this matter. We deny that they are entitled to a lien to a partition that is mentioned in the complaint, and to the counter, and I am satisfied to try those two questions—to take the testimony upon those two matters and submit the case. Let the objection stand to all the material, and you may prove that the material set forth in here was furnished." This statement to the court could have had no other effect than to assure plaintiff and his counsel that no question would be raised on account of any defect in the complaint other than as to the form of lien; that they might prove the fact of use without any amendment in that regard. And to permit the defendant now to raise any objection to the complaint which might have been obviated by a timely amendment would be unfair. The only question, therefore, presented by the exception is as to the sufficiency of the lien set out in the complaint. Section 1187, Code Civ. Proc., provides specifically what matters and things are essential to be stated in a claim of lien, all of which appear in this lien. Having stated those matters and filed the same in due time, the lien attaches. It is a claim upon its face, and a claim is all he is required to verify and file; and it is of little consequence whether the claimant styles it a "claim of lien," or a "claim of benefit under the lien law."

The defendant next contends that the counter and partitions were neither alteration nor repairs, but additions. Let this be conceded. They were shown to be such additions as amounted to a repair and alteration of the building, and therefore properly styled "repairs and alterations." Whether they were permanent in their character, and became part of the structure by the manner of construction, was for the trial court to say under the evidence, and there was evidence sufficient to warrant the court in its finding that they were permanently attached to the building and became a part thereof.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

1. SALES—ELECTRICITY—PERSONAL PROPERTY.
Under Civ. Code, §§ 654, 655, 663, declaring that anything of which there may be ownership is "property" under the Code, that there may be ownership of all inanimate things which are capable of appropriation or of manual delivery, and that every kind of property that is not real is personal, a plaintiff was entitled to recover for breach of a contract for the delivery of electricity under a complaint charging a breach of a contract to sell and deliver "personal property."

2. SAME—GENERAL DAMAGES—PLEADING.
Under Civ. Code, § 3308, providing that the detriment caused by the breach of the seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, is deemed the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract if it had been fulfilled, a plaintiff was entitled to recover, for breach of a contract for the sale and delivery of electric power, the difference between the contract price and what it would cost to procure the power from another, under a general ad damnum clause in the complaint.

3. SAME—ESTOPPEL.
Where a seller of electric power wrongfully put an end to the contract, and prevented the buyer from performing it, the seller was estopped to deny that the buyer had not been damaged to the extent of his actual loss and his outlay fairly incurred.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by the Terrace Water Company against the San Antonio Light & Power

Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Otis, Gregg & Surr, for appellants. E. R. Annable and H. M. Willis, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This action is based upon an alleged breach of contract entered into between plaintiff and defendants, in which findings and judgment went for plaintiff. This appeal is by defendants from the judgment, supported by a bill of exceptions.

The defendant corporation on March 19, 1898, entered into an agreement in writing by which it obligated itself to furnish and deliver to plaintiff for the period of five years, during the irrigating season of each year and at a point to be designated by the plaintiff, on lots 7, 8, and 9, block 25, Rancho San Bernardino, a continuous service of 24 hours of electric power, in an amount not less than 10 nor greater than 20 horse power, for the sum of $6.50 per horse power per month; it being agreed that plaintiff should have a reasonable time in which to purchase and place in working order necessary machinery to utilize the power for the pumping of water from its wells situate on the lots before mentioned before the contract should become operative for the first year. The defendant corporation commenced the performance of such agreement, but in December, 1900, destroyed the connections between its plant and plaintiff's pumping machinery, and thereafter refused to furnish any power whatever, and did not furnish power during the irrigating seasons of 1901 and 1902, but refused so to do. The court found that the plaintiff was required to, and did, for the 10½ months comprising the irrigating season of the 2 years mentioned, purchase of the only parties from whom such power was obtainable, and at the cheapest rate, power with which to operate its pumps, at a monthly cost of $86 in excess of the cost to plaintiff under said contract with defendant, the aggregate of which excess was $903, for which judgment was rendered.

Upon the trial the court below, under a general averment of damages, admitted evidence, against the objections of defendant, tending to show that 70 inches of water was necessary to irrigate the lands described in the complaint and upon which was situate the pumping plant. This proof of such use of water, its extent, and necessity, was not essential in establishing plaintiff's rights under the contract, nor, perhaps, under the allegations of the complaint, admissible. But it is apparent from the findings that nothing was considered, and nothing entered into the judgment, by way of special damages, and the error was not, therefore, prejudicial.

The court further admitted evidence tending to show that plaintiff, after the breach, in order to obtain the power agreed to be furnished to it by defendant, entered into an agreement in writing with another power company, from which it obtained the power for the delivery of which defendant was in default; and the full execution thereof and the payment for such power was established. For the excess cost over that which would have resulted to plaintiff, had defendant performed its contract, and for this excess cost and nothing else, the court rendered judgment. Appellant insists that such evidence was inadmissible under the general ad damnum clause of the complaint. The contract set out in the complaint was in reference to the sale and delivery of personal property. The thing of which there may be ownership is called property under our Code. Civ. Code, § 654. There may be ownership of all inanimate things which are capable of appropriation or of manual delivery. Civ. Code, § 655. Every kind of property that is not real is personal. Civ. Code, § 663. It may be regarded as a solecism to say that one may own a thing not susceptible of definition and the nature and character of which is practically unknown, yet when one gathers from the elements an energy or force which he may store, transmit, and utilize, he thereby appropriates to his own use that thing, whatever it may be, and it is a subject of ownership, of barter and sale, so long as it is in possession. The defendant by the contract agreed to sell the energy in which it had an ownership, and to deliver the same at stated times in fixed amounts; and, as appears from the contract, the price thereof had not been fully paid in advance. Section 3308, Civ. Code, provides: "The detriment caused by the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled." "Damages which necessarily result from the act complained of are denominated 'general damages,' and may be proved under the ad damnum clause. * * * The defendant must be presumed to be aware of the damages which necessarily result from the act done, and cannot be held to be taken by surprise." Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 579, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175. "Special damages must be alleged solely for the purpose of giving defendant notice of plaintiff's claim." Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Gridley, 28 Conn. 201. The parties to a contract of the character set out in the complaint must be held to have had in view the damages provided by law for its violation, and the minimum of damages must of necessity be the procurement from another of that which the defaulting party failed to deliver. To so act is, by our Supreme Court, in Mabb v. Stewart, 81 Pac. 1073, held to be a duty as an observance of the principle that one injured must exercise reasonable care to render the injury as light as possible. In this case the injured party did not permit special damages to the groves and land for the irrigation of which the contract was obviously made, but did that which produced the least injury. It certainly cannot be said that one violating a contract cannot be supposed to contemplate as a result, and one which would necessarily follow its violation, that which would produce the least possible injury. Notice is not essential when only such claim is sought to be established. The party who voluntarily and wrongfully puts an end to a contract and prevents the other party from performing it, is estopped from denying that the injured party has not been damaged to the extent of his actual loss, and his outlay fairly incurred. U. S. v. Behan, 110 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168.

The proposition advanced, that a party may disregard his obligations and confidently assume that the only consequence thereof is a nominal damage, and that such nominal damage is all that necessarily follows such violation, and all that can reasonably be anticipated as a penalty, should have no support.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

The presumption of a contract, which the law implies on proof of the rendition of services, in the absence of any showing of the circumstances under which they were rendered, ceases to exist when it is shown that they were merely such offices as one friend would perform for another in time of sickness and distress, either by way of physical aid or in the comfort of personal companionship.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Fannie Dallman against J. J. Frank and others, as executors of the estate of Lissette Chesney, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Bridgford, for appellant. L. L. Solomons, for respondents.

HARRISON, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover $915 from the defendants, as executors of the last will and testament of Lissette Chesney, deceased, as the reasonable value of services alleged to have been rendered to the decedent in her lifetime at her special instance and request. The defendants, in their answer, do not deny that services were rendered by the plaintiff to the decedent, but they allege that whatever services were so rendered were mere friendly and neighborly offices performed by the plaintiff of her own accord, and were rendered voluntarily and gratuitously, and for which no promise of payment was ever made by the decedent, either expressly or by implication. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that the services were not rendered at the instance and request of the deceased, but were performed by the plaintiff voluntarily and gratuitously of her own motion, and were acts of friendship, having no pecuniary value. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the defendants, from which and from an order denying her motion for a new trial the plaintiff has appealed, and urges in support of the appeal that the above findings of the court were not sustained by the evidence.

The findings of a court, like the verdict of a jury, will be upheld in the appellate court if there is any evidence which, by reasonable construction, tends to support such findings; and in making its decision the trial court is at liberty to take into consideration, not only the testimony given at the trial, but also all inferences of fact which may be reasonably drawn from the facts established by such testimony. Upon an appeal the burden is upon the appellant to show error in the court below, and although the appellate court may be of the opinion that, on the evidence in the record, it would have reached a different conclusion, it is not for that reason authorized to set aside the findings of the trial court. If the evidence is such that reasonable men may reach different conclusions thereon the findings of the trial court must be sustained.

The main issue before the superior court was the character of the services rendered the deceased; the plaintiff seeking to show that they were rendered as a nurse, and the defendants that they were mere friendly offices gratuitously performed. It appears from the evidence that Mrs. Chesney lived in the upper flat of a building on Sixth street, of which she was the owner, and that the plaintiff, with her husband and family, lived in the flat immediately beneath, and had lived there for several years as the tenant of Mrs. Chesney and of her husband in his lifetime. During this period the families of the plaintiff and of Mrs. Chesney appear to have been on friendly and social terms, frequently visiting each other in their respective apartments. Upon the lower floor of the building there was a saloon, which had been occupied by Mr. Chesney in his lifetime. He died in February, 1899, and after his death Mrs. Chesney carried on the business with the aid of the employés which he had had during his lifetime. She had been troubled with asthma for several years, and in the latter part of August, 1899, she was taken seriously ill, and died in October of that year. The evidence of the services rendered by the plaintiff relates to two periods of time—the first from the time of Mr. Chesney's death until the latter part of August, when Mrs. Chesney was taken ill, and the other from that time until her death. There was no testimony of any direct employment of the plaintiff, but her husband testified with reference to the first of these periods that on the day that Mr. Chesney died Mrs. Chesney "sent for" his wife "to come to her aid," and that he "told her to go"; but the terms of the message or the character of the aid requested was not shown, and, although he purported to state their character, his testimony thereon was greatly impaired by his subsequent statement that during this time he was occupied in his store, and had not the slightest idea of what his wife did with Mrs. Chesney during the day, thus leaving the court to consider this portion of his testimony as mere hearsay. His testimony, and that of other witnesses for the plaintiff, that during this period the plaintiff devoted the whole of her time to the care of Mrs. Chesney; that Mrs. Chesney could not get out of her room to get anything, and that for that reason she required the plaintiff to wait on her; that the condition of Mrs. Chesney was such as to require her continuous services—was in direct conflict with the testimony of the employés in the saloon that during this period Mrs. Chesney came into the saloon every morning and evening two or three times a day, attending to her business there, and would remain sometimes two hours at a time, and also with the testimony of one of the defendants that he visited her during this period at different hours of the day, morning, afternoon, and evening, nearly every day, and found her in her office attending to her business, that during this period he had never seen the plaintiff in the apartments of Mrs. Chesney, and with one or two exceptions had never seen her with Mrs. Chesney, and had never seen her doing anything for Mrs. Chesney. When Mrs. Chesney was taken ill in August, a physician was called to attend her, who visited her daily from that time until her death, and during that period she also had the attendance of two nurses, one in the daytime, and the other during the night. The only testimony of any specific service rendered by the plaintiff during this period was that given by the day nurse, to the effect that the plaintiff visited the sickroom nearly every day at different hours in the day, and was there on an average about an hour and a half each day, and that while there she would sit by the side of Mrs. Chesney, and fan her and rub her with alcohol. The nurse, however, said that she did this of her own accord and without any request. The night nurse testified that the plaintiff was in the room every night, that Mrs. Chesney often wanted her to sit there, and that she would sit by her and talk to her and comfort her. She did not testify that any services were rendered by the plaintiff other than those of comfort. The attending physician, who visited Mrs. Chesney several times each day during her illness, stated that he would not say that the plaintiff was acting as a nurse, but that she was giving such care as a well woman might extend to a sick woman; that she was a great moral comfort to Mrs. Chesney, besides the physical aid she extended to her. The defendant Frank testified that during this period he visited Mrs. Chesney every day and night, and remained there sometimes an hour and sometimes longer, and at times had remained all night; that he saw the plaintiff there nearly every time he went, but that he never saw her doing anything other than to sit there and fan Mrs. Chesney and rub her hands.

It may be assumed that, in determining the issues before it, the superior court took into consideration the friendly relations shown to have existed between the plaintiff and Mrs. Chesney, and that it made the reasonable inference therefrom that the message from Mrs. Chesney to the plaintiff on the day of her husband's death to come to her aid was rather a request for the comfort of a companion in her affliction than for the purpose of giving employment to the plaintiff; that much of the testimony given on her behalf was either hearsay or the opinion of the witnesses, and was in many essential respects contradicted by other witnesses; the absence of any direct evidence that the plaintiff had rendered any specific services as a nurse to Mrs. Chesney prior to her last sickness; that by reason of evidence of the physical ability of Mrs. Chesney to care for herself during the period prior to her illness, and her employment of two experienced nurses during her illness, she was under no necessity of asking for the services of the plaintiff; that the services shown to have been rendered by the plaintiff during the illness of Mrs. Chesney were friendly and social merely. In thus considering their nature its finding that the services were gratuitous and without any expectation of reward cannot be said to be without evidence for its support. The presumption of a contract, which the law implies upon proof that one has rendered services to another, in the absence of any showing of the circumstances under which they were rendered, ceases to exist when it is shown that they were merely such offices as one friend would perform for another in time of sickness or distress, either by way of physical aid or in the comfort of personal companionship. See Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 508. After finding that the services rendered by the plaintiff were gratuitous, the issue respecting the value became immaterial, and the failure to make a finding thereon was not error. For the same reason the plaintiff suffered no harm from the admission in evidence of Mrs. Chesney's will. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 6, 1905.)

1. Appeal—Notice—Parties.

Codefendants not served with process and not appearing, and against whom no judgment is taken, need not be served with notice of appeal.

2. Materialman's Lien — Foreclosure — Complaint.

The complaint, in an action by a materialman against the owner for the value of material furnished the contractor for work on defendant's house, failing to state that at the time of filing notice of lien or bringing the action anything was owing from defendant to the contractor, or any fact, such as premature payment, that under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, might give a lien, fails to state a cause of action.

Action by R. N. Nason and others against William John and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant John appeals. Reversed.

Otto tum Suden, for appellant. C. L. Dam, for respondents.

HALL, J. Defendant William John appeals from a judgment foreclosing a materialman's lien for $129.39 against him as owner. Respondent in his brief moves that the appeal be dismissed, because no notice of appeal was served on Willams, the contractor and codefendant with appellant. The decree, however, recites that "defendant G. A. Willams, not having been served with process, was not before the court." No judgment was taken against Willams. Defendants not served with process and not appearing, and against whom no judgment is taken, need not be served with notice of appeal. Terry v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 87, 42 Pac. 464; Hinkel v. Donohue, 88 Cal. 597, 26 Pac. 374; Merced Bank v. Rosenthal et al., 99 Cal. 39, 31 Pac. 849, 33 Pac. 732; Clarke v. Mohr et al., 125 Cal. 540, 58 Pac. 176. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Appellant contends that the judgment must be reversed for the reason that the complaint states no cause of action as against appellant. This contention must be sustained. The action is by a materialman against the owner (appellant) for the value of material (paints, etc.) furnished the contractor for the painting of the house of appellant. There is in the complaint no attempt to allege that at the time of filing the notice of lien, or of bringing the action, there was anything owing from the owner (appellant) to the contractor, nor is any attempt made in the complaint to allege any fact, such as a premature payment by the owner to the contractor, or the like, that under section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., might be claimed to give the materialman a lien against the property of the owner for the value of his materials. That such an allegation is necessary to state a cause of action in this class of cases is well settled by the following authorities: Turner v. Strenzel, 70 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. 389; Whittier v. Hollister, 64 Cal. 283, 30 Pac. 846; Rosenkranz v. Wagner, 62 Cal. 151; Wells v. Cahn, 51 Cal. 423; Renton v. Conly, 49 Cal. 185. See, also, Harmon v. S. F. & S. R. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 617, 25 Pac. 124; Southern Cal. L. Co. v. Jones, 133 Cal. 242, 65 Pac. 378; Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 333.

There is no allegation in the complaint that the contract between the owner and the contractor was for an amount exceeding $1,000, and therefore the contract was not such an one as is required to be in writing and recorded, and the whole contract price may have properly been payable in advance, or in such installments and at such times as the owner and contractor may have agreed upon. Southern Cal. L. Co. v. Jones, supra.

Judgment is reversed.

SHERWOOD et al. v. WALLIN.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 6, 1905.)

1. Contracts — Specific Performance—Adequate Remedy at Law.

Defendant agreed, in consideration of 5,000 shares of a block of 17,500 shares of the stock of a mining company to be given to him, and in further consideration of the dismissal of a suit concerning the 17,500 shares, to effect a settlement with the claimant of such disputed stock, surrender the certificate for cancellation, receive 5,000 shares, and cause to be issued to plaintiffs the balance. Held that, where plaintiffs in a suit to compel specific performance of such agreement alleged that with the 12,500 shares they would have a majority of the stock of the company, while if defendant retained the 17,500 shares he would control a majority of the stock, would so conduct the affairs of the company as to destroy the value of the stock owned by plaintiffs, and that the stock was of uncertain value in the market at the time, but would be of great value if plaintiffs were enabled to retain their control of the company and defendant was not permitted to secure control, the complaint showed that plaintiffs did not have an adequate remedy at law.

2. SAME—FINDINGS.

Where, in a suit for specific performance of an agreement to surrender certain corporate stock for cancellation represented by certificate No. 7, the court found that defendant had not surrendered such certificate for 17,500 shares of the stock, and defendant's answer alleged that he was entitled to retain such shares, and he testified that he had done so, but, in order to perfect an appeal, he deposited 17,500 shares of the stock represented by certificate No. 128, an objection that the court erred in finding that defendant had not surrendered certificate No. 7 was unsustainable, as the change in the certificates did not affect the identity of the stock.

3. APPEAL—FORMAL ERRORS.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 475, the appellate court is required to disregard errors in mere form that do not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by L. M. Sherwood and others against Frank A. Wallin. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin L. Forster, for appellant. Purcell Rowe, for respondents.

HALL, J. Action for the specific performance of a contract, in which plaintiffs secured a judgment, and defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

Appellant demurred to the complaint, and now urges that "the demurrer should have been sustained on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant, in that it does not state facts showing that the plaintiffs have not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law." In support of this contention appellant cites us many authorities to the effect that specific performance will not be decreed, except where plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 450; White v. Fratt, 13 Cal. 521; Duff v. Fisher, 15 Cal. 375; Imlay v. Carpentier, 14 Cal. 173; Moulton v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 385, 24 Pac. 803. Conceding the general rule to be as claimed by appellant, we think that plaintiffs, by the allegations of their complaint, brought themselves within the rule. The complaint is quite long; but, in order to understand the question involved, we will endeavor to state the salient facts alleged. By way of inducement it is alleged that plaintiffs and one George W. Mann had entered into a contract for the formation and promotion of the Golden Key Mining Company; that it had been agreed that a certificate for 17,500 shares of the stock should be issued to said George W. Mann, but left in escrow with one of the plaintiffs, L. M. Sherwood, until said Mann should fully perform the things agreed by him to be performed; that said stock (certificate No. 7) was issued and placed in the hands of said Sherwood; that thereafter Mann brought a suit in claim and delivery in the United States Circuit Court for said stock, and in such suit the United States marshal took possession of said certificate of stock and held the same until given up as thereinafter alleged. It was also alleged that Mann further claimed an interest in 5,000 other shares of the stock of said company, which he was to hold and vote at all meetings of the stockholders; that he claimed that the company was indebted to him in a large sum, the amount being unknown to plaintiffs; that said Mann had in his possession the books, papers, records, and seal of said company, and refused to surrender them to the secretary of said company until his demands on plaintiff were satisfied; that plaintiffs denied and contested the claims made by Mann, and asserted that Mann had failed to comply with the terms of the contract between plaintiffs and Mann; that plaintiffs were the owners of said certificate No. 7 after the rights of said Mann were extinguished, and equally interested in the other certificate of stock, etc. Then follow allegations to the effect that defendant, Wallin, with full knowledge of the matters above recited, agreed with plaintiffs, in consideration of 5,000 shares of said 17,500 to be given him and the consent of plaintiffs to a dismissal of the suit concerning said 17,500 shares and the consent of plaintiff L. M. Sherwood that the United States marshal deliver said stock to defendant, to effect a settlement with Mann of all things in dispute between plaintiffs and Mann, to secure the dismissal of said suit in the United States court, the surrender to defendant of said stock, the indorsement thereof to defendant by Mann, the execution of an assignment by Mann of all his interest, etc., in and to said company, either as promoter or otherwise, and of all his rights under said contracts with plaintiffs, the delivery by Mann to Wallin of all books, papers, seal, and certificates of said company in hands of Mann; that immediately upon the completion of the settlement with Mann defendant would immediately surrender said certificate No. 7 for 17,500 shares of said stock to the secretary of said company for cancellation, and there should be then issued 12,500 shares thereof to plaintiffs and 5,000 shares to defendant in full payment for his services and payments in the settlement with Mann; that said defendant further agreed that he would turn over to plaintiffs all the said books and papers and documents received from Mann, and would make, execute, and deliver an assignment of all rights, etc., assigned by Mann to him. Then follow allegations showing the complete settlement with Mann effected by defendant, a demand by plaintiffs on defendant that he surrender the certificate for 17,500 shares for cancellation, and that he have issued 12,500 thereof to plaintiffs and 5,000 to himself, and that he turn over to plaintiffs the books, papers, and documents received from Mann, and that he execute and deliver to plaintiffs an assignment of all the rights, etc., assigned by Mann to him as in the complaint specified, and the refusal of defendant in all respects to comply with the demand of plaintiffs; that plaintiffs have fully performed the contract with defendant. Then follow allegations to the effect that plaintiffs now own 45,000 shares, and with the 12,500 shares agreed to be turned over to plaintiffs they would have a majority of the capital stock of the company, while, if defendant be allowed to retain the 17,500 shares of stock, he would be able to control a majority of the stock, and will so conduct the affairs of said company as to destroy the value of the stock owned and held by plaintiffs; "that the stock of said company is of uncertain value in the market at this time, but, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, will be of great value if they are enabled to retain their majority of the stock of said company, and the said defendant is not permitted to secure the control of said company; that the retention of the control of said stock and the refusal of said defendant to fulfill his said contract will work the said plaintiffs irreparable injury, and that the damage to plaintiff cannot be readily estimated in an award of damages; that the agreements, contracts, papers, books, and assignments as above specified to be made and turned over to plaintiffs by defendant under said contract are of great importance to plaintiffs, but have no specific or certain market value, and it will be difficult to do justice by an award of pecuniary damages."

The allegations above set forth are sufficient, we think, to show that plaintiffs had no adequate remedy at law. Treasurer v. Commercial Mining Co., 23 Cal. 390; Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 453; Cushman v. Thayer Mfg. Co., 76 N. Y. 365, 32 Am. Rep. 315; Krouse v. Woodward, 110 Cal. 638, 42 Pac. 1084; Manton v. Ray, 18 R. I. 672, 29 Atl. 998, 49 Am. St. Rep. 811; also, though not so directly in point, Fleishman v. Woods, 135 Cal. 256, 67 Pac. 276. Neither was it necessary to join the corporation in the action. Sayward v. Houghton, 82 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. 120. No error was committed in overruling the demurrer to the complaint.

What we have already said disposes of the point urged that the court erred in finding that the plaintiffs had not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, as there was sufficient evidence to support the specific allegations above set forth.

It is next urged that the court erred in finding "that defendant had not surrendered certificate No. 7 for cancellation." In answer to this, it is sufficient to say that the finding is "that he has not surrendered certificate No. 7 for 17,500 shares of the capital stock of the Golden Key Mining Company to the secretary thereof, so that 5,000 shares may be issued to him, and the remainder, 12,500 shares, to the plaintiffs." The substantive thing to be done was the turning over of 12,500 shares to the plaintiffs, and there is no pretense, either in the answer of defendant or in his evidence, that he has done so. On the contrary, his answer was to the effect that he was entitled to retain the 17,500 shares, and his evidence was that he had done so. As appears from a stipulation in the record, defendant, for the purpose of perfecting this appeal under section 943, Code Civ. Proc., has deposited with the clerk of the trial court certificate No. 128, representing 17,500 shares of said stock. The finding in the terms made by the court is strictly true. His evidence shows that he still has the same 17,500 shares, though represented by another certificate. The change of certificates did not affect the identity of the stock, which was the real thing in controversy. Hawley v. Brumagin, 33 Cal. 394; Krouse v. Woodward, 110 Cal. 638, 42 Pac. 1084; Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co., 113 Cal. 7, 45 Pac. 10, 35 L. R. A. 306, 54 Am. St. Rep. 316.

For the same reasons the court did not err in giving judgment for the surrender of "certificate No. 7, for 17,500 shares of the capital stock of said company, for cancellation, and that the plaintiffs receive 12,500 shares of the same and the defendant take the remainder, 5,000." Looking through the matter of form and to the substance, the real thing thus ordered was the transfer from defendant to plaintiffs of 12,500 shares of said stock, and such a transfer would have been a sufficient compliance with the judgment to entitle defendant to a satisfaction thereof. This court must disregard errors in mere form that do not affect substantial rights of the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 475. The judgment is affirmed.

DOE v. ALLEN.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 11, 1905.)

1. Shipping — Action for Freight — Findings—Evidence.

In an action for freight on a cargo of coal, evidence held to support a finding that on or or about December 19, 1899, plaintiff delivered from a certain steamer to defendant, at defendant's special instance and request, a certain cargo of coal, on consideration of defendant's promise to pay freight money thereon.

2. Appeal — Review — Findings—Conflicting Evidence.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the findings of the trial court thereon will not be interfered with on appeal.

3. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—RULINGS.

Where, after the court had reserved its ruling on defendant's objection to certain evidence, he moved to strike out all the testimony of the plaintiff stating the alleged contract, etc., which included the evidence previously objected to, which the court then overruled, defendant was not prejudiced by the court's failure to rule on the first objection.

4. STATUTE OF FRAUDS—DEBT OF ANOTHER—ORIGINAL PROMISE.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2, declares that a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, except in cases provided in section 2794, shall be void unless in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or by its agent; and section 2794 declares that where the promise is for an antecedent obligation of another, and is made on a consideration beneficial to the promisor or moving from either party to the antecedent obligation or from another person, it shall be valid, though resting in parol. Held that, where defendant, claiming to have purchased and paid for certain coal in possession of the carrier, holding the same under a lien for freight, agreed to pay the freight to the carrier in consideration of delivery, such promise was an original undertaking, based on a new consideration, and was not within the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by C. P. Doe against Charles R. Allen. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Coogan, for appellant. Charles E. Naylor, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The complaint sets forth two causes of action; the first count alleging that defendant became indebted to plaintiff on the 19th day of December, 1899, in the sum of $747.95, for freight money upon a cargo of coal that day delivered by plaintiff to defendant at his (defendant's) special instance and request, which said defendant promised to pay in consideration of the delivery by plaintiff to defendant of said cargo of coal. The only points presented by the appeal concern the first cause of action.

The first point urged is that "the evidence is insufficient to justify or sustain the finding and decision contained in paragraph 1 of the findings of fact herein: "(1) That on or about December 19, 1899, plaintiff delivered from steamer Alice Blanchard to defendant, at the special instance and request of defendant, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, a cargo of coal, upon consideration of defendant's promise to pay the freight money thereon; (2) that defendant promised on or about said day to pay plaintiff the freight money due thereon." The plaintiff, among other things, testified that in December, 1899, he brought a cargo of coal to San Francisco on the steamer Alice Blanchard, arriving here about December 18th, and consigned to Charles R. Allen; that on the 18th day of December he called upon the agents of the consignors with reference to the freight money; that they did not pay. Continuing, the witness said: "On that day I had a conversation with Charles R. Allen with reference to freight money on this cargo of coal. I telephoned to Mr. Allen on the morning of the 18th. I asked him if he would pay the freight if we delivered it. He answered back, stating that he would. This telephone message was sent from the telephone of Messrs. Byxbee & Clark's office" (agents of consignors). He further testified that the conversation was held during the morning of the 18th at a time when but a few tons of coal had been discharged, and that the discharge of the coal was finished at half past 12, December 19, 1899, and that he delivered the coal because defendant agreed to pay the freight. The above testimony supports the findings. It is true that defendant gave testimony which contradicts the testimony of plaintiff, and counsel for appellant has called our attention to alleged contradictions and improbabilities in the testimony of plaintiff. But these were matters to be solved by the trial court; and where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, such as is presented in this case, this court will not interfere with the action of the lower court in regard thereto. Evidence that the promise was made on the 18th of December, 1899, was sufficient to support the finding that "defendant promised on or about said day [December 19, 1899] to pay plaintiff the freight money due thereon." Whether or not the telephonic conversation occurred on the 18th or 19th day of December, under the condition of the evidence in this case, went to the evidentiary value of the respective testimony of plaintiff and defendant as to that conversation; but the court was not required, as is claimed by appellant, to make a finding as to which of the two days the promise was made upon.

Appellant urges as ground for reversal the failure of the court to rule upon a motion made by defendant to strike out the answer of plaintiff as follows: "I telephoned to Mr. Allen on the morning of the 18th. I asked him if he would pay the freight if we delivered it. He answered back, stating that he would. This telephone message was sent from the telephone in Messrs. Byxbee & Clark's office." The motion to strike out was made upon the ground that the answer of the witness showed upon its face that it was a promise within the statute of frauds, and the court said: "I will reserve my ruling." Conceding for the purpose of this decision that a failure to pass on such a motion is reversible error (City of Stockton v. Dunham, 59 Cal. 609; Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 471, 55 Pac. 398), and passing the point that nowhere in the assignment of errors contained in the statement on motion for a new trial is the failure to pass upon this particular motion assigned as error, we find that later on, at the close of the evidence for plaintiff, the defendant "moved the court to strike out all testimony of plaintiff stating the alleged contract made over the telephone, on the ground that said contract fell within the application of the statute of frauds and that said testimony was inadmissible." This motion the court denied, and to this ruling defendant duly excepted. It will thus be seen that the defendant renewed his motion and obtained a ruling. The testimony referred to in the last motion is the identical testimony given in the answer of plaintiff above set forth. It therefore cannot be said that the court did fail to rule on defendant's motion.

The vital question, however, presented by the appeal, concerns the application of the statute of frauds, and is raised by several objections to testimony given by plaintiff, by the motion to strike out last referred to, and by a motion for nonsuit made by defendant at the close of plaintiff's case, and which was by the court denied. It is contended by appellant that the testimony of plaintiff, if true, tended to prove a parol promise to answer for the debt of another (the consignor), and was therefore void under subdivision 2 of section 1624 of the Civil Code. But we think that the facts of this case bring it within one of the exceptions to the general rule. The pertinent part of section 1624 is as follows: "The following contracts are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent: (1) * * * (2) A special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another, except in the cases provided for in section 2794 of this Code." Turning to section 2794, we find the following provision: "A promise to answer for the obligation of another in any of the following cases is deemed an original obligation of the promisor, and need not be in writing: (1) * * * (2) * * * (3) Where the promise, being for an antecedent obligation of another, is made * * * upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person." The facts of this case are squarely within the above exception. At the time of the promise plaintiff, as carrier, had possession of the cargo of coal, and had a lien thereon for the freight dependent on such possession. Defendant claimed to be the owner of the coal, as purchaser from the consignor, but he could not, under the law, obtain possession thereof without the consent of plaintiff, except by paying the freight. According to his own letter, put in evidence on cross-examination of plaintiff, defendant had already paid the consignors for the coal. Under such circumstances the obtaining possession of the coal discharged of the lien for freight money was a consideration beneficial to defendant, and brought his promise to pay the freight money within the exception of section 2794. It became an original obligation of the promisor.

Counsel for defendant has cited us to Maule v. Bucknell, 50 Pa. 39, an interesting case because of the discussion of the diverse rulings of different courts on the proper effect of the statute of frauds. It is there said: "A new consideration for a new promise is indispensable without the statute, and if a new consideration is all that is needed to give validity to a promise to pay the debt of another the statute amounts to nothing, nor can it make any difference that the new consideration moves from the promisee to the promisor." But an examination of the statute of Pennsylvania discloses the fact that, like the statutes of many of our states, it contains no exception such as we have in section 2794, Civil Code. It simply provides that no action shall be brought to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt of another, unless the promise be in writing, subscribed by the defendant. Pa. St. Frauds and Perjuries, § 1; Brightly's Purd. Dig. 831. The case, however, recognizes an exception to the general rule within which the case now before the court also comes. Speaking of cases that are exceptions to the general rule, the court said: "Arnold v. Stedman, 45 Pa. 186, was a case within one of the recognized exceptions. There the promisor's property was liable for the debt of another, independent of the express promise, and the defendant undertook to pay the debt of the property." (The italics are ours.) In Arnold v. Stedman, 45 Pa. 186, Arnold by a written contract agreed to sell one Barrett two lots of land on deferred payments, and on failure to make the payments Barrett was "to give possession of said property to said Arnold." Barrett took possession, and whilst he was in possession Stedman built a barn on the lots for Barrett and filed a mechanic's claim of lien for $200. Barrett not having made his payments to Arnold, the latter brought suit in ejectment, and during the pendency thereof promised Stedman that, if he would not proceed further in the action to enforce his lien, he (Arnold) would pay Stedman's claim, and to this Stedman agreed. Arnold having recovered the lots, Stedman brought suit against Arnold on his promise, and the court held that the promise was not within the statute of frauds. The court said: "Here, then, was a lien or claim upon property in which Arnold had an interest, and it was a benefit to him that no proceedings should take place on the mechanic's lien held by Stedman while his ejectment was in progress. The consideration, therefore, as regarded Arnold, of his promise, was the benefit or advantage to himself arising from Stedman's relinquishing proceedings upon his mechanic's lien. The consideration did not proceed from or to the debtor, but was an entirely new and fresh one between Arnold and Stedman, and was a new, original, and binding contract; Arnold's object being, not to answer for the debt of Barrett, but to subserve a purpose of his own."

So in the case before us the cargo of coal, which was the property of defendant, was in the possession of plaintiff, and liable to him for the freight. Defendant's promise to pay the freight in consideration of the delivery of the coal cannot properly be said to be a promise to pay the debt of the consignor, but was a new, binding contract between plaintiff and defendant. Clay v. Walton, 9 Cal. 329, also cited by defendant, was decided at a time when our statute of frauds did not contain the exception contained in section 2794, Civil Code (Hittell's Gen. Laws, § 3156), and was not a case where plaintiff delivered to defendant property of defendant upon which plaintiff had a lien, and which lien defendant promised to pay, and is therefore not in point.

Judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

HAUB v. FREIERMUTH.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 11, 1905.)

SLANDER — CHARGING CRIME — FAILURE OF PROOF.

Though the words alleged by the complaint to have been said by defendant of plaintiff: "I have a man to prove that H. struck S. in front of his place of business, that he had two witnesses who had tracked the blood stains from H.'s shop to where S. fell, and that he had proof that H. was guilty of the murder of S."—are slanderous per se, as charging a crime, there is failure of proof, on evidence merely that defendant, in addition to saying that he had a witness who saw H. strike S., said to one person, "H. might have killed him anyhow," and to another, "If you will follow up H. pretty close, you will find that this man's death came that way," and "he might have something to do with it," and to another, "the S. case was a murder."

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by George Haub against Charles Freiermuth. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

P. R. Lund and George M. Hurlbut, for appellant. John B. Carson, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. Action for slander. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $1,000 damages, and the defendant has appealed.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that the defendant spoke of and concerning him, in the presence of one Gibson and divers other persons, the following defamatory words, viz.: "I have a man to prove that George Haub struck Richard Schwartz in front of his place of business; that he had two witnesses who had tracked the bloodstains from Haub's shop to the place where Schwartz fell unconscious; and that he had proof that Haub was guilty of the murder of Schwartz." The words thus alleged to have been spoken by the defendant are actionable in themselves, and, if false, are presumed to have been spoken with malice. The slander for which a civil action is authorized is defined in section 46 of the Civil Code, and the plaintiff's cause of action herein is based upon subdivision 1 of that section, which declares that a publication other than libel, which falsely charges any person with crime, constitutes slander. The complaint in such action may specify the crime alleged to have been imputed to the plaintiff, accompanied by the words in which the crime was charged, or it may merely set forth the words alleged to have been spoken; but in either case it must appear from the words themselves, aided, if necessary, by proper averments of their meaning and application, that the defendant charged the plaintiff with a crime. It is not sufficient to merely allege that he charged the plaintiff with having committed a certain crime. The words must be set out in the complaint, that the defendant may have notice of the particular charge which he is required to answer.

The rule is of long standing that to authorize a recovery in such action the plaintiff must prove the utterance of the words set forth in his complaint, or enough of them to show that the defendant charged him with the particular offense constituting the slander. He is not required to reproduce with literal precision the identical words set forth in his complaint, but those which are proved to have been spoken must be in substance the same, or have substantially the same meaning. Equivalent words or words of similar import will be insufficient; nor will his cause of action be sustained by proof of words that might produce an impression similar to that which the words alleged would produce. The words shown to have been spoken by the defendant are to be construed by their own meaning and import, and not by any impression which the hearer may receive from them, unless it is both shown by proper averments in the complaint and by evidence at the trial that the defendant intended by their use to create such impression. Neither is he required to prove all of the words set forth in his complaint, unless all are essential for establishing the slanderous charge; but he must prove enough of them to sustain his cause of action. In actions for slander the rule that the probata must correspond with the allegata is eminently applicable. The plaintiff is not entitled to a recovery upon proof of words not set forth in his complaint, or upon a failure to prove the slanderous words which he has alleged. It is unavailing that the evidence is such as would authorize a jury to find that the defendant intended to charge the plaintiff with the crime. Their function is to determine whether he spoke the words alleged in the complaint. These principles will find support in the following authorities: 2 Greenl. on Ev. § 414; Townsend on Slander & Libel, §§ 365, 369, 371; Newell on Slander & Libel, p. 804; 13 Ency. of Pleading & Practice, p. 62 et seq.; Fox v. Vanderbeck, 5 Cow. 513; Ward v. Dick, 47 Conn. 300, 36 Am. Rep. 75; Wilborn v. Odell, 29 Ill. 456; Schmisseur v. Kreilich, 92 Ill. 347; Ransome v. McCurley, 140 Ill. 626, 31 N. E. 119; Sword v. Martin, 23 Ill. App. 304; Irish American Bank v. Bader, 59 Minn. 329, 61 N. W. 328; Payson v. Macomber, 3 Allen, 69; Chace v. Sherman, 119 Mass. 387; Bassett v. Spofford, 11 N. H. 127; Merrill v. Peaslee, 17 N. H. 540.

At the trial the witness Gibson referred to in the complaint testified: "The defendant stated to me that 'we,' I think, or 'they'—I am not positive as to the words—have a witness that saw Mr. Haub strike Mr. Schwartz; that they had a witness that saw Mr. Haub in his own butcher shop; and that they also had a witness that followed Mr. Schwartz up the street, as he staggered up the street. He said that Mr. Schwartz fell at the corner of the street, Union and Laguna, and there was a witness that had traced the blood back to the butcher shop." On cross-examination he gave the language of the defendant as follows: "He stated that 'they' or 'we' had a witness that had seen Mr. Haub strike Mr. Schwartz. He said he was struck in the butcher shop, and that they had a witness that saw Mr. Haub strike this man. He said there was a witness that had followed Mr. Schwartz up the block and saw him stagger all the way and fall at the corner, and also that there were two witnesses that had traced the blood back to the butcher shop." Another witness (Nuhrenburg) testified that in a conversation with the defendant, in which he suggested that Schwartz had died of heart disease, the defendant replied: "No, I don't believe he had heart disease. Somebody hit him because he had a hole in the back of his head." And upon the witness expressing a doubt the defendant replied, "You know that Mr. Haub and Mr. Schwartz had some business troubles, and it is George Haub that hit him." Being asked if he was sure he said those words, the witness replied: "Yes, sir; he did not say 'killed' or 'murdered,' but he said 'hit' him." The gravamen of the plaintiff's cause of action is that the defendant falsely charged him with the murder of Schwartz; and to authorize a recovery it was necessary to prove that the defendant had spoken the words set out in the complaint in which that charge was made, viz.: "That he had proof that Haub was guilty of the murder of Schwartz." If the complaint had not set out these words, or contained an allegation that they were spoken by the defendant, it would have failed to state a cause of action, since the other words do not of themselves, or by reason of any averments in the complaint, charge the plaintiff with the commission of a crime; and proof that the defendant had spoken only those other words was equally insufficient to authorize a recovery. There is nothing in the testimony above quoted, or elsewhere in the record, which indicates that the defendant said that he had proof that Haub was guilty of the murder of Schwartz, or that he uttered any words substantially the same; and there was the direct testimony of Nuhrenburg that in his conversation with him the defendant did not use the words "killed" or "murdered."

The only testimony that the defendant, in any words spoken by him, associated the plaintiff with the death of Schwartz, was that of the witness Wulzen that the defendant said to him, "Mr. Haub might have killed him anyhow," and of the witness Fanning that he said, "If you will follow up Haub pretty close you will find that this man's death came that way," and, "he might have something to do with it," and the above testimony of Nuhrenburg. The testimony of Gibson that the defendant said to him that "the Schwartz case was a murder" did not connect the plaintiff with the words. None of these expressions, however, correspond with the words set forth in the complaint, or contain words substantially the same in sense. It may be added, although irrelevant to the decision herein, that if they had been set forth in the complaint in addition to the words therein given they are conditional and argumentative in form, and do not constitute a direct charge that the plaintiff had committed any crime. It must be held, therefore, that the evidence presented by the plaintiff was insufficient to sustain his action or to justify the verdict of the jury. It was not a case of variance, as suggested by the respondent, but was a failure of proof to sustain his allegation. Code Civ. Proc., § 471.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

McCARTY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (CITY OF SACRAMENTO, Intervener).

(Sac. 1,202.)

(Supreme Court of California, April 5, 1905. On Rehearing, Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. Eminent Domain — Condemnation of Land for Levee Purposes.

Where property is taken for public use, and an easement is sufficient for the use, the fee will not be deemed to be appropriated unless stated expressly or by necessary implication in the statute governing the proceeding or in the judgment of condemnation.

2. Same—Assessment of Damages.

St. 1861, p. 355, c. 352, relating to the reclamation of swamp land, provides that, if it is necessary to construct levees on land other than swamp land, the swamp-land commissioners shall have power to take possession of so much of the land as may be necessary, if the same be private property, and if the necessary rights be not granted by the owners, and that appraisers may be appointed to assess the damages. Act April 9, 1862 (St. 1862, p. 153, c. 158), § 8, relating to a levee constructed by the city of Sacramento, provided that, when the levee was finished by the swamp-land commissioners, they should deliver the same to the city levee commissioners, and thereupon the title should vest in the city. Section 6 (page 152) provided that city levee commissioners might take possession of any land necessary for a levee, and condemn the same in accordance with Acts 1861 (St. 1861, p. 358, c. 352), § 16. The petition upon which the condemnation of land for the Sacramento levee was founded alleged that the commissioners had found it necessary to use certain land for levee purposes. The report of the appraisers stated the compensation to be made, and the judgment confirming the report was silent as to the estate taken. Held, that the city of Sacramento did not acquire the fee to land taken for the purposes of levee.

On Rehearing.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN — LEVEES — CONDEMNATION BY CITY—AUTHORITY.

Act April 9, 1862 (St. 1862, pp. 152, 153, 158, c. 158, §§ 4, 7, 17), provided, in substance, that the levee board of the city of Sacramento might construct that portion of levees required by the plans adopted at a joint meeting of the city board and state board of swamp-land commissioners, and that in case the state board was unable, from lack of funds, to let out the constructing of the levees, the city levee commissioners could construct so much of the levee as was necessary for the protection of the city, or could advance the funds necessary therefor to the state board. Authority to condemn lands without the city for levee purposes was given by St. 1861, p. 355, c. 352, to the state board, and a petition to the district court by the state board was required. Held, that the city board of levee commissioners had no authority to condemn land for a levee which lay outside of the city; such authority being in the state board alone.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEDURE.

St. 1861, p. 358, c. 352, § 16, providing for the condemnation of land for levee purposes, did not specifically require notice to the owners of property condemned, but directed that the appraisers to be appointed by the court should proceed to examine the premises, and an order of court appointing such appraisers directed them to give notice of the time of hearing and examination. Held, that the notice given under such order was a sufficient compliance with the rule that no one can be deprived of his property except by judgment upon due process of law.

5. SAME—ESTOPPEL—ACQUIESCENCE.

On an issue as to the validity of the condemnation of land by a city for levee purposes, it was contended that the landowners' predecessors had accepted a part of the award made, and was estopped from asserting the invalidity of the proceedings. The amount of the damages awarded was $195. There was no evidence that any part of it was ever paid. The appraisers' report in the proceedings stated that the entire tract belonging to the predecessors was subject to taxes amounting to $665, and thereafter the district attorney filed with the city board a claim for $741 for the same taxes, whereupon the board "decided to withhold the same from the amount of damages awarded." The stubs of the warrant book of the board further showed that afterwards warrants were issued to the district attorney for such sum, with a memorandum that the amount was withheld from the damages awarded. There was no evidence that the owners knew of such payment, or consented to it. The levee at that time covered but a small part of the 165-foot strip claimed by the city, but thereafter the levee was widened, and subsequently a sum of money was paid to the then landowners. Held, that the evidence did not show an estoppel.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County.

Action by Daniel McCarty against the Southern Pacific Company and others, the city of Sacramento intervening. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, intervener appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. McKune and Devlin & Devlin, for appellant. A. L. Shinn, for respondent. S. Luke Howe and A. A. De Ligne, for intervener.

SHAW, J. Upon the former hearing of this case the appeals of the plaintiff from the order granting a new trial, and of the defendants from the judgment, were disposed of. That part of the former opinion based on the theory that the intervener's motion for a new trial was also granted, and refusing to consider its appeal from the judgment on that theory, was vacated before the decision became final. Although the intervener and defendants appeared to make common cause against the plaintiff, yet, upon an inspection of the motion and order for a new trial, it appears that it was the motion of the defendants alone which was granted, and that the judgment, so far as the intervener is concerned, stands subject to the present appeal. A general statement of the facts and points in controversy is contained in the former opinion. 78 Pac. 260. We are here concerned only with the points presented by the intervener upon its appeal.

In its complaint in intervention the city of Sacramento alleged that it was the owner in fee of the strip of land 165 feet in width constituting the levee in controversy, and upon this allegation issue was taken by the plaintiff. The court found and adjudged that the city has an easement for its levee over and across the said strip of land, including the entire levee as now existing, with the privilege of entering on said land to repair the levee, and of taking earth for that purpose from said land at any point within 70 feet of the middle line of the levee, but not to interfere with the buildings of plaintiff, or with his occupancy of the land, except so far as may be necessary for the protection and maintenance of the levee, and that the railroad track was maintained upon the levee for its protection. Counsel for intervener, in their brief, say that the easement as described in the findings was curtailed in the judgment. They do not, however, point out in what particular it was curtailed, and upon examination we fail to perceive wherein the description in the judgment is substantially different from that in the findings.

The only point argued by the intervener on its appeal from the judgment is that upon the evidence the court should have adjudged that the city was the owner of the fee in the strip of land embraced in the levee, instead of a mere easement therein for levee purposes. It is claimed, although, as we think, not seriously, that the evidence shows that the city has acquired title to the fee by adverse claim and possession. The evidence is of such a character, however, that we cannot disturb the finding on this proposition, but must hold that it is sufficiently supported on that point.

The principal contention that the city owns the fee is made upon the theory that the condemnation proceedings under the act of 1862 vested in the city the fee simple. There is another ground upon which the right to the fee appears to be based, although it does not seem to be clearly stated in the brief. It is that the board of swamp-land commissioners in charge of the reclamation district in which the levee in controversy is situated constructed the levee in question under the authority given in section 16 of the act of May 13, 1861 (St. 1861, p. 358, c. 352), and that it became the property of the city in fee by virtue of the provisions of that section and of section 8 of the act of April 9, 1862 (St. 1862, p. 153, c. 158), and that this title is independent of the effect of the condemnation proceedings. The objection that the act of 1862 gave no power to the city levee commissioners to condemn lands outside of the city limits, and that the proceedings in condemnation were void because of uncertainty in the description of the land taken, and by reason of want of notice to the owners, may be dismissed from our consideration. For the purposes of the case, we may assume that the proceedings were valid, and that the authority of the levee commissioners to institute the proceedings cannot now be questioned. Conceding all this, we think that the evidence, taken in connection with the law bearing upon the proceedings, shows that the city obtained nothing more than an easement for the construction, maintenance, and repair of the levee.

There can be no doubt that it was within the power of the state to provide by statute that the fee should be taken for that purpose. The rule is, however, and the appellant practically concedes it, that in all cases where property is taken for public use, and an easement is sufficient for the purpose of the use, the fee will not be deemed to be appropriated in any case, unless it is so stated, expressly or by necessary implication, either in the statute or in the judgment of condemnation. The law does not favor the taking of a fee when it is not necessary to the use. The fee is not necessary for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and repairing a levee intended to keep out flood waters. It is well known that such floods occur only at rare intervals, usually not more than once in a year, and lasting only for a few days, or weeks at most, and in some years not occurring at all. During all the intervening periods such a levee serves no public purpose whatever. Once it is constructed, its surface can be used by the owner of the fee during the greater part of each season for many purposes, and the grasses and vegetation grown thereon may be appropriated by him without in any respect affecting or impairing the use or efficiency of the premises as a levee. The two uses are not wholly inconsistent; hence, so far as they are consistent, they may exist together, and be vested in different persons. The owner of the fee will still have a proprietary interest in all the space above and below the levee, and may use the same as he sees fit, provided such use does not impair the constructions constituting the easement, nor interfere with the use of the easement. It is clear, therefore, that the fee was not necessary to the use, although it may be conceded that the Legislature might have so declared.

It may be granted that where the statute in terms provides for the condemnation of the "land" or of "lands" for the public uses and purposes, or where any equivalent term is used, it will usually be construed to authorize the taking of the fee. We search the statutes in vain for any language which, expressly or by necessary implication, gives authority to take the fee for the levee in question. Section 16 of the act of 1861 aforesaid, relating to the reclamation of swamp and overflowed land, provides that if, in the work of reclamation, it is found necessary to construct levees, trenches, or other works on lands other than swamp and overflowed lands, the board of swamp-land commissioners "shall have power to enter upon and take possession of so much of said land as may be necessary for said work of reclamation, if the same be private property, and, if the rights and privileges necessary be not granted by the owners," that appraisers may be appointed to assess the damages and injuries to such lands arising from the taking. This manifestly contemplates only such an entry and possession as may be necessary for the purpose intended; that is, to construct, maintain, and keep in repair the levee for the purposes of reclamation. It does not authorize the commissioners to take the land, but merely to enter upon and take possession thereof; and, if the right and privilege to do so are not given by the owners, then such right and privilege are to be taken, and payment made of the damages arising therefrom. Keeping in view the character of the public use for which the property was to be taken, it is manifest that this language should not be construed to direct the taking of the fee simple. Section 8 of the act of 1862 aforesaid, relating to the levee in question, provides that when the levee was finished by the swamp-land commissioners, and the portion thereafter to be controlled by the city of Sacramento ascertained, the commissioners should then deliver such portion to the city levee commissioners, and thereupon "the title to said levees and their appurtenances shall vest absolutely in the city of Sacramento." This does, indeed, declare that the title to the thing described shall be absolute in the city; but the thing itself is not the land in fee simple on which the levee stands, but only the levee. This plainly implies that an easement, and not the fee, was intended to be given; that is to say, the thing erected on the land and devoted to public use, with all the appurtenances necessary for its effectual use and maintenance.

Nor does the judgment in the condemnation proceedings carry a greater estate than a mere easement in the property. Section 6 (page 152) of the act provides that the city levee commissioners may enter upon and take possession of any land that may be necessary for the levee within the city, or any land within the county, although outside the city, that may be necessary or proper to furnish materials for its construction, and may have the same condemned for the public use in accordance with section 16 of the act of 1861. This manifestly does not empower the levee commissioners to condemn lands outside of the city for the purpose of erecting a levee thereon, but gives the right to condemn lands outside of the city solely for the purpose of taking therefrom materials with which to construct the levee. The land in question is outside of the city of Sacramento. Conceding, however, that this question cannot now be entertained, it is clear that the language of the section does not give the city levee commissioners any power either to take or to condemn a fee-simple title to land within or without the city for the purposes of constructing a levee thereon. Moreover, the petition upon which the condemnation proceedings were founded does not ask for the taking of a fee. It alleges that the city levee commissioners "have found it necessary to enter upon and occupy and use for the purpose of constructing levees thereon" the lands therein described, and it prays that such orders may be made as will entitle the levee commissioners "to enter upon, take, use, and appropriate for levee purposes" the lands described. This use demands an easement, and nothing more. There is nothing in the report of the appraisers to indicate whether the appraisement is of an estate in fee or of a mere easement. It merely states the compensation proper to be made to the owners of the land condemned for levee purposes. The judgment confirms the report of the appraisers, without stating anything concerning the nature of the estate to be taken, or for which the damages are allowed. Under neither of the proceedings which appear to have been taken in this case can the city claim a fee-simple title.

The easement, however, gives the city a right to erect and maintain on the levee all buildings or other constructions that may be reasonably necessary or convenient for the use to which it is devoted, or which are adapted to preserve it in good condition for that use. The right to do these things, however, does not make it necessary to hold that the estate taken is a fee simple. This right merely adds to the burden of the easement. Whether or not the maintenance and operation of a railroad upon the levee is an undue interference with the rights of the owner of the fee, or constitutes a substantial addition to the burden on his title, is a question not arising on this appeal. The intervener does not complain of that part of the judgment which appears to recognize the right of the railroad to maintain its track upon the levee, but seems to acquiesce in that use of the levee, and makes common cause with the defendants against the plaintiff. As between the plaintiff and the defendants, a new trial has been granted, and the right to maintain the railroad track, as between those parties, is not involved in this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed so far as it may affect the rights of the intervener and the plaintiff.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.

(May 5, 1905.)

PER CURIAM. It is ordered that the judgment heretofore rendered in bank in this cause on the appeal of the city of Sacramento, intervener herein, from the judgment of the superior court, be vacated, and that the cause be placed on the present Sacramento calendar, for further argument in regard to the validity of the condemnation proceedings and the right of the intervener to an easement, under said proceedings, of greater width and extent than that given in the judgment appealed from.

On Rehearing.

We adhere to the views expressed in the opinion rendered on the former hearing. The purpose of the present hearing was, by the order therefor, limited to the consideration of the "validity of the condemnation proceedings and the right of the intervener to an easement, under said proceedings, of greater width and extent than that given in the judgment appealed from." The former opinion assumed, without deciding, that the condemnation proceedings were valid, and declared that the estate thereby acquired by the city of Sacramento was an easement and not a fee. It is claimed, however, that by the proceedings in condemnation the city was given an easement 165 feet in width for all levee purposes, with the additional right to cause the levee, when completed, to be turnpiked and used as a toll road, whereas, by the judgment appealed from, the easement given is only 140 feet wide, and is further limited so as to give the right to maintain the levee at the existing width only, which is much less than 140 feet, with no right to a turnpike road, and as to the remaining width, giving only the right to take earth therefrom to repair the existing levee; so that, if the proceedings in condemnation are valid, or if plaintiff is estopped to dispute their validity, the judgment appealed from is erroneous, and a new trial will be necessary.

Respondent now claims that there is no specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding as to the width and extent or character of the easement. This contention is correct so far as the right to use the levee as a turnpike road is concerned. We think the question of the width of the strip of land in controversy, aside from the character of the estate therein, is sufficiently, though not clearly, presented by the specifications.

The law authorizing the proceedings made no provision for notice to the owners of the property condemned, and the record made of the proceeding is somewhat uncertain in respect to the description of the land taken and also as to the amount of damages awarded, and for these and other reasons the respondent claims that the proceedings are invalid. The law (St. 1861, p. 358, c. 352, § 16) does not specifically require notice, but it directs that the appraisers, who are appointed by the court ex parte, shall proceed to the premises, and examine, hear, and determine as to the damages awarded. The order of the court appointing these appraisers directed them to give notice of the time of the examination and hearing, and this was done to the satisfaction of the court. The constitutionality of such a proceeding seems questionable, but, under the doctrine of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 13 Sup. Ct. 750, 37 L. Ed. 637, the notice given appears to be a sufficient compliance with the rule that no person can be deprived of his property except by judgment upon due process of law. See, also, Curran v. Shattuck, 24 Cal. 433.

We do not consider it necessary to decide whether or not the proceeding is void because of uncertainty in the description or in the amount awarded as disclosed in the record. We think it was void for other reasons. As stated in the former opinion, section 6 of the act of 1862 (St. 1862, p. 152, c. 158) does not authorize the board of city levee commissioners to condemn lands outside the city to be used as a levee. It gives the board power to take land outside the city only for the purpose of obtaining therefrom materials for the construction of the levees within the city. See Johnston v. Sacramento Co., 137 Cal. 204, 69 Pac. 962. The land in question was not taken for any such purpose, and, if it were so taken, it would not authorize the building or maintenance of a levee thereon. The levee in question was constructed by the city levee commissioners solely under the authority conferred by sections 4, 7, 17, c. 158, pp. 152, 153, 158, of the act of 1862, aforesaid. These sections provided that after the board of state swamp and overflowed land commissioners had finally adopted a plan for the reclamation of swamp-land district No. 2, in which the lands and levee in question are situated, or after such plans had been finally approved at a joint meeting of the state board and city board therein provided for, the city board should proceed to construct that portion of the levees required by such plans, lying within the city, and that as soon as possible the state board should let out contracts for the construction of all the levees outside of the city. Section 17 provided, however, that in case the state board was unable from lack of funds to "let out the constructing the levees" for said swamp-land district in time to have them completed by October 1, 1862, the city levee commissioners could construct so much of said levee as was necessary for the protection of the city, or could advance the funds necessary therefor to the state board, and that the moneys so expended or advanced should be repaid to the city levee fund out of the first moneys thereafter coming into the treasury of the swamp-land district. The plans for the levees outside the city were adopted by the state board, and modified and finally established at a joint session of the two boards, as provided in the act. The state board was without funds to complete its portion thereof, and let no contracts therefor, but gave notice of its inability to do so to the city board, and requested the latter to act in the premises in accordance with the above provisions of the act. Thereupon the proceedings in condemnation were taken, and the levee was thereafter constructed by the city board. It will be observed that by the scheme provided, the levee in question was to be made by the state swamp-land board, and that the city board was empowered to come to the assistance of the state board, and construct the levee in its behalf; but that the authority of the city board to condemn lands for a levee was restricted to lands necessary for levees within the city, and did not include land for this levee which lay outside of, and to the east of, the city and eastwardly of Burns slough. The authority to condemn lands for this levee was given to the state board by section 16 of the act of 1861. St. 1861, p. 358, c. 352. An authority to one party to "construct" a levee on behalf of a second party could scarcely be held in any case to include authority to the first party to condemn the land on which the levee was to be constructed. 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1074. But it clearly cannot be so construed in a case like the present one, where the law by implication withholds such authority to condemn from the first party, and by its terms expressly gives it to the second party. The grant of such power must be by express terms or necessary implication, and the statute conferring it must be strictly construed. 7 Ency. of Pl. & Pr., 468; San Francisco, etc., W. Co. v. Alameda W. Co., 36 Cal. 639; Curran v. Shattuck, 24 Cal. 432; Stanford v. Worn, 27 Cal. 174; Creighton v. Manson, Id. 628; Smith v. Davis, 30 Cal. 537; Trumpler v.

Bemerly, 39 Cal. 491; Chase v. Putnam, 117 Cal. 368, 49 Pac. 204. The proceeding is special and statutory, and the prescribed method must, in such cases, be strictly pursued. A petition to the district court by the state board was required. There is no authority given for the filing of such petition by any other party. Hence a petition filed and presented by some other party would not give the court jurisdiction to proceed. Stanford v. Worn, 27 Cal. 171; 7 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 513, 517. In such special proceedings, where a petition is required, the presentation of a petition showing authority to proceed is necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court. In re Grove St., 61 Cal. 452; Haynes v. Meeks, 20 Cal. 315; Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 626; Fitch v. Miller, 20 Cal. 382; Pryor v. Downey, 50 Cal. 398, 19 Am. Rep. 656; 15 Ency. of Law & Pro. 810, 816; 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 178. It follows, that the court had no jurisdiction of the proceeding, and that the judgment of condemnation was void.

The appellant further claims that the plaintiff's predecessors accepted a part of the award made, or the benefit thereof, and that the plaintiff is thereby estopped from asserting the invalidity of the proceeding, or denying the right of the city to an easement of the width and character purported to be given thereby. The amount of the damages awarded was $195.50, and there is no evidence that any part of it was ever paid. The appraiser's report in the proceeding states that the entire tract belonging to the plaintiff's predecessors was subject to taxes of 1859, 1860, and 1861, amounting to $665.96. In July, 1863, the district attorney filed with the city board a claim for $741.39 for the same taxes, then delinquent, and the board thereupon "decided to withhold the same from the amount of damages awarded." The stubs of the warrant book of the board further show that afterwards warrants were issued to the district attorney for this sum, with a memorandum that the amount was withheld from the damages awarded. There is nothing further to show the reason or purpose of making this payment, if it was made, nor any evidence that the owners consented to the arrangement, or had any knowledge thereof, except an admission at the trial by plaintiff's counsel that the "balance" of the delinquent taxes for those years was paid by the owners. There is, however, no evidence that there was any balance. There are other facts inconsistent with an estoppel. The levee at that time covered but a small part of the 165-foot strip now claimed, and the excess, it appears, was not then claimed by the city board. In the spring of 1868 the levee was raised several feet and widened, so as to be from 50 to 70 feet wide at the bottom. In the following November the city board paid to the then owners $247 for 9.88 acres of land taken for levee purposes on this levee. This would make a strip through the tract 84 feet wide, or 42 feet additional on each side of the former levee. The inference is thus raised that the owners claimed and the board paid the above sum for the additional land taken by the widening of the levee through that tract, which is inconsistent with the theory that the parties had accepted the award, waived the invalidity of the proceedings, or consented to an easement 165 feet in width. In view of this conflict in the evidence, and other evidence which we do not consider it necessary to discuss, we cannot say that the finding of the trial court as to the width and character of the easement is not supported by sufficient evidence.

The judgment, so far as it affects the rights of the intervener, is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1905.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CREATION—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

It is not necessary, under St. 1883, p. 93, c. 49, and amendments thereto, that the petition for the incorporation of a municipal corporation should state that there is any town within the proposed boundaries.

2. HOLIDAYS—ELECTION—VALIDITY.

An election to determine whether a proposed municipal corporation shall be created may be held on a legal holiday named in Pol. Code, § 10, though Code Civ. Proc. § 134, prohibits the transaction of "judicial business" on holidays; for, on holidays, transactions not within the statutory prohibition may be carried on as on other days.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—EXTENT OF TERRITORY—DETERMINATION.

Under Const. art. 11, & 6, providing that municipal corporations shall not be created by special laws, but the Legislature shall by general laws provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, and St. 1883, p. 93, c. 49, providing that "any portion of a county containing not less than" 500 inhabitants may become incorporated, and giving the board of supervisors power to change the boundaries proposed, the question as to whether certain territory proposed to be included in a municipal corporation shall be included therein is for the final determination of the board.

4. SAME—NOTICES OF ELECTION—SUFFICIENCY.

A board of supervisors ordered notices of an election to determine whether a proposed municipal corporation should be created to be posted at five specified places, and they were posted accordingly. One of the notices was posted outside of the boundaries of the proposed corporation. Held, that proper notice was given; Mun. Corp. Act (Laws 1883, p. 93, c. 49) § 2, requiring only four notices to be posted within such boundaries.

5. SAME—DETERMINATION OF BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—FINALITY.

Under the statute relating to creation of municipal corporations, which provides that the board of supervisors shall, on the hearing of the petition for incorporation, determine how many inhabitants reside within the proposed boundaries and whether the petition is signed by a sufficient number of resident electors of the district, the finding of the board on the questions is conclusive, in the absence of a law providing for an appeal, or in the absence of a showing that the decision was induced by fraud.

6. SAME—ELECTION—VALIDITY.

At the election to determine whether a proposed municipal corporation should be created, it was found that 5 votes were cast by persons residing without the boundaries of the proposed corporation. Seventy-nine votes were cast for incorporation and 30 against. Held that, assuming that the 5 illegal votes were cast for incorporation, the election resulted in favor of incorporation.

7. SAME—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A party assailing the validity of an election to determine whether a proposed municipal corporation shall be created has the burden of proving that a sufficient number of illegal votes to affect the result were cast.

8. SAME—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In proceedings for the incorporation of a municipal corporation, it was not error to refuse the party assailing the validity of the incorporation permission to prove that the board of supervisors mistakenly thought that certain territory was included within the proposed boundaries of the proposed corporation when they heard the petition for incorporation and determined as to the eligibility of the signers thereof and as to the population within the proposed boundaries, the decision of the board thereon being final.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the people on the relation of D. Russell, against the town of Loyalton. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John B. Irish, for appellant. Frank R. Wehe and F. D. Soward, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought for the purpose of determining the right of defendant to hold and enjoy the franchise and to exercise the powers of a municipal corporation of the sixth class, which it assumes to be under certain proceedings had under the general law providing for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations. St. 1883, p. 93, c. 49, and amendments thereto. Defendant had judgment, and this is an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment and from an order denying the motion for a new trial.

1. Upon the face of the record of the incorporation proceedings there appears to have been a literal compliance with every statutory requirement It is suggested that the petition for incorporation does not state that there is any "town" within the proposed boundaries, but under our statute no such statement is required. The petition stated everything required by the statute. The record shows that the election in the "proposed corporation for the purpose of determining whether the same shall become incorporated" was ordered by the board of supervisors to be held on the 9th day of September, 1901, and was held on said day. That day being a holiday under the provisions of our statute (Pol. Code, § 10), it is claimed that no valid election could be held thereon. Appellant has pointed out no statute prohibiting the holding of such an election on a holiday, and we know of none. There is a statutory prohibition as to the transaction of certain "judicial business" on certain holidays, including September 9th (Code Civ. Proc. § 134); but the holding of an election does not come within that term. In the absence of any such statutory prohibition, we know of no reason why the election could not be held on a day set apart by statute as a holiday. The rule appears to be that on all such days all transactions not within statutory prohibitions may be carried on as on any other day. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 414.

2. The complaint contained allegations as to the large area of land included within the boundaries of the supposed corporation and the character thereof; the object thereof being to show that the great bulk of the land should not have been included, being uninhabited and suitable only for farming, timber, and grazing purposes. The court found that the land consisted of about 52 square miles of territory, with a population of about 700. The evidence showed that the village proper was a small collection of houses, about 40 in number, with a population of less than 500, and that the remainder of the vast acreage included was of the character alleged. It is contended that it is essential to incorporation under the provisions of our law that there should be a town or village of at least 500 inhabitants, and that it was never contemplated by the framers of our statute that land of the character alleged, having no natural connection with the town or village and no adaptability to village purposes, might be included. In view of the provisions of our statute upon these matters, it must be held that there is no force in this contention. While the good policy of permitting the inclusion in the incorporation of a town of an unlimited amount of outside territory having no natural connection therewith and in no way adapted for town or city government may well be questioned, it must be admitted that the matter is one wholly within the control of the legislative department of the state, except so far as such power may be limited by constitutional provisions. The Constitution contains no intimation whatever as to the minimum of population essential to incorporation, nor does it attempt to limit the power of the Legislature in providing for the determination of the question as to what shall constitute municipal territory. The only constitutional restriction is that municipal corporations shall not be created by special laws, and the Legislature is required by general laws to provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification of cities and towns. Const. § 6, art. 11. This leaves the questions as to population, extent, and character of territory entirely with the legislative department. When we come to a consideration of the general municipal incorporation act, we find that it is expressly provided that "any portion of a county containing not less than five hundred inhabitants, and not incorporated as a municipal incorporation, may become incorporated" as a municipal corporation thereunder, upon complying with the provisions thereof. St. 1883, p. 93, c. 49. The board of supervisors of the county is given certain power in regard to changes in the boundaries proposed, but no other tribunal may interfere. The question as to whether territory proposed to be included should be brought under municipal control is left to be finally determined by the board of supervisors.

The question here discussed is not a new one in this state. It was definitely decided by this court in People v. Riverside, 70 Cal. 461, 11 Pac. 759, where territory comprising some 50 square miles, much of which was apparently not at all adapted to municipal purposes, was included. That the law here is as above stated was also recognized by this court in People v. Linden, 107 Cal. 94, 100, 40 Pac. 115, where the territory included comprised 48 square miles. We have found no decision from any other state that is applicable under the language of our statute. Where the tribunal charged with the duty of determining the boundaries is limited by language of the Legislature which may reasonably be construed as applicable only to towns and villages proper and adjacent territory naturally connected therewith, a very different question is presented; but no such limitation can be found in the broad words used in our statute. We do not decide whether or not there might be such fraud in the matter of fixing boundaries as would be held to invalidate the proceedings; for there was no sufficient allegation of fraud in this respect, and absolutely no proof of any such fraud.

3. The board of supervisors ordered notices of the election to be posted at five specified places, and they were posted accordingly. Subsequent to the election it was discovered that one of the specified places, viz., "Lewis Mill," was not within the boundaries of the proposed corporation. The law, however, requires only four notices to be posted within such boundaries. Section 2, Mun. Corp. Act. As the order of the board was literally complied with, and as such literal compliance resulted in four notices being posted within the boundaries, the notice given was in all respects as required by law.

4. It is claimed that the averment in the petition for incorporation to the effect that there were 700 inhabitants in the territory proposed to be incorporated was false, and that there were not exceeding 350 inhabitants therein. It is also claimed that, of the 57 persons who signed said petition, 32 were not residing within the boundaries of such proposed incorporation. The corporation act requires that there must be not less than 500 inhabitants, and that the number of inhabitants must be stated as nearly as may be in the petition, and it also requires the petition to be signed by not less than 50 electors of the county residing within the territory proposed to be incorporated. By express provision the board of supervisors is required upon the hearing, to "ascertain and determine how many inhabitants reside within such boundaries." The board is further required, of course, as a prerequisite to exercising jurisdiction, to determine whether or not the petition, apparently sufficiently signed, has been in fact signed by a sufficient number of resident electors of the district. The record shows that in this matter the board of supervisors heard the petition, and expressly found that each and all of the allegations contained in the petition and affidavit annexed thereto were true. This necessarily included the finding that each of the signers of the petition was an elector of the county and resident of the proposed corporation. The board further expressly found the number of inhabitants thereof to be 700. The law provides for no appeal from the decision of the board upon such questions. Under what appears to be the settled law of this state, the decision of the board of supervisors upon both these questions of fact must be held to be conclusive here. There was no allegation to the effect that the decision was induced by any extrinsic or collateral fraud, and in the absence of any right of appeal or review by a higher tribunal such decision could be vacated only upon grounds which would justify the vacating of a judgment rendered by a court of record. It will only be necessary in this connection to refer to the case of People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 Pac. 749, where the whole matter was thoroughly discussed and the law applicable very clearly stated.

5. At the election there were 79 votes for incorporation and only 30 against. It was urged by appellant that more than one-half of the votes were cast by persons residing without the boundaries of the proposed corporation. The trial court found that only 5 votes were cast by persons residing without the boundaries of the proposed town of Loyalton, and that, except as to such 5 votes, no person was permitted to vote at such election who had not resided within the limits of the proposed corporation for at least 60 days next preceding said election. It appears that at the time of the election Lewis Mill, together with certain buildings and places of abode for many who there worked, was generally supposed to be within the boundaries of the proposed corporation, while as a matter of fact it was about one-half mile east thereof. It was under this supposition that whatever votes were improperly cast were deposited by the voters and received by the election board, and there is no pretense that there was any fraud in the matter upon the part of anybody. It may be assumed, for the purpose of this decision, that every illegal vote was cast for incorporation. The question, then, is as to whether the illegal votes were sufficient in number to make any difference in the result if they be deducted. As we have said, the court below found that there were not to exceed 5 illegal votes. We have carefully examined the evidence adduced upon this question, and we cannot say that the finding of the trial court is not sufficiently sustained thereby, so far as is necessary to support the judgment. There can be no doubt that upon this proposition the burden of proof was on the plaintiff. The evidence contained in the record is not at all clear and convincing as to the actual residence of many of the voters. It may be that such evidence would compel the conclusion that some, in addition to the 5 found by the trial court, were illegal voters by reason of nonresidence; but we are satisfied that we cannot, upon that evidence, disturb the finding to the extent of holding that there is no support in the evidence for the conclusion that there was not a sufficient number of such illegal votes cast to affect the result, even though all such illegal votes be deducted from the total vote cast for incorporation.

6. The court was amply justified in holding that the allegations of the complaint to the effect that the Loyalton Lumber Company and its officers in any way coerced its employés to vote for incorporation were not sustained by the evidence.

7. We have examined the various rulings complained of relative to the admission and exclusion of evidence, and find no error. Much reliance is based upon the fact that the court refused to permit plaintiff to show that the members of the board of supervisors mistakenly thought that Lewis Mill was included within the proposed boundaries at the time they heard the petition for incorporation and determined as to the eligibility of the signers thereof and as to the population; but we think such proposed evidence was entirely immaterial. As we have seen, it was for the board of supervisors to finally determine both of these matters from the evidence submitted to them, and neither the evidence nor the mental processes by which their conclusion was reached are reviewable here. What has been said disposes of all the points requiring notice.

1 Cal. App. 609

PERRY v. J. NOONAN LOAN CO.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 20, 1905.)

1. Appeal — Review — Order Granting New Trial.

An order granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict rendered will not be reversed on appeal, where the issue was one of fact on which the evidence was conflicting.

2. Same—Settlement of Statement—Waiver of Objections.

An indorsement by opposing counsel on a proposed statement of the case for use on a motion for new trial that "the foregoing statement is correct and may be settled and allowed, subject to the right to object as heretofore reserved as not prepared and presented in time," was a waiver of the right to amend the statement, and authorized its presentation to the judge for settlement without notice; and the reservation of the right to object on the stated ground will not avail on appeal, where it does not appear from the record that any objection was in fact made or ruled on motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by D. E. Perry against the J. Noonan Loan Company. Plaintiff appeals from an order granting a new trial. Affirmed.

Frank W. Sawyer, for appellant. Walter E. Dorn, for respondent.

HARRISON, P. J. This action was brought to recover the value of services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant during the two years prior to the commencement of the action; the amount claimed being $6,000. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $1,520. Thereafter the court granted the defendant's motion for a new trial "on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict rendered herein." From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

Being an action of quantum meruit, the amount to be recovered depended upon the testimony of witnesses as to the value of the services, and on this point there was a marked conflict in the testimony. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged their value to be $250 per month, and at the trial there was testimony on his behalf placing their value at different sums from $250 to $300 per month, while on the part of the defendant witnesses placed their value at from $65 to $150 per month. There was also testimony tending to show that the plaintiff had been paid a large portion, if not all, of the amount that he was entitled to under testimony on behalf of the defendant. The court was therefore fully authorized to grant a new trial.

The appellant urges that the court erred in granting the motion, for the reason that the statement of the case, upon which the motion was made, was not presented to the plaintiff within the time allowed by law therefor, and that therefore it was improperly settled by the judge, and should not have been considered by him. The following are the facts relied upon in support of this position, viz.: The verdict of the jury was rendered December 9, 1901. The defendant gave notice of its intention to move for a new trial December 19, 1901. At the close of the statement which was settled is the following: "The defendant proposes the foregoing as his statement on motion for a new trial. Dated March 25, 1902. Walter E. Dorn, Attorney for Defendant." Directly underneath is the following: "The foregoing statement is correct, and may be settled and allowed, subject to the right to object as heretofore reserved as not prepared and presented in time. Dated March 25, 1902. F. W. Sawyer, Attorney for Plaintiff." This is followed by the following certificate of settlement: "The foregoing statement is correct, and is hereby settled and allowed. Dated April 2, 1902. John Hunt, Judge of Superior Court."

It does not appear from the record whether the plaintiff was present or absent at the time of the settlement of the statement. His admission of its correctness and consent that it be settled was a waiver of his right to propose amendments thereto, and authorized the defendant to present it to the judge for settlement, without any notice to him. Code Civ. Proc. § 659. (3) If there were any facts or reasons in support of the objection now urged, he could have reserved the right in his stipulation to be present at the settlement, and he should have then appeared and presented them to the judge and obtained a ruling upon their sufficiency, and, if such ruling was adverse, should have taken an exception thereto. The matters so presented, together with the ruling and his exception, should have been incorporated into the statement and made a part of the record, and they could then be considered by the court in hearing the motion, and also upon an appeal therefrom. When the statement was presented to the judge for settlement, he was not required to enter upon a personal investigation of the sufficiency of the objection which the plaintiff had "reserved the right" to make, but was at liberty to assume that as he had failed to specify any fact or reason in support of such objection, and did not appear to make the objection, it was without foundation. If, however, it be assumed that the plaintiff was present at the settlement, it does not appear that he made any objection thereto; but if it be further assumed that he made the objection which he had reserved the right to make, and that it was overruled by the court, the record does not show that he took any exception to such ruling. Section 647, Code Civ. Proc., does not include such ruling within those which are deemed excepted to. In Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 549, 34 Pac. 114, the defendant objected to the settlement of the statement upon the ground that the same was not served in time, in reference to which the court said: "A mere objection to the settlement of the statement, without pointing out the basis or the grounds of the objection, or presenting the facts upon which it was made, was not fair to either the judge or the opposite party; and, even if an exception had been taken to the ruling of the judge upon such objection, the party taking the exception would not have the right to its consideration upon appeal. When the motion for a new trial came on to be heard, the court in its action thereon was limited to considering the matters contained in the statement, and was not at liberty to go outside of the statement for the purpose of determining whether the new trial should have been granted or refused."

The order is affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, J.; HALL, J.

1 Cal. App. 447

PEOPLE v. ROBERTS.

1. LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for larceny, where there was evidence that two other persons besides defendant were present and concerned in the commission of the offense, a charge that the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant "and no one else" committed the offense was properly refused.

2. CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

In a prosecution for larceny, it was not error to refuse a charge that the jury should not consider testimony stricken out by the court, where the court charged that defendant was to be tried only on the evidence which was before the jury, and that the jury should not consider evidence which had been excluded by the court.

3. SAME—APPLICATION OF INSTRUCTIONS TO CASE.

Pen. Code, § 484, defines larceny as a felonious stealing, etc., of the personal property of another. Section 487 declares that grand larceny is committed "(1) when the property taken is of value exceeding $50; (2) when the property is taken from the person of another; * * * (3) when the property taken is" one of certain enumerated animals or articles. Held, that a charge defining grand larceny in accordance with section 484 and subdivision 1 of section 487, but failing to mention subdivisions 2 and 3 of the latter section, was not erroneous, where there was no charge of larceny from the person, nor of any article or animal mentioned in subdivision 3.

4. LARCENY—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for larceny, where the evidence showed that defendant and his accomplices tried to get the prosecuting witness into a card game, but were unsuccessful, and that prosecuting witness gave defendant money with which to play cards under the fear that, if he did not do so, it would be extorted from him by force or violence, but in no way participated in the game himself, a lengthy charge on the subject of larceny by trick and device was unwarranted by the evidence, misleading to the jury, and prejudicial to defendant.

5. SAME—EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONABLE QUESTIONS.

In a prosecution for larceny, a question asked by the district attorney: "Do you understand that, if a man came to you on the street and put a pistol to your head, and you handed out the money, that the money belonged to him?" was objectionable; but permitting the same to be answered was not of itself ground for reversal.

George Roberts was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

Samuel M. Shortridge and Frank J. Murphy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. The defendant, Roberts, was charged with and convicted of grand larceny, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant claims that the court erred in refusing to give at request of defendant the following instruction: "Not only must the prosecution prove beyond all reasonable doubt that the crime charged has been committed, but they must prove beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant, and no one else, committed the offense. In the absence of such proof, the defendant must be acquitted." The evidence in this case showed that two other persons besides the defendant were present and were concerned in, and aided and abetted the defendant in, the commission of the offense. Under the requested instruction the jury would have been obliged to acquit the defendant, although convinced that the three persons jointly and together committed the offense. Such is not the law. The instruction was properly refused.

The defendant requested the following instruction: "Offers to prove certain alleged facts which have been made in your presence are not evidence, and you should not take the same into consideration, nor allow yourselves to be in any manner influenced thereby. [Neither should the jury consider testimony stricken out by the court.]" The court refused to give the part inclosed in brackets, but gave the rest. Both propositions are sound in law, and might well have been given by the court, yet we do not think any error was committed in the refusal thereof, for the reason that the same instruction in substance was by the court given elsewhere. Thus the court said: "The defendant is to be tried only on the evidence which is before the jury, and not on suspicions that may have been excited by questions of counsel, answers to which were not permitted." Again it is said: "The court deems it proper to admonish you that you are not to consider evidence which has been excluded by the court in determining any fact in the case." When the jury were told that the defendant is to be tried only on the evidence which is before the jury, they as sensible men must have understood that evidence stricken out was not before the jury, and evidence excluded may fairly be said to include evidence stricken out.

The court read to the jury as a part of its instructions section 484, Pen. Code, defining larceny, and a portion of section 487, as follows: "Grand larceny is larceny committed in either of the following cases: (1) Where the property taken is of the value exceeding $50.00"—and, continuing, instructed the jury as to larceny committed by fraud, trick, or device. Counsel for the defendant treats this as one instruction, and objects to the first part, for the reason that the court read a portion only of section 487. In answer to this it is sufficient to say that the court read all of the section that was in any way pertinent to the charge made in the information. There was no charge in the information of a larceny from the person, neither was there a charge of larceny of any article or animal mentioned in subdivision 3 of section 487. It was, therefore, quite unnecessary to read subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 487.

As to the remaining portion of the instruction as to larceny by trick and device, it is not contended that it is not correct as an abstract proposition of law, but that it is suggestive and argumentative, not predicated on any evidence in the case, and not responsive to the theory of the prosecution. In Blashfield on Instructions to Juries, it is said: "Instructions to the jury should be applicable to and limited to the evidence adduced in the cause. It is erroneous to give instructions based on a state of facts which there is no evidence tending to prove, or which the undisputed evidence shows does not exist, and it makes no difference that such instructions contain correct statements of the law." Section 86, citing many cases. Again, in section 91, the same writer says: "The giving of an instruction not supported by the evidence is sufficient ground for reversal, where it appears that such instruction misled, or might have misled, the jury, to the prejudice of the party complaining. Where the instructions as a whole are abstract and inapplicable to the facts in issue, the judgment will be reversed. If an instruction submits an issue not warranted by the evidence, or is based on facts not in evidence, or is so worded as to lead the jury to infer the existence of a state of facts entirely at variance with the evidence, the error will almost invariably be considered ground for reversal"—citing many cases. In Clark v. State, 32 Neb. 246, 49 N. W. 367, it was held reversible error to instruct the jury that if defendant formed a conspiracy to commit the crime, and became intoxicated to nerve himself to commit it, his intoxication would be no excuse; there being no evidence that he became intoxicated for such purpose, although there was evidence that he was intoxicated at the time of committing the alleged crime. In People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378, it is said: "In some cases an inapplicable instruction can do no harm, but when it is liable to mislead a jury, to the prejudice of one of the parties, it becomes as grave an error as though it were not correct as an abstract proposition of law." The trial court had read to the jury section 485, Pen. Code, relating to larceny of lost and found property. There was no evidence of the finding of any lost property, and the giving of the instruction was held to be reversible error. In People v. Sanchez, 24 Cal. 28, it was said: "No instruction should be given to a jury which is not predicated upon some theory logically deducible from at least some portion of the testimony. Such instructions are only calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and ought not to be given."

In the case now under consideration the court gave a lengthy instruction of about six folios on the subject of larceny by trick and device, correct in the abstract, but, it is contended, not predicated on the evidence in the case. It therefore becomes necessary to examine the evidence on this point. Perry, the prosecuting witness, testified that he was standing on the corner of Fourth and Market streets, San Francisco, on March 20th, when he was addressed by defendant, who asked Perry where he was from. Finding that Perry was from Los Angeles and a stranger in San Francisco, defendant represented that he also was a stranger to the city. The two agreed to visit the Park and Cliff House together, but first the defendant induced Perry to go with him to 1344 Market street by the representation that he was a mining man, and had some specimens of ore that he wished to have assayed by a friend who had an office at that place. On getting to 1344 Market street Perry was, after some objection, induced to go into the building, and after some hunting they found the proper room, and there found that the assayer was not in, but did find two persons, claimed to be strangers, who had apparently been playing cards. They invited Perry and defendant to join the game. Defendant did, but Perry, though urged by defendant, refused. On the first game defendant appeared to win, and on the second game bet what change he had, and then asked Perry for a loan of $20. Perry refused, whereupon defendant took from his pocket a paper which he represented to be a check on a Denver bank, and showed it to the other parties playing the game. One of them said to Perry: "It is all right. Let your friend have the money. This check is all right." Perry refused, whereupon one of the parties, called "the Doctor," got up and locked the door, and put the key in his pocket, saying, in effect, that he did so for fear his wife might call and catch him gambling. Defendant then again demanded the money, whereupon Perry said, "I suppose I am a victim, and I will have to give you the money," and took off his belt, in which he carried his money, and gave defendant $20. On repeated demands Perry gave to defendant altogether $80, $20 at a time, all of which was bet by defendant on his hand, and on a call of hands was lost to one of the other players. The players then disbanded and left the premises. From all the circumstances in evidence it is certain that the three card players were confederates. On the question of how and why he parted with his money Perry testified as follows: "So far as the game of cards was concerned, I was not connected with the game, or in any manner involved in the game, as I was not a player or participant, and made no bet. I lost no money by betting. * * * I did not part with any of this money on the strength of that check. That had nothing to do with the parting of any of my money. This proposition of mines, and ore and rock —that had nothing to do with my parting with any of my money. And nobody suggested my parting with any money on account of any mines or mining stock. I parted with $80." On redirect examination by the district attorney he gave testimony as follows: "I have said the defendant asked me to lend him the money. In response to that question I did not give him any money when he asked me to lend it to him. When I gave the money to him he said: 'Let me have the money.' That was immediately after the door was locked. I did not let him have any money for the purpose of having him play a game. Q. You yourself took no part in the game at all, and loaned him no money for the purpose of betting? That is correct, is it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why did you hand over—take off your belt and hand over—$80, $20 at a time, and four different times, making $80 in all? Why did you do that—hand that money to the defendant? A. Because they made their demand repeatedly for the money, and I felt that they would take the money if I did not give it over willingly. I thought they would force me to give them the money; did not know whether they would knock me in the head or shoot me, but felt that they would take the money by force; and I gave up the money rather than take chances of being injured in any way. Q. Did you part voluntarily or willingly with any of your money? A. I did not. Q. I understood you to say you feared. What kind of fear was it you had—of what? A. There were three men in the room, and I did not know whether they would knock me in the head, or shoot me, or what. I was just afraid they would overpower me in some way, and take the money. I mean of personal injury. I did not have any weapon of any kind or character on me." The witness on his direct examination gave evidence of conduct and demeanor of the three card players tending to cause him to fear an intention, perhaps, to use force to get the money.

From the foregoing statements of the prosecuting witness it will be seen that he completely eliminated from the case any possible grounds for the theory that he parted with his money through any fraud, trick, or device. Yet the court in the instruction complained of fully submitted to the jury the issue as to whether the possession of the money had been parted with as the result of fraud, trick, and device. Other than the reading of section 484, Pen. Code, defining larceny in general terms, no other explanation of what constitutes larceny was given. By the instructions of the court stress was laid almost entirely on the issue of larceny by fraud, trick, and device. While we recognize that it is not every case of giving an instruction not pertinent to the evidence that will result in the reversal of a judgment, we are of the opinion that the giving of the instruction under discussion under the circumstances of this case was prejudicial error. The fact that there was evidence in the case tending to show an unsuccessful attempt to obtain the money by fraud, trick, and device made it all the more probable that the jury was misled and confused, to the prejudice of the defendant, by the giving of this instruction.

It is claimed that the court erred in allowing proof of the forfeiture of the defendant's bail bond, "owing to the unlawful absence of the defendant," but this evidence was by the court ordered stricken out.

The objection to the question put by the district attorney, "Do you understand if a man came to you on the street, and put a pistol to your head, and you handed out the money, that the money belonged to him?" should have been sustained, but the error is too unimportant to, of itself, require a reversal.

As the order and judgment must be reversed for the error in giving the instruction last herein discussed, it is not necessary to determine whether or not the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, P. J.; COOPER, J.

1 Cal. App. 546

LE TOURNEUX v. GILLISS et al.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 8, 1905.)

1. CONTRACTS—LEGALITY OF CONSIDERATION—NOTE FOR MONEY ADVANCED FOR LOBBYING.

"Lobbying," which has a well-defined meaning, and signifies to address or solicit members of a legislative body for the purpose of influencing their votes, is contrary to public policy, whether or not it is carried on in such manner as to constitute a crime under the statute; and a note given for money advanced for the expenses of a person to enable him to engage in the business of lobbying will not be enforced.

2. BILLS AND NOTES—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

When the consideration for a note is shown to have been illegal, the burden is cast upon a transferee, suing thereon, to show that he is a holder in good faith and for value.

3. NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE AT TRIAL.

The fact that the attorney for a plaintiff failed to introduce evidence in rebuttal on a material issue of fact created by defendants' evidence, in reliance upon the erroneous belief that the burden of proof on such issue rested on the defendant, does not make a case of surprise which will entitle him to a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 186.]

4. APPEAL—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

The making of an order granting a new trial without a legal reason therefor is an abuse of discretion, which warrants a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 3, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, § 4538½.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

COOPER, J. This action was brought to recover upon a promissory note for $500, made by defendants Wilson and Gilliss to Thomas Eager, the father and assignor of plaintiff. The note was executed for money to be advanced by Eager to Gilliss. Defendant Wilson received no consideration for signing the note, but signed at the request of Eager and as surety for Gilliss. Wilson alleged as a defense that the consideration for the note was a lobbying contract, which was illegal, against public policy, and void. The court found in favor of Wilson on such affirmative defense. Thereafter plaintiff proposed a statement on motion for a new trial, which was allowed and settled by Hon. Edward A. Belcher, the judge who tried the case. The motion came on for hearing before Hon. Thomas F. Graham, the term of the judge who tried the case having expired, and was granted. From the order granting a new trial, this appeal is taken.

It is contended in support of the action of the court in granting the motion that the evidence was not sufficient to support the findings and judgment, and that for this reason, if for no other, the order is correct. This leads us, necessarily, into an examination as to whether or not the consideration for the note was illegal and against public policy. The answer alleges that under the laws of this state a regular session of the Legislature was held in the city of Sacramento commencing on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1897; that prior to the commencement of the session, in the month of December, 1896, defendant Gilliss requested Eager to advance and loan to him sufficient moneys to enable him to go to Sacramento and there to remain during the coming session of the Legislature and carry on the business or lobbying and soliciting the votes of members of the Legislature for or against such bills or legislative measures as might affect the interests of said Gilliss or those by whom he should be employed; that such occupation or business of lobbying consisted in influencing or seeking to influence by secret or corrupt means the votes of the several members of the Legislature in connection with or concerning such bills or legislative measures as might come before said Legislature for passage or action and as the said Gillis or those by whom he might be employed should be interested in; that in consideration of these matters, and for the sole purpose of enabling the said Gilliss to go to Sacramento and carry on the said business of lobbying during the said session of the Legislature, Eager agreed to advance and loan to Gilliss the necessary funds, upon the said Gilliss executing the note in controversy, with defendant Wilson as surety thereon; that on the said agreement and understanding, and solely for the purpose of enabling said Gilliss to get said money for the purpose of lobbying, the said note was signed by defendant Wilson, all of which was known by said Eager; that both Gilliss and said Eager attended the said session of the Legislature, and engaged in the business of lobbying during the session, and co-operated together and shared the profits of such business. The evidence in support of the allegations of the answer is found principally in the deposition of defendant Wilson, and is without conflict. It shows in substance that Eager and Gilliss came to defendant Wilson and stated that they wanted to go to Sacramento and engage in the lobbying business, that Gilliss was without money, and that Eager would furnish the money if Wilson would sign the note. The money was to be expended for Gilliss' expenses in lobbying. Eager said that Gilliss had had a great deal of experience, and that the two would make a strong team in Sacramento. He told Wilson that the money was to be used for the purpose of paying the expenses of lobbying at Sacramento, and that he would advance the money to Gilliss for such purpose. Wilson said that by lobbying they meant influencing the Legislature to vote for a bill or against it in any way that the vote of the legislator could be reached, and that it was distinctly understood that the money to be advanced on the note was to be used only for the purpose of lobbying. The witness Rogers testified: That he saw Gilliss at Sacramento when the Legislature met, and that he stayed with witness and Eager off and on until the Legislature adjourned. That "Gilliss and Eager were working together. They were up there lobbying for different measures, doing work for anybody they could get it to do for. I think they together had some work for the railroad company there." The witness further testified that they (Eager and Gilliss) asked him to help them with the "scalpers' bill," and that "Gilliss' business there was well known to everybody, for he was there to look after the affairs of the railroad company, and Mr. Stowe sent him up there, which is a fact, to attend to any business of the railroad company before the Legislature." The witness Wilcox testified that Eager wanted him (the witness) to introduce Eager to members of the Legislature, and that he introduced both Eager and Gilliss to various members; that they (Eager and Gilliss) agreed to pay witness for his services in introducing them to the friends and members, and for his conversation favorable to the bill they had up; and that they did make him two small payments at the Lick House, in San Francisco, after the session closed.

Counsel for respondent contends that lobbying may be lawful, legal, and honorable, provided secret and corrupt means are not resorted to, and that the evidence does not show that any member of the Legislature was approached by secret or corrupt means. Our Constitution provides (section 35, art. 4): "Any person who seeks to influence the vote of a member of the Legislature by bribery, promise of reward, intimidation or other dishonest means shall be guilty of lobbying, which is hereby declared a felony." And section 89 of the Penal Code provides: "Every person who obtains or seeks to obtain money or other thing of value from another person upon a pretense, claim, or representation that he can or will improperly influence in any manner the action of any member of a legislative body in regard to any vote or legislative matter is guilty of a felony." We cannot adopt the views of counsel for respondent as to the word "lobbying" being used in a "good sense." The term "lobbying" has a well-defined meaning in this country, and signifies to address or solicit members of a legislative body, in the lobby or elsewhere, with the purpose of influencing their votes. Black's Law Dic.; County of Colusa v. Welch, 122 Cal. 431, 55 Pac. 243. It makes no difference that the contract did not provide for acts to be done within the prohibition of the Constitution. It was the object and purpose of the parties in giving the note to provide means to enable Gilliss to engage in the business of lobbying. He would not be presumed to engage in the business without compensation from the parties desiring his services. It is not the policy of the law that the members of the Legislature should be subjected to the personal solicitation, during the session, of experienced and paid lobbyists. Men who are paid to influence legislation, and who become acquainted with and cultivate the friendship of members through dinners, wines, cigars, and personal attention, are certainly not assisting the state in procuring good legislation. If such men escape public prosecution, it is no reason that the time of the courts should be taken up in aiding and assisting them in relation to their nefarious business. Courts will not permit themselves to be used for the purpose of aiding or enforcing such contracts. If such persons escape punishment through a public prosecution, they may consider themselves fortunate.

In the early case of Martin v. Wade, 37 Cal. 168, it was held that a promissory note given for moneys loaned to the promisor for the purpose of enabling him to pay the expenses of securing his election to a public office is void, because the consideration was against public policy. The court quoted the language of Mr. Chief Justice Wilmot in Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wilson, 341: "You shall not stipulate for iniquity. All writers upon our law agree in this: No polluted hand shall touch the pure fountains of justice. Whoever is a party to an unlawful contract, if he hath once paid the money stipulated to be paid in pursuance thereof, he shall not have the help of a court to fetch it back again. You shall not have a right of action where you come into court of justice in this unclean manner to recover it back." In County of Colusa v. Welch, 122 Cal. 428, 55 Pac. 243, it was held that the board of supervisors of a county had no authority to employ special counsel for the purpose of influencing members of the Legislature with respect to pending legislation affecting the interests of the county. The court said: "The statute making certain lobby practices criminal does not by implication legalize others not within the purview of the criminal law, which are void as against public policy. * * * The language of the complaint is, as before stated, as follows: That, if the sum of $1,000 'was agreed to be paid to said Sprague, it was to secure, by means of personal solicitation, and by means of private interviews with members of the Legislature of California, and by means of lobbying, the defeat of said senate bill.' These allegations bring the case within the rule enunciated by Cooley as being void. The term 'lobbying' has a well-defined meaning in this country, and signifies to address or solicit members of a legislative body, in the lobby or elsewhere, for the purpose of influencing their votes." In Ball v. Putnam, 123 Cal. 134, 55 Pac. 773, the action was upon a promissory note. It appeared that the note had been given for money to be used in connection with the division of Colusa county and the creation of Glenn county therefrom. While the case was reversed for erroneous ruling, the court said: "There is evidence in the record tending to show that the contract which lay at the bottom of all the transactions between these parties was a contract void as against public policy. Not enough appears to justify this court in saying that such is the fact, but enough appears to call for rigid inquiry by the trial judge, and if, after such inquiry, the evidence elicited leads him to believe that such is the fact, he will withhold all relief in this action; for a contract which is against public policy, good morals, or the express mandate of the law cannot be made the basis of any action, legal or equitable. Neither the silence nor the consent of the parties to it justifies the court in retaining jurisdiction of such action." It is unnecessary to further discuss the authorities, but the following are a few of the many that sustain the proposition: Dunham v. Hastings Pavement Co. (Sup.) 67 N. Y. Supp. 632; Tool Co. v. Norris, 69 U. S. 45, 17 L. Ed. 868; Sweeney v. McLeod, 15 Or. 330, 15 Pac. 275; Kansas Pacific Ry. Co. v. McCoy, 8 Kan. 538; Chippewa V. & S. Ry. Co. v. Chicago, St. Paul & O. Ry. Co., 75 Wis. 224 44 N. W. 17, 6 L. R. A. 601; McDonald v Buckstaff (Neb.) 76 N. W. 476; Rose v. Truax 21 Barb. 361; Powers v. Skinner, 34 Vt. 274 80 Am. Dec. 677.

The defendant Wilson having proven that the consideration for the note was illegal, the law immediately presumed that the plaintiff stood in the shoes of Eager, and the burden of proving that she was a holder in good faith and for value was then cast upon her. Daniel on Neg. Inst. (4th Ed.) § 769a, p. 766; Fuller v. Hutchings, 10 Cal. 523, 70 Am. Dec. 746; Graham v. Larimer, 83 Cal. 173, 23 Pac. 286; Jordan v. Grover, 99 Cal. 194, 33 Pac. 889. It is therefore evident that the defendant Wilson introduced ample evidence to support the judgment in his behalf.

Respondent contends that the court was justified in granting the motion for a new trial on the ground of surprise. We have carefully read the affidavits, and our opinion is that no such surprise is shown as would in law justify the order. The surprise, as stated by counsel in his brief, is: "On the trial of facts in the lower court the judge [Belcher] and counsel led us to believe that, unless defendant Wilson assumed the burden and proved affirmatively that plaintiff knew the facts of the defense of bad consideration, the judgment would be entered in favor of plaintiff for the amount due on her note, and thus stopped plaintiff from introducing her depositions on file, by which she could prove her innocence, provided the law required her to assume such a burden. Judge Graham holds such a course of fooling an attorney warrants the granting of a new trial." It appears from the record that, when defendant's counsel was introducing evidence to prove that Eager and Gilliss were engaged in lobbying in Sacramento, plaintiff's counsel stated that he would object to the evidence as immaterial, unless the defendant could prove affirmatively that plaintiff knew of it. The judge remarked that the objection would be good, unless plaintiff was connected with it. Thereupon plaintiff's counsel said, "Does counsel promise that my client knew of this that the witness is testifying?" Counsel for defendant replied, "We expect to show that to a certain extent." Counsel for plaintiff replied, "On that promise, all right." Counsel for Wilson replied, "If it is necessary for us to prove that, we will prove it." The judge remarked that the testimony would "have no materiality unless there is a connection made." Then, after the testimony on behalf of Wilson was closed, the following proceedings took place: "Counsel for Plaintiff: Where is your testimony that you promised the court that my client knew all about it? Counsel for Defendant: I rest. Counsel for Plaintiff: I submit counsel has not kept his promise. I move to strike out the testimony of Wilcox and Rogers on the ground that this testimony was let in on the promise to the court that he would supply the proof connecting the plaintiff with the testimony, showing that she knew the facts. Counsel for Defendant: I desire to be heard on that. That is the very point. The Court: Counsel desires to be heard on that. Have you any further rebuttal testimony? Counsel for Plaintiff: I move to strike out the testimony of these two witnesses. There are two depositions, being plaintiff's and Mr. Eager's, on file not read. I move to strike out the testimony of Mr. Wilcox and Mr. Rogers. The Court: I understand that— Counsel for Plaintiff (interrupting): I want a decision on that. The Court: That will be taken under advisement. Counsel for Defendant: I don't want to be heard in the matter till we close the case. Counsel for Plaintiff: The authorities I have— The Court (interrupting): I would like to have you produce the matter in writing. Are the proofs in? Counsel for Plaintiff: I would like a decision on this motion before I determine whether I read the depositions or not. I think your honor will rule with me. The Court: If I pass on the matter now, I will deny the motion. I will pass on it now and deny it. Counsel for Plaintiff: Take an exception. I will rest my case. The depositions show she bought this note for value. Counsel for Defendant: Do you rest? Counsel for Plaintiff: Yes, sir."

The above does not show that counsel was surprised, or lulled into a belief that a certain thing existed by which he was deceived. Counsel for defendant introduced sufficient evidence to shift the burden upon plaintiff to show that she was a holder of the note in good faith without notice. He had not promised to introduce more. The court ruled against plaintiff on the motion to strike out. Not only this, but plaintiff's counsel was asked, both by the court and the defendant's attorney, if the proofs were in and if he rested. He was not deceived as to any fact, or as to the rulings made. He evidently entertained the view, and acted upon it, that the defendant had to prove that plaintiff had knowledge of the consideration for the note, and that such consideration was illegal. He was mistaken in this view of the law, but that was no ground for relief after the case had been finally submitted and decided. No doubt, if he had asked within a reasonable time after the submission to have such submission set aside upon terms, and had made a proper showing, the trial judge would have relieved him. But in the trial of cases counsel deal at swords' length. Each one relies upon his own knowledge of the law, and the evidence which he deems essential. If, after a case had been submitted and decided, the losing party could have the judgment set aside because he acted upon an erronous view of the law, there would be no end to litigation. There have been times, no doubt, in the experience of every lawyer, when he would have liked to have been relieved of a situation brought about by his failure to do the proper thing at the proper time. But after judgment it is too late for relief on such ground. Fuller v. Hutchings, 10 Cal. 523, 70 Am. Dec. 746; Santa Cruz R. P. Co. v. Bowie, 104 Cal. 287, 37 Pac. 934.

In the above discussion we have considered the affidavits, without passing upon the objection that they are not properly authenticated. It was not prejudical error to allow the witness Wilcox to testify to the effect that Eager told him, while in Sacramento, that he was engaged in the business of lobbying. Declarations of Eager would be admissible against himself, and we cannot say they would not be admissible as against plaintiff, if plaintiff is conceded to have known the illegality of the consideration and the purposes for which the note was given. Not only this, but the witness testified elsewhere without objection that he saw Eager and Gilliss almost every day talking to members, entertaining them with drinks, cigars, and dinners; that they employed witness in connection with the "scalpers' bill." His language is: "I was employed, first, to introduce them to all the members I knew, and, secondly, to 'feel' all the members how they stood on the proposition, whether for or against it, and whether they could be 'persuaded' or not." It thus appears, without the declarations of Eager, that he was at Sacramento engaged in lobbying. The material question was as to the consideration for which the note was given. Concerning this there is no conflict. As to whether the parties carried out their agreement to conduct a lobbying business or not is not very material.

We have not overlooked the fact that all presumptions are in favor of the order made by the trial court; that, if it can be affirmed here upon any statutory ground included in the notice and properly in the record, it will be done; and that it must appear that the court abused its discretion in making the order. But, where the court grants a new trial without any legal reason for so doing, its discretion has been abused.

The order is reversed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 13, 1905.)

Appeal—Findings—Conflicting Evidence—Review.

Findings of the trial court on a question of fact, based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Albion Lumber Company against the California Bridge & Construction Company and others. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

W. Lair Hill, for appellants. Albert H. Elliot and Edward H. Stearns, for respondent.

HALL, J. Appeal from order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The motion was made on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify certain findings. The labor of the court in this case is very greatly reduced by the frank admission on the part of the counsel for appellant that upon all points save one there was a substantial conflict of testimony. The suit is to recover a balance of $486.04 alleged to be unpaid upon an account for lumber furnished defendant by plaintiff for certain work done by defendant at San Rafael. The defendant claims that the court should have allowed defendant a credit for $183.92, loss upon certain piles furnished defendant by plaintiff, through one Pierce, for a job done by defendant near Fresno.

Upon this point the testimony of A. W. Burrell was to the effect that plaintiff agreed to furnish for the Fresno job, among other things, piles; that before the piles were shipped defendant was to have been notified, so that the piles might be inspected at San Francisco; that defendant was so notified, save as to two car loads, 24 piles in number, and that after the shipment of these two car loads, and before delivery at Sanger (a point near Fresno), it was discovered that they were not according to the description of piles which were to be furnished, and thereupon he notified McIntyre (the representative of the plaintiff) and asked to have the piles returned and suitable piles put in their place; that McIntyre said it would not pay to ship them back there (San Francisco), and directed him to sell them to the best advantage he could, or make such use of them as the company could make, and the Albion Lumber Company would "stand the loss." The witness further testified as to what he did do with the piles in question, and to the effect that it resulted in a loss of $183.92. On this point, however, the testimony of McIntyre, who represented the plaintiff, is set forth as follows: "The lumber and piles sold to Pierce [referring to the lumber and piles furnished defendant for the Fresno job] were all shipped as ordered, and were all inspected in San Francisco before being shipped, and were all of the character ordered, and no objection was ever made thereto. The witness denied that he ever directed Mr. Burrell to sell or use any defective piles, or ever stated that the Albion Lumber Company would stand any loss for defective piles, and denied that A. W. Burrell, or the California Bridge & Construction Company, or C. C. Pierce ever made any claim for defective piles." There is thus a direct conflict between the testimony of Burrell and McIntyre upon the question at issue. We cannot interfere with the decision of the trial court upon a question of fact, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1905.)

1. Contracts — Construction — Implied Agreements.

Where there is no provision in a building contract as to how windows are to be placed, there is an implied agreement that they shall be placed in a workmanlike manner.

2. Same — Performance — Defects — Right to Compensation.

Where a contractor fails to complete his contract, even though such failure is a trivial variance, he must have acted in good faith and honestly have endeavored to complete his work properly before he can recover therefor, if the trivial variance is such as to entitle the other party to damages to complete the work or make it as it should be.

3. Mechanics' Liens — Enforcement — Appeal—Disposition of Cause — Modification of Judgment.

Where, in a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien, the lower court found that defendants owed plaintiff a certain sum and awarded him a lien therefor, and defendants found no fault with the amount awarded plaintiff, but appealed on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled to a lien, and all the evidence and proceedings had on the trial were brought before the appellate court for review, that court, on setting aside the judgment for error in giving plaintiff a lien, would not remand the case for a new trial, but would direct the lower court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the provisions for a lien and to enter a personal judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum found due.

On application for rehearing. Denied. For former opinion, see 82 Pac. 341.

BUCKLES, J. This application for rehearing in this case pretends to be based upon the ground that this court in the original opinion in the case, filed August 14, 1905 (82 Pac. 341), committed error in holding that the placing of two windows in the basement story of the house not immediately under the windows in the story above was unworkmanlike and was not satisfactory to defendants and was not a trivial imperfection. These windows constituted a part of the ornamentation of this little house, as well as of its constituent parts. Ornamentation is as much a matter of substance as any of the constituent parts, such as light and ventilation. The testimony in the case showed, and the court below found, "that the two windows placed by plaintiff in the front portion of the basement story of said house were not directly underneath the two front windows of the upper portion of said house, which upper portion consisted of the old house after the same had been raised, and that the placing of such windows in this manner was not workmanlike." The testimony supports the above finding; but this court found, further, "that the failure of plaintiff to place said windows in the basement in a direct line underneath the two windows of the upper portion of said house is a trivial imperfection." There is no evidence whatever to support this finding, and no inflexible rule of law commanding such deduction. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 511, 25 Pac. 686. The evidence is that, as soon as defendants noticed that the windows were not properly placed, the attention of the plaintiff was called to it. He was then and repeatedly thereafter requested to change the windows and place them immediately under the ones above, but he refused to do so. When told that another would be employed to change the positions of the windows and the cost thereof would be deducted from what was due plaintiff, he replied he could do better to go to court, as defendants would have to pay counsel fees and other expenses. The evidence shows the cost of changing the windows and placing them as they should be to exceed $10.

*Rehearing granted by Supreme Court January 15, 1906.

It is true there was no provision in the contract as to how these windows were to be placed, but there was impliedly in plaintiff's contract an agreement that his work should be done in a workmanlike manner, and these windows were not placed in a workmanlike manner, and the failure to place them properly seems to indicate a want of good faith. In a Pennsylvania case, decided in Gillespie Tool Co., 123 Pa. 26, 16 Atl. 37, it is said: "The equitable doctrine of substantial performance is intended for the protection and relief of those who have faithfully and honestly endeavored to perform their contracts in all material and substantial particulars, so that their right to compensation may not be forfeited by reason of mere technical, inadequate, or unimportant omissions or defects. It is incumbent on him who invokes its protection to present a case in which there has been no willful omission or departure from the terms of his contract." The spirit manifested by this plaintiff, when his attention was called to the unworkmanlike manner of setting the front windows, would indicate a willfulness, and not an honest endeavor to complete his work in a workmanlike manner. In Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 511, 25 Pac. 687, the court says: "If there has been no willful departure from its provisions, and no omission of any of its essential parts, and the contractor has in good faith performed all of its substantive terms, he will not be held to have forfeited his right to a recovery by reason of trivial defects or imperfections in the work performed. If the omission or imperfection is so slight that it cannot be regarded as an integral or substantive part of the original contract, and the other party can be compensated therefor by a recoupment for damages, the contractor does not lose his right of action"—citing numerous cases. That case was before the Supreme Court on the judgment roll alone, where the court was unable to view the evidence before the lower court, and the court said: "In the absence of the testimony upon this point, we are bound to assume that it was sufficient to support the finding that the plaintiffs substantially completed their contract, as also the finding that the defendants would be fully compensated for any imperfection in the work by deducting $5 from the contract price." But in the case at bar the testimony is before us, and we do not believe it supports the finding "that the failure of the plaintiff to place said windows in the basement in a direct line underneath the two windows of the upper portion of said house is a trivial imperfection"; that is, if such can be considered a finding of fact. In Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 307, 38 Pac. 742, the court said: "In such case there must be a substantial performance of every material covenant in the contract, and the failure must not have resulted from design or bad faith, and whether these facts exist is a matter to be determined by the jury, or the court sitting as a jury. Substantial performance must be found."

Carpenter v. Ibbetson, 81 Pac. 1114, cited by respondent, is a case where the contract price was $1,000 and to be paid before the work begun, and $900 was so paid. There was extra work amounting to $300. Payment was refused, and the contractor brought suit, alleging completion of the work, which was inside work. The answer denies the completion or performance of the contract and the amount due, and by way of cross-complaint specifies breaches of the contract. The lower court found the contract had not been completed and that the defendants were damaged in the sum of $382.52, which was the amount that plaintiff sued for. The appellate court held that this was not the true measure of damages, and that the case was one of substantial compliance with the contract, and also that the payment was to be made before the commencement of the work, and is to be regarded as an independent promise. Besides, there was no suggestion of a want of good faith on the part of the contractor, as in the case at bar. In the case of Van Clief et al. v. Van Vechten, 130 N. Y. 579, 29 N. E. 1019, cited by respondent, this language is used: "But when, as in this case, there is a willful refusal by the contractor to perform his contract, and he wholly abandons it, and after due notice refuses to have anything more to do with it, his right to recover depends upon performance of his contract, without any omission so substantial in its character as to call for an allowance of damages if he had acted in good faith. While slight and insignificant imperfections or deviations may be overlooked on the principle of 'de minimis non curat lex,' the contract in other respects must be performed according to its terms. When the refusal to proceed is willful, the difference between substantial and literal performance is bounded by the line of 'de minimis' "—citing a long list of cases. So, in the case at bar, the difference was such that it required the payment of damages, small though they were, to make the change of windows to make them conform to the implied contract that they would stand in the building in a workmanlike manner, and the plaintiff having abandoned the work, showing a willful disregard for his contract and entire want of good faith. It is deemed useless to cite further authorities, for there seems to be a remarkable uniformity in all the cases, holding that, where a contractor has failed to complete his contract, even though the failure is a trivial variance, he must have acted in good faith and honestly endeavored to complete his work properly, before he can recover, if the trivial variance is such as to entitle the defendant to damages to complete or make it as it should be. Good faith and honest intention are prerequisites before relaxing the rule of strict performance to substantial performance. It will be borne in mind this was a small dwelling, being but 16x32 feet, with but two windows in the front in each story, so that the misplacing of the windows in the basement story is not so small a matter, and these people, the defendants, are as much entitled to have the windows in their little home put in perfectly, and in a workmanlike manner, as the owner of a more imposing structure. The imperfections complained of, while generally they would be considered small, in this instance, to these people, became a matter of great importance. The evidence shows that, had the plaintiff acted in good faith, with an honest endeavor to do the right thing, he could have had his money without suit.

For the reasons stated the plaintiff is not entitled to a lien; and, as we see no reason for changing the views expressed in our former opinion, the same are adhered to. In that opinion we directed that a personal judgment be entered in favor of plaintiff for $326.85, being the amount found due him in the lower court. In his brief on rehearing plaintiff objects to this, on the ground that, if he is entitled to a personal judgment, he is entitled to a lien. That he is not entitled to a personal judgment any more than a lien is true, viewed as an abstract proposition of law. But all the evidence taken in the lower court, as well as all the proceedings had on the trial, are before us, and it is plain, under the views we have expressed and a review of the evidence, there is no reason for remanding the case for a new trial. Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 24, 56 Pac. 610. And possibly this court would have been justified in simply remanding the case for a new trial, even though nothing but delay and vexation to both sides could result from such a course. But in the case at bar the defendants stood ready to pay the balance due by deducting the amount which it would take to reset the windows, and tendered what was claimed by defendants to be due, and deposited the same in court, and at no time have defendants claimed they would not pay. It is true there was some difference as to extra work, but no material difference as to the cost of changing the windows, all of which was thoroughly gone into at the trial, and the lower court found defendants owed plaintiff the sum of $326.85. The defendants in their brief seem to be satisfied with the amount found due, and say that no good result could come to either litigant by sending the case back for a new trial. Quoting from defendants' brief: "The case appears to have been fully and exhaustively tried in the lower court upon its merits." Then it quotes the following rule: "Where the court can see from the record what the rights of the parties are, it will not remand the case, but will render such a decree as ought to have been rendered below"—and the close of said brief declares that substantial justice has been done between the parties. It appears, therefore, that any further litigation in this matter is for the sole purpose of attorney's fees for plaintiff and the costs of making and filing a lien, which plaintiff cannot recover upon, under the views here expressed.

Upon these considerations and in the interest of justice, it is therefore ordered that the lower court be directed to modify its said judgment by striking therefrom its decree declaring a lien on the premises and providing for a sale thereunder and costs of lien and attorney's fees, then enter a personal judgment against defendants and in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $326.85, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

BOHAN v. RECORD PUB. CO.

1. LIBEL—LIBELOUS ARTICLES.

A publication in a newspaper animadverting on the frequency of fires in plaintiff's building, stating that the proprietor of the building would be arrested if another fire was discovered, and that plaintiff's explanation of the fires was not satisfactory, was libelous per se.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Libel and Slander, §§ 29, 30.]

2. SAME—APPLICATION OF LIBEL TO PLAINTIFF.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 460, providing that in an action for libel it is not necessary to allege any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to plaintiff of the defamatory matter complained of, but it is sufficient to allege, and, if denied, to prove, that the same was published concerning plaintiff, a publication libeling the "B. Paint Company" was sufficiently shown to be a libel on plaintiff, where it was alleged and proven that it was published of plaintiff, who was the sole proprietor of the concern known as the "B Paint Company."

3. SAME—DAMAGES RECOVERABLE—RESTRICTION TO BUSINESS INJURED.

Where a libel of a business house is of such a character as to defame the proprietor or members of the firm of proprietors individually, the damages recoverable by the proprietor or members of the firm are not limited to those affecting the business.

4. SAME—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for libel, a charge that, if the jury should find that plaintiff had not suffered any damage to his reputation, the jury should find for defendant, was objectionable, when the publication was libelous per se, in that it was in opposition to the principle that damages must be presumed.

5. SAME—PRESUMPTION OF MALICE.

In an action for libel, a charge that if the libel was published without ill will, but in good faith and believing it was true, the jury should consider such matters in mitigation of damages, was erroneous, in view of the presumption of malice where the publication was libelous per se, and ill will appeared clearly upon its face.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—GOOD FAITH.

In an action for libel, where no exemplary damages are claimed, evidence that the publication was made without ill will and in good faith, believing in its truth, is inadmissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Edmund Bohan, doing business as the Bohan Paint Company, against the Record Publishing Company. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Jeff Paul Chandler, for appellant. B. H. Hunter, W. H. Morris, and Hunter & Summerfield, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The plaintiff, who was the sole proprietor, owner, and manager of the establishment known as the "Bohan Paint Company," sued the defendant for a libel published in its journal, the Los Angeles Record, and recovered a verdict and judgment for the sum of $500. The defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The libel complained of is as follows: "Another Fire will Cause Their Arrest. During the last 40 days there have been three mysterious fires in the rear of the Bohan Paint Company on Broadway, near Sixth, or in the alley very close thereto. Three times has the fire department responded to alarms in that neighborhood, and each time arrived just in time to prevent disastrous fires. A month ago Policeman Mike Holleran, while covering his beat early in the morning, noticed flames in the rear of the store occupied by the paint company. When he went into the rear of the place the flames were making rapid headway. and he summoned the fire department. There were a number of oil barrels in the rear of the yard, but the proprietor of the establishment denied that there was any oil in them. However, the fire would have been a disastrous one, had not Holleran acted promptly. Yesterday afternoon there was another fire in the rear of the paint shop. It burned some time, but the department again checked the flames. Many of the boxes and barrels, however, were burned. This morning the department was again summoned. A bonfire was burning in the rear yard of a hardwood frame factory next door, and the owners of that plant did not know how the fire started. When Capt. Lennon arrived, he noticed the ashes from another bonfire near the fence in the rear of the paint shop. This fire had undoubtedly burned out during the night. In explaining the fire of yesterday afternoon, the paint firm says that some oil-soaked sawdust was left in the rear yard, and that spontaneous combustion was the result. Assistant Chief O'Donnell and Secretary Robert Burns held a long consultation in the matter, and it was decided to arrest the proprietor of the firm if another fire is discovered in the rear of the place. Chief O'Donnell informed the paint people that they would be compelled to clear up the rear yard at once and remove all inflammable material. The paint company's explanation of the fires is not satisfactory."

It is argued by the appellant, among other points: That the above article is not libelous per se; that it does not charge the plaintiff personally with any crime, but refers to the firm of Bohan Paint Company only; and that damages cannot be recovered other than such as might result from injury to the business of the company. But these points are untenable. The publication, we think, is on its face libelous; and it is alleged and proven that it was published of the plaintiff, who was the sole proprietor of the concern known as the "Bohan Paint Company." Code Civ. Proc. § 460; Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 Pac. 290. Nor is there any principle upon which his claim for damages should be limited to those affecting his business. Civ. Code, §§ 3300-3333. Nor would the case be otherwise had there been more than one proprietor of the firm. In such case, the firm could not have recovered damages other than such as might have been sustained by them in their common business; but, if the libel were of a character to affect them personally, each of the firm could maintain his personal action. Schomberg v. Walker, supra.

It is also objected that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions of the appellant. But these, we think, were rightly refused. The first is to the effect that, if the jury should find from the evidence that the plaintiff had not suffered any damage to his reputation, fame, and credit, then, notwithstanding the proof of the libel and the failure of the defendant to justify, the jury should find for the defendant, which is opposed to the principle that damages must in such case be presumed. The second is to the effect that, if the jury should find from the evidence that the article was published by the defendant without any ill will toward the plaintiff, but in good faith and believing it was true, they should consider these matters in mitigation of damages. But, in the case of a publication libelous per se, ill will or malice is to be presumed, and in this case the ill will of the defendant appears clearly upon the face of the publication. Nor do we perceive any principle upon which, in a case where exemplary damages are not claimed, evidence of this character can be regarded as legitimate. The third and fourth instructions, the denial of which is complained of, are, in effect, that it was sufficient for the defendant, in justification, to prove so much of the article only as constituted the sting or substance of the charge; but there is no evidence in the record to justify this instruction.

Other errors complained of are sufficiently disposed of by what has been said as to the above. There are several objections to the admission and exclusion of testimony; but these are of no materiality, and do not require further consideration.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

In re McCARTHY'S ESTATE.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 24, 1905.)

1. Homestead — Allotment to Widow — Duty of Court.

Where premises, selected by deceased in his lifetime from community property as a homestead, do not exceed $5,000 in value at the time of their appraisal in probate proceedings, it is the imperative duty of the court to set them off to the widow on her petition.

2. Same — Appraisement — Ex Parte Proceedings.

Code Civ. Proc. art. 2, c. 5, §§ 1474–1486, provide for appointing appraisers in probate proceedings where there is a question of the value of the homestead. Section 1478 provides that when the report is filed the court must set a day, pursuant to notice, for hearing objections, and confirm or reject the report. Held, that where an appraisement was made, and objected to by a creditor, and witnesses were heard, and the matter was submitted to the court, it was error for the court, after ordering a reappraisement, to confirm the report on the reappraisement, and to set the premises apart as a homestead, without notice to the objecting creditor or affording her an opportunity to be heard, and to further refuse to hear a direct application by her to be heard.

3. Same—Evidence—Report of Appraisers.

Under Code Civ. Proc. art. 2, c. 5, §§ 1474–1486, providing for the appraisement of a homestead in probate proceedings when there is a question as to the value of the homestead and the hearing of objections to their report, an ex parte report of appraisers is not evidence of the value of the homestead in the hearing of the objections.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Patrick McCarthy, deceased. From an order setting apart a homestead to the widow, a creditor appeals. Reversed.

Wyckoff & Gardner, for appellant. James A. Hall, for respondent.

HALL, J. Appeal from order setting apart a homestead to the widow of deceased. The petition for the order states that the premises therein described were selected by deceased in his lifetime as a homestead from community property, and that the value of the same does not exceed $5,000, and is valued in the inventory at $5,000, and was of less value than $5,000, to wit, of the value of about $2,000, at the time of the selection of the same as a homestead. The appellant, a creditor of the estate, filed her written opposition to the petition, in which she alleged, among other things, that the value of the premises sought to be set apart as a homestead is greatly in excess of $5,000, to wit, $9,000 or thereabouts, and that its value at the time of selection exceeded $5,000, and was $5,500. It is admitted that the estate will be insolvent and there will be no money to pay appellant's claim, if the premises are finally set apart as a homestead.

If the premises did not exceed in value the sum of $5,000 at the time they were appraised in the probate proceedings, it was the imperative duty of the court to make the order setting them off to the petitioner. The main issue upon which the matter was tried in the lower court was as to the value of the premises. Many witnesses were called and examined, and thereupon the matter was submitted. The judge afterwards filed an order in writing, in which it is stated: "The evidence here shows that the property in question is of greater value than $5,000, and that the two claims presented are just debts against the estate, and that the same should be paid before an order is granted placing the property beyond the reach of said creditors." The judge further stated in the order that it was his "opinion that our statute does not authorize the superior court of this state to set apart a homestead of greater value than $5,000, when the making of such an order would defeat the collection of just claims of creditors. Under the facts as developed by the evidence, the court will defer action on said petition until another inventory is made and filed herein, when such further action will be taken as may appear legal and just to all parties concerned." The above order was made November 4, 1903, and, of course, did not decide the contest before the court. Two days after the above order was made, without notice to appellant, the court appointed three appraisers to appraise the homestead premises. The appraisers so appointed afterwards returned an apraisement, in which they valued the property at $5,000, and fixed the value at the time of its selection at $2,000. The court thereafter, without notice to appellant and without setting any time for hearing the report of the appraisers, made an order setting apart the premises as a homestead. The appellant afterwards made a motion to set aside the order so made, and asked that a day be set for the further hearing of the application, at which all parties interested should have notice and an opportunity to be heard. In support of the motion so made the appellant filed affidavits stating "that said new inventory and appraisement was never offered or received in evidence at the hearing of said matter, or at any adjournment thereof, or at any time, or at all, when said creditors or their attorneys had an opportunity to be heard thereon; that no notice was ever given to said creditors or their attorneys of said last-mentioned application of said attorney of said petitioner for the setting-off of said homestead." The affidavits further stated that the value of the premises so set apart was greatly in excess of $5,000, "as appears by the testimony of the witnesses at said former hearing, and as appears by the findings of the court in its order made after said hearing." The court denied said motion of appellant and refused to reopen said matter. Afterwards, on the 11th day of January, 1904, the court made and filed findings, in which it is found, "that on or about the 16th day of November, 1903, this court ordered a reappraisement of said property, and duly appointed appraisers in that behalf, and that on or about the 24th day of November, 1903, said appraisement was duly returned to this court, and was a unanimous report of three appraisers so appointed, and said appraisers did value and appraise said real property at the time said appraisement was made to be the sum of $5,000; and they did further find, ascertain, and appraise the value of said real property at the time the same was selected as a homestead, as aforesaid, to be the sum of $2,000." The court further found "that said property is not now and never has been of the value of more than $5,000," and also found that at the time of its selection it was of the value of $2,000.

It was error for the court to appoint appraisers, and receive the evidence contained in the appraisement made by them, without the knowledge or consent of appellant, after the investigation had been closed. The court had no more right to do this than it would have had to hear the evidence of three new witnesses in the absence of appellant and her counsel after the case was closed. The first appraisement valued the property at $5,000. The very object of the contest made by appellant was to have the value of the property determined in court from the testimony of witnesses who were subject to cross-examination. After such witnesses had been produced, and the court was convinced that the value of the property exceeded $5,000, and the matter submitted, it was a submission as to all parties. To hear the application for new appraisers, and to appoint them, and receive and act upon their report, was taking more testimony on one side only. The Code of Civil Procedure provides, under article 2, c. 5, §§ 1474–1486, for appointing appraisers in certain cases where there is a question as to the value of the homestead. In such case, when the report is filed, "the court must set a day for hearing any objections thereto from anyone interested in the estate. Notice of the hearing must be given for such time, and in such manner, as the court may direct. If the court be satisfied that the report is correct it must be confirmed, otherwise rejected." Section 1478. If it be conceded that the court had the right to order a reappraisement of the homestead, under section 1478, Code Civ. Proc., it must be admitted that under the same section the court should set a day for hearing any objections to the report made by the new appraisers, and cause notice thereof to be given. The court not only did not set a day for hearing any objections to the report, but refused to hear the appellant upon her direct application to be heard. This, we think, was error.

It is urged that the court found that the value of the property at the time of filing the declaration of homestead was $2,000, and that this finding justified the order setting it apart. It is sufficient to say that such finding is based entirely on the report of the appraisers appointed after the matter was tried, and, as before said, such ex parte report is not evidence. The only evidence taken on the hearing of the petition and objections thereto as to the value of the premises at the time of its selection as a homestead was that of one witness, who testified that the property was worth $75 or $80 per acre. There were 41 acres in the premises. It may be fairly supposed that the witness, in giving the value as so much per acre, referred to the land only, and did not include the improvements, especially as another witness put the value of the improvements at $2,000. We would thus have the reappraisement as the only evidence tending to show that the premises when selected as a homestead were worth less than $5,000. Not only this, but the testimony in the case, and the order made by the court after the case was submitted, show that the theory of the petitioner was that the property did not exceed in value $5,000 at the time of the hearing. We do not intimate that it would make any difference in the result if the value at the time of filing the declaration were conceded to be $2,000. It is not necessary to decide that question on this appeal.

The order is reversed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS — ESTOPPEL.

A city, under its charter, providing that no contract for expenditure of more than $100 shall be effective, unless authorized by a vote of the trustees, is not liable, on the ground of estoppel or an implied contract, where brick are bought by a single trustee for it for construction of a wall, and are used therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by W. A Fountain against the city of Sacramento. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

White & Miller, for appellant. H. W. Johnson and A. A. De Ligne, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is for the value of 44,000 bricks alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff, of the value of $440. A claim was presented to defendant by plaintiff, after the bricks had been used by defendant, demanding payment, which set forth the wrongful taking from plaintiff, and conversion by defendant of the said bricks. This claim was rejected, and thereupon plaintiff brought the action. The court found that plaintiff, at the request of C. W. Paine, one of the trustees of defendant, delivered a lot of bricks at the city cemetery, which this trustee told him were to be used in building a wall around a portion of said cemetery, and that from the representations made to him by the trustee at the time plaintiff understood that the bricks were being sold by plaintiff to defendant, and that defendant would pay for them; that there were 53,000 bricks, worth $10 per 1,000, and that plaintiff presented a claim for 9,000, and this claim was allowed and paid; that the bricks unpaid for were actually used by defendant in constructing said wall, and still remain there; that "no express contract was made between plaintiff and defendant, nor did the board of trustees of defendant take any action whatever, in relation to ordering the bricks, or in the nature of calling for bids, accepting of a bid, or letting of a contract for the purchase of the bricks." The court found, as conclusions of law, that defendant is not liable on an implied contract, or in assumpsit, but, if liable at all, is liable only for the conversion of the bricks, and that plaintiff has therefore mistaken his remedy. Judgment passed for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone.

It has been frequently decided by the Supreme Court of this state that, where personal property has been wrongfully taken and converted, the owner has his election to sue in tort for the conversion, or he may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit on an implied contract to pay the reasonable value of such property. Fratt v. Clark, 12 Cal. 89; Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380; De La Guerra v. Newhall, 55 Cal. 20; Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 25 Pac. 161; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 Pac. 626; Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 565, 27 Pac. 924, 25 Am. St. Rep. 219. See, also, Pomeroy's Remedies and Remedial Rights, §§ 568–571. In Roberts v. Evans the action was to recover the value of certain personal property alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, and proof of the wrongful taking was held sufficient to sustain assumpsit for its value. In De La Guerra v. Newhall the complaint alleged an express promise, and evidence of the wrongful taking of the property under an implied promise was held sufficient, and that proof of an express promise to pay was unnecessary.

The court erred in its conclusion that plaintiff could not recover, for the sole reason that he had chosen the wrong form of action. If, however, the judgment can be sustained on any ground, it is our duty to affirm it. The charter of the defendant city provides that "no contract for the payment of more than $100 shall be effective unless authorized by a vote of the board of trustees," of whom there are nine. The charter directs as to the course to be taken when a contract is so authorized. The mayor must approve or disapprove. If he disapprove, the trustees must proceed to consider and vote on the contract, and on the affirmative vote of six it shall become a valid contract, the same as if signed by the mayor, and not otherwise. Charter, § 23 (St. 1893, p. 551, c. 7, art. 2), and subdivision 22, § 25 (Id. p. 553), confers the power on the board to make appropriations for certain purposes, and also to make contracts "for the use and benefit of the city," in all cases specifying the fund out of which payment is to be made; and it is provided that, "should the board, or a majority thereof, contract or create any debt against the city contrary to the provisions of this charter, such debt, claim or obligation shall be null and void as against the city or any of its funds." The charter gives the board power "to control, enlarge, improve, or abolish the cemeteries heretofore belonging to the city, and to create other cemeteries" (subdivision 24, § 25; St. 1893, p. 554); and their control and management are provided for by article 15, § 194, et seq. (Id. p. 603, c. 7).

It is perfectly clear that there was no express contract, as the court found. The charter forbids any kind of a contract for the expenditure of more than $100, unless authorized by a vote of the board of trustees given in the manner therein provided. It must be upon some principle of estoppel, or upon an implied contract or liability arising independently of charter provisions, that relief may be given, if at all. The case may appear to justify the doctrine of equitable estoppel as applied in some cases decided by our Supreme Court cited by appellant. It seems to us, however, that if any substantial or practical results are to be achieved by the restrictions upon the powers of municipal boards of trustees to incur liabilities, which have been placed in charters, it will be impossible to bring any such results about if the provisions must give way under all circumstances to the principle upon which equitable estoppels are generally applied. Plaintiff must be charged with knowledge of the charter provisions in force when he delivered the bricks. He therefore knew that a single trustee—one out of nine—could not legally act for all, and there is no pretense that this trustee was acting as the agent of his co-trustees, or that he assumed to so act. And if he had assumed to be acting for all, and plaintiff so understood it, the principle of ostensible agency does not extend to such a case. Plaintiff would still be put upon inquiry as to the trustee's authority to so act; for plaintiff is presumed to have known that no liability against defendant for over $100 could be legally created, except in the manner provided by the charter. It appears that Mr. Paine acted without consulting his co-trustees, and in entire disregard of charter provisions. It does not appear, except inferentially, that the other trustees had any knowledge of the transaction relating to the 44,000 bricks. They seem to have had some knowledge as to 9,000, for they caused the claim for them to be paid. The charter restrictions were enacted to protect the property holders of the city, plaintiff among them, against just such transactions as this one. Plaintiff acted as much in violation of the charter as did the trustee who bargained with him. These facts and considerations take from the final action of the trustees in rejecting the claim much of its apparent inequity. Instances are becoming too frequent where parties endeavor to fix illegal liabilities upon municipalities under the doctrine of equitable estoppel, thus seeking to avoid injurious consequences which they knowingly brought upon themselves.

The courts have, in some cases of peculiar hardship, and where the circumstances seemed to demand it, come to the relief of persons dealing with municipalities. Appellant has cited some of these in support of his contention, notably Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 Pac. 824, 50 Pac. 670; Sacramento Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., 127 Cal. 217, 59 Pac. 568, 825; Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 Pac. 189. The still later case of Times Publishing Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 Pac. 465, it seems to us is so nearly parallel with the case before us as to be controlling. In that case some printing work had been done under a contract entered into by the city council of the city of Eureka, and payment therefor was ordered by them. The treasurer, Weatherby, refused to pay the claim. The court said: "The ground upon which respondent failed to pay the warrant was that no valid contract for printing was made as required by the city charter. Section 167 of the charter [St. 1895, p. 398, c. 5] has this sweeping provision: 'The city of Eureka shall not be, and is not, bound by any contract, or in any way liable thereon, unless the same is made in writing by order of the council, and the draft thereof approved by the city attorney and the council and the same ordered to be and be signed by the mayor or some other person authorized thereto in behalf of the city; but the council, by an ordinance, may authorize an officer, committee, or agent of the city to bind the city without a contract in writing for the payment of any sum of money not exceeding three hundred dollars.' There was no compliance with this provision touching the printing here involved, and it is so stringent and prohibitive, and so comprehensive in its scope, that we see no way to protect appellant from the harsh consequences which follow the neglect to have the contract executed as required by the charter." We have carefully compared the charters of these two cities, and, while there is a difference in phraseology, we discover no substantial difference in their meaning. Both are equally stringent, prohibitive, and comprehensive, though different in their forms of expression. No court, with consistency, could deny relief in the one case and allow it in the other.

This doctrine of equitable estoppel was invoked in Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863. There the work had been completed, accepted, and ordered paid; but the auditor refused to draw his warrant on the treasury. The court said: "In entering into the contract, the plaintiff was charged with knowledge of all the limitations upon the powers of the board of supervisors. He knew that the board had no power to authorize the contract for doing the work, unless it had invited sealed proposals therefor, and he entered into the contract with the knowledge that he had not made any proposal for doing the work. Having thus performed a contract which he knowingly entered into in disregard of statutory requirements, he is not in a position to claim any equitable consideration by reason of its performance." The court further said that to enforce a promise subsequently made to pay for work which had been contracted for in disregard of charter restrictions "would set at naught all limitations upon municipal powers, and, as was said in Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 337, 16 Pac. 7, 5 Am. St. Rep. 442, 'put the people in the complete power of careless or unscrupulous officers.'" The consolidation act of San Francisco was probably more stringent than the Eureka or the Sacramento charter; but we do not think the courts should split hairs, or be eager to discover distinctions between charters, in order to protect persons who have knowingly acted in violation of their plain provisions, even though the municipal authorities have participated in such violations.

Sacramento Co. v. S. P. Co., supra, was a case where the supervisors of the county agreed with defendant to share the cost of a bridge to be used jointly by the people for general travel and by defendant for a railroad track. The bridge was completed under the contract, which was entered into by plaintiff and defendant, in good faith and upon advice of plaintiff's law officer, and defendant was paid by plaintiff for its expenditures as provided by the contract. Subsequently the county undertook to recover back this money, but the court held against it, although apparently conceding that the contract might have been declared void, had timely proceedings been instituted. We can conceive of many reasons why the county should be estopped from recovering back money paid out under such circumstances which would not apply here. In the Contra Costa Water Co. Case, the circumstances were peculiar and quite different from the facts in the present case. It appeared that "the city council, in its corporate capacity, did absolutely approve respondent's claims and ordered them paid." Furthermore, "there were no 'restrictions imposed by the charter' absolutely prohibiting the action of the city council involved." Besides, the city was under the necessity of having water from day to day, and in point of fact the claims made out and ordered paid by the council were at a less rate than had been declared reasonable by the ordinance of the city. The principle of estoppel was applied, as in the Sacramento County Case; but there is a broad distinction between the two cases and the one here. Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., supra, was likewise peculiar in its circumstances. For an explanation of the scope of the decision we refer to concurring opinion of Chief Justice Beatty in Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, in which he shows how it came about that recovery could be had upon quantum valebat while denying the validity of the contract. The case lends no strength to appellant's contention.

Whatever may have been the reasons in the cases cited by appellant for avoiding the enforcement of the restrictions upon the powers of municipalities there involved, we do not think the doctrine of equitable estoppel should be extended to the present case, or any similar case. To do so would be to throw down all the bars that have been raised to protect the people from the consequences of charter violations, and would smooth the way to dangerous inroads upon municipal treasuries. There may be an apparent injustice in some cases in adhering strictly to charter provisions. Individuals may suffer, but it is better so than that entire communities should be deprived of the protection given them against infractions of the law by which they are governed, especially where the loss falls upon one who has knowingly taken upon himself the risk of loss.

The judgment is affirmed.

REED et al. v. McDONALD.

1. SALES—ACTION—RECOVERY OF PRICE PAID —BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action on a written contract for the purchase of hay by plaintiffs from defendant, which provided that plaintiffs should pay for the hay at the contract price for a stipulated number of tons as estimated, and that on the ascertainment of the true tonnage any deficiency should be made good by defendant at the agreed price per ton, the burden was on plaintiffs to show that, under the contract as alleged by them, there was a deficiency in the estimated quantity.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a written contract for the purchase of hay by plaintiffs from defendant, which provided that plaintiffs should pay for the hay at the contract price for a stipulated number of tons as estimated, and that on the ascertainment of the true tonnage any deficiency should be made good by defendant at the agreed price per ton, it was error to exclude from evidence the written contract, which contained stipulations as to the manner in which the tonnage should be determined.

3. SAME — PARTIES—PURCHASERS FROM CONTRACTING PARTIES.

In an action on a written contract for the purchase of hay by plaintiffs from defendant, which provided that plaintiffs should pay for the hay at the contract price for a stipulated number of tons as estimated, and that on the ascertainment of the true tonnage any deficiency should be made good by defendant at the agreed price per ton, purchasers of the hay from one of the plaintiffs were not necessary parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by H. M. Reed and another against R. McDonald. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Laird & Packard and J. W. P. Laird, for appellant. Smith & Allen and W. S. Allen, for respondents.

ALLEN, J. Plaintiffs' complaint avers that on February 20, 1900, they bought of defendant a stack of baled hay containing 650 tons, more or less, at $8.75 per ton; that it was agreed that, until the hay was removed and the true tonnage learned, plaintiffs should pay the contract price therefor to defendant, and when the hay was moved and the true tonnage ascertained, if there was more or less than 650 tons, the excess or deficiency should be adjusted between the parties at the selling rate per ton. The plaintiffs paid the price based on the estimate. Afterwards, on February 1, 1901, plaintiffs allege that they completed the removal of the hay and ascertained that the stack contained but 471 tons plus, which deficiency, at the rate named, amounted to $1,563.20. Defendant denies that the removal of said hay was ever completed, or any ascertainment was ever had that said stack contained 471 tons plus only, and alleges, further, that at the date of the commencement of the action and long prior thereto the hay had been sold to and was the property of others not parties to the action, who were and still are living. Findings and judgment for plaintiffs, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

It appears from the evidence that possession of the hay was delivered to the purchasers at the date of the purchase, and that the purchasers caused the same to be insured in their names and returned the same for tax assessment as their property. Although, at the time of the sale, they returned the keys to the corral in which the hay was situate to the seller, he was to deliver the same upon the purchasers' request to those whom they might desire to remove the hay. It further appears that plaintiffs commenced the removal of the hay about March 1st, under an agreement with the seller (whether in harmony with the written agreement or not does not appear from the record) that the weights should be determined by reference to tags placed in each bale by the baler, and under this arrangement plaintiffs removed 307¼ tons, the weights of which, it is shown were satisfactory to all parties; plaintiffs having on the day of their purchase sold 300 tons of the hay to one De Groot, who, after the removal of the hay above specified, employed a man named Loveland to remove and ship his 300 tons of hay. There is testimony offered by plaintiffs tending to show that De Groot and plaintiffs had a conference with defendant before De Groot commenced the removal of the hay, at which it was agreed that, instead of De Groot weighing and determining the weights as by the contract provided, the car weights of the railroad company should be accepted. The evidence is without conflict, however, that defendant refused to accept car weights from De Groot, or weights of any kind from Loveland, his agent. During the progress of the trial plaintiffs offered in evidence the original written contract between plaintiffs and defendant, executed at the time of the sale, to the introduction of which the defendant objected because it was in terms different from the terms set out in the complaint. Thereupon plaintiffs withdrew the offer. This objection on defendant's part seems to have been captious; but, the offer having been withdrawn before any ruling of the court was had upon the question, the incident is not worthy of notice.

During the cross-examination of one of the plaintiffs, and subsequently when defendant was putting in his testimony, he offered in evidence, after proper identification, the written contract between the parties with reference to the sale of this hay; it having been stated in open court by plaintiffs' attorney that this contract contained stipulations as to the manner in which the tonnage should be determined. The introduction of the written contract was objected to by plaintiffs as being incompetent and irrelevant, which objection was sustained. This was error. The burden was upon the plaintiffs to show that under the contract as set out by them there was a deficiency in the quantity estimated, and on this question the manner of weighing or determining the tonnage provided in the contract was a material matter. Plaintiffs' contention, however, was and is that this written agreement was changed by an oral executed agreement, by the terms of which the manner of ascertaining the tonnage was changed. But on the evidence in the record there is a question whether the modifying agreement was so far executed as to give it validity; and, in the absence of the original contract, the question cannot be satisfactorily determined. The prejudicial character of the error in excluding this written contract is apparent throughout the entire record.

The purchasers from Reed were not necessary parties to this action.

Judgment and order reversed.

COATS v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—RAILROADS—OCCUPYING STREET — CONSENT OF CITY — DAMAGE TO ABUTTING PROPERTY.

A railroad company, though erecting and maintaining its road in a street, as permitted by Civ. Code, § 465 (5), and with consent of the city, is liable for injury to the right of an owner of abutting property to access thereto.

2. RAILROADS—OCCUPYING STREETS—NUISANCE —MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

A railroad company, occupying a street by maintaining an embankment in front of abutting property, preventing access to it, is liable as for a nuisance; the measure of damages being the amount of injury actually sustained at the commencement of the action therefor, and the measure of damages in condemnation, the deterioration in market value, not obtaining.

3. NUISANCE—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—DEMAND FOR ABATEMENT.

Demand for abatement of a nuisance is not necessary for an action for damages from its maintenance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. Nuisance, §§ 102, 103.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. R. Coats against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Norton, U. T. Clotfelter, and E. E. Millikin, for appellant. Charles G. Lamberson, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a lot of land in the city of Visalia, fronting on the east side of East street, on which, from a date anterior to the transactions involved in this case, he had, and had been operating, a foundry and machine shop and repair shop for machinery. The defendant is the successor in interest of the San Francisco & San Joaquin Valley Railway Company, and is maintaining in East street, between the main track of its road and the east line of the street, a side track erected by its predecessor on an embankment of about two feet elevation, which prevents access to the plaintiff's premises, and has thus seriously interfered with the use of the premises for the purposes of his business. The suit was brought for resulting damages, and plaintiff recovered verdict and judgment for $800, being the damages suffered by the plaintiff from the commencement of the maintenance of the nuisance by the defendant to the commencement of the suit. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The points urged by the appellant, or those that need be considered, are: (1) That the side track and embankment were constructed by its predecessor under an ordinance of the city of Visalia authorizing its construction, and hence were not unlawful, and consequently not a nuisance; (2) that under the pleadings and evidence in the case plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than nominal damages; (3) that demand upon the defendant for abatement of the nuisance was essential to plaintiff's action, and that such demand was not made.

1. In support of its first point the defendant relies upon the license given its predecessor by section 465, subd. 5, of the Civil Code, "to construct its road over the street," and an ordinance of the city of Visalia authorizing it to do so. But in the license pleaded it is expressly provided, as a condition of using the street, that the corporation shall restore it "to its former state of usefulness as near as may be, or so that the railroad shall not unnecessarily impair its usefulness." Under these and preceding provisions of the law, it has been held in many cases in this state that the consent of the city authorities to use its street for railroad purposes "in no wise touches the question of damages to private property on the line of the street," and that the right to a just compensation for the injuries thus inflicted is in no wise affected by the question whether such consent had been or had not been given. S. P. R. R. Co. v. Reed, 41 Cal. 262; Schulte v. N. P. T. Co., 50 Cal. 592; Severy v. C. P. R. R. Co., 51 Cal. 197; Ford v. Santa Cruz R. R. Co., 59 Cal. 290; Beronio v. S. P. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 421, 24 Pac. 1093, 21 Am. St. Rep. 57. The first case cited is, indeed, criticised in Montgomery v. Railway Co., 104 Cal. 186, 196, 37 Pac. 786, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89; but the same point was not involved in that case, and what is there said upon the general subject is questioned in O'Connor v. S. P. R. R. Co., 122 Cal. 684, 55 Pac. 688; but the principle in S. P. R. R. Co. v. Reed cannot be questioned, for it is a settled principle that the right of the owner of land abutting on a street to access over it to and from his premises is itself a right of property, of which, under the constitutional provisions, he can no more be deprived without compensation than of any other property. Schaufele v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 109, 24 Pac. 834; Eachus v. Los Angeles Electric Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 617, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149; Brown v. Board of Supervisors, 124 Cal. 280, 57 Pac. 82. There was an exception, or apparent exception, to this principle in favor of the right of the municipality to grade its streets, by which it and its proper agents were exempted from liability, unless for negligence in the work; but in this case the defendant's predecessor was not the agent of the city for that purpose, nor would the city itself have been authorized to raise embankments over portions of the street, except as part of the entire work of grading the street. Now, by article 1, § 14, of the Constitution, the power heretofore vested in the municipality in this regard has been taken away, and it is provided: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner." Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109; Eachus v. Los Angeles Electric Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 617, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149; Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 492, 62 Pac. 829, 80 Am. St. Rep. 147. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant's predecessor in erecting, and the defendant in maintaining,

2. As to damages, there is nothing in the case to take it from under the application of the general rule applying to nuisances and other injuries to land (1 Sedgwick on Damages, 267, 274, 294, citing Hatfield v. Central R. R. Co., 33 N. J. Law, 251; Wood, Law of Nuisances, § 830; 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 474), which is "that every person who suffers detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another may recover from the person in fault a compensation therefor in money" (Civ. Code, § 3281), which, except where otherwise provided, shall be "the amount which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby" (Id. § 3333). This may be in some cases the deterioration in the market value of the property, as, e. g., where the nuisance is a continuing one and cannot be abated. 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 468; Wood on Nuisances, § 856; Eachus v. Los Angeles Elec. Ry. Co., and Same v. Los Angeles, supra. But it is not always that this measure of damages is admissible. Hopkins v. W. P. R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 194; Severy v. C. P. R. R. Co., 51 Cal. 197. Ordinarily, he is entitled to recover only an amount sufficient to compensate him for his actual detriment; and this he is always entitled to recover. Hence it is said, in cases of nuisance, "the rule of damages * * * is the amount of injury actually sustained at the commencement of the suit" (2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 474; Wood on Nuisances, § 855), though, "where the damages are of a permanent character and go to the entire value of the estate affected by the nuisance, [it is said] a recovery may be had of the entire damages in one action." (Id. § 856). The case of Eachus v. Los Angeles Elec. Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 617, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, is not in conflict with these principles. That was a case of the kind noted above, where the deterioration of the value in the land was the proper measure of damages, and in which there was no other damage claimed by the plaintiff. Nor can the language cited by the appellant from the opinion in that case bear the construction put on it. What is said is, in effect, that "a mere infringement of the owner's personal pleasure and enjoyment," etc., as, e. g., by "the erection of a county jail or a county hospital," is not a ground for damages, which is but to say that a party cannot recover for a mere interference with his personal pleasure and enjoyment where "no right has been violated," or, in other words, for damnum absque injuria. Wood on Nuisances, § 867. But, from the very definition of nuisance, where his right is violated, it is clear that he may recover damages for any interference "with the comfortable enjoyment of * * * (his) property." Civ. Code, § 3479; Code Cov. Proc. § 731. So what is said with reference to the diminution in value of the property "for some particular use" is to be understood as referring to the case before the court, where the question at issue was only as to the value of the property.

The position of appellant in this regard seems to be that the measure of damages in the case of nuisance affecting real property is the deterioration in the market value of the land by reason of the nuisance. This, indeed, is the measure of damages established by the Code in suits for the condemnation of land (Code Civ. Proc. § 1248); but we cannot conceive upon what principle the same measure of damages must be applied in suits for damages for nuisance or trespass, and to apply it generally would be in conflict with the very definition of nuisance as given in the Codes, and with the provisions of the Civil Code as to the measure of damages in case of tort, and with the authorities on the subject. For, though under the provisions of the law, as it stood before and since the adoption of the new Constitution, the right to condemn the plaintiff's right in the street was accorded to the defendant, yet it has not thought fit to avail itself of this privilege, and it therefore stands, as we have already said, in the position of a mere tort feasor. Nevertheless the appellant's claim seems to be supported to some extent by the decision in Kishlar v. S. P. R. R. Co., 134 Cal. 636, 66 Pac. 848, where it was apparently held, in a case where the plaintiff was a leaseholder of a lot which he used in the business in which he was engaged, and the value of which for that purpose was entirely destroyed by the shutting off of access to it by the defendant, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover "only the fair market value of the plaintiff's property"; i. e., of his lease. But by reference to the record in that case it will be seen that this was, in effect, conceded by both parties, and that the only question considered by the court was the contention of the appellant that the use of the land "to the plaintiff for a particular purpose" was "a proper element to be considered by the jury, * * * and should not be taken from the jury in arriving at market value" (page 639 of 134 Cal., page 849 of 66 Pac.); and in support of this proposition the case cited by the appellant was San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604, which was a condemnation suit, as was also the case of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224. Naturally, therefore, the question here involved was not considered by the court, and the decision cannot be regarded as an authority upon the general proposition. In the present case, the damage to the plaintiff's land and to the business carried on by him on the land was clearly proven; and under the evidence introduced the amount found by the verdict cannot be regarded as excessive. Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5; Boyce v. Cal. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 460; Lee v. S. P. R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 120, 121, 35 Pac. 572.

As to the claim of the appellant that demand to abate the nuisance was necessary to the plaintiff's action, the doctrine contended for by the appellant, if previously existing, was abrogated by section 3483 of the Civil Code. See note to this section in Revisor's Edition. Whether want of knowledge of the existence or noxious character of a nuisance would be a defense to an action (Grigsby v. Clear Lake Water Co., 40 Cal. 396) need not here be considered, as there was evidence in the case to justify the jury in finding such knowledge.

For the reasons given, we are of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

MORTON et al. v. MORTON. (S. F. 3,436.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1905.)

1. Trade-Names—Unlawful Competition—Injunction—Complaint.

Plaintiffs alleged that for more than 10 years, under the name of "Morton Special Delivery," they had conducted a transfer business, and each of its solicitors wore a hat badge containing the word "Morton," and that plaintiffs' business had become well and favorably known by such name; that defendant, whose name was also Morton, had shortly before the beginning of the action engaged in a competing business under the name of "Morton Transfer Company," and had affixed to his hat the single word "Morton's," using letters of the same size, color, and general appearance as plaintiffs' badge, and represented to the public that he was acting for plaintiffs, and thereby deceived the public and procured much baggage for transfer which would otherwise have gone to plaintiffs. Held, that the complaint stated facts entitling plaintiffs to an injunction.

2. Same—Adequate Remedy at Law—Insolvency.

Where defendant used plaintiffs' trade-name and a copy of their badge in a competing business to deceive the public, by causing them to trade with him when they intended to have traded with plaintiffs, plaintiffs had no adequate remedy at law, regardless of the question of defendant's insolvency, and were therefore entitled to an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, § 86.]

3. Same—Injunction—Prohibitory—Issued Pending Trial.

Where an injunction complained of, issued on a verified complaint at the time of issuing summons and without notice to defendant, merely restrained defendant, his agents, and employés from representing himself as the representative of plaintiffs, and from wearing on his hat, while engaging in the business of soliciting the transfer of baggage, a badge with the word "Morton's" thereon, or any badge similar thereto, it was prohibitory only, and not mandatory, and was properly issued pending trial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Suit by William R. Morton and another against John Morton. From an order granting an injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William J. Herrin, for appellant. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from an order granting an injunction upon a verified complaint at the time of issuing the summons and without notice to the defendant. The complaint alleges substantially the following facts, viz.: Plaintiffs have for more than 10 years previous to the bringing of the action, August 5, 1902, under the name of "Morton's Special Delivery," conducted the business of transferring for hire the baggage and luggage of persons from their places of landing in San Francisco to their hotels or places of destination therein, and from their hotels and residences to the depots or wharves whence they were about to depart. In that business they employed a large number of solicitors, whose business it was and is to solicit custom from travelers. Each solicitor had for some time been caused by plaintiffs, while actually employed in his work, to wear upon his hat a badge upon which is printed in conspicuous letters the word "Morton." This badge indicated to the public that the solicitor was representing the Morton Special Delivery, which is well and favorably known, and that any baggage intrusted to any solicitor wearing such a badge would be handled by the persons doing business under that name. The defendant, within a few months prior to the bringing of the action, became engaged in the same character of business, under the name of "Morton Transfer Company." For the purpose of misleading and deceiving the public, as alleged, into the belief that he was a solicitor of plaintiffs, and that they will handle all baggage intrusted to him to transfer, he has and still uses in connection with his business a badge affixed to his hat, with the single word "Morton's" thereon. Such badge is of the same size, color, and general appearance as plaintiff's badge, and the letters thereon are precisely similar in size, color, and general appearance as those of plaintiffs' badge; the only difference being the additional "s," with an apostrophe, to the name "Morton." During such time defendant has and still does represent to the public that he is acting for plaintiffs, and by the use of this artifice he deceives the public into the belief that he represents the plaintiffs, and thereby procures from them much of their baggage for the purpose of transfer. It is alleged, further, that plaintiffs' business has become well and favorably known under the name of "Morton," and that as a result of the defendant's misrepresentations in the use of said badge they have been damaged in the sum of $500, and, if such use and misrepresentations are continued, will suffer and sustain other damage, and that such loss or damage will be irreparable, and that they have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. All these allegations must, for the present purpose, be considered as confessed; the defendant having failed to answer. The injunction having been issued according to the provisions of section 527, Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant in the lower court might have moved to vacate or modify said injunction under the provisions of section 532, Code of Civil Procedure. He appears, however, to have failed to make any move in that direction, but, on the contrary, chose to take an appeal directly from the ex parte order granting the injunction, and to stand upon his contention that the order does not find sufficient support in the complaint on which it is based.

From the foregoing summary of the complaint, evidently this position of the appellant is untenable, as the complaint certainly states facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an injunction. As in Weinstock v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 42 Pac. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57, and Dodge Stat. Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879, the basis of plaintiffs' action is that defendant is attempting by fraudulent representations to the effect that defendant's business is plaintiffs' business to appropriate the benefit of the good will of plaintiffs' established business. The principle applicable was stated in the Weinstock Case, as follows, viz.: "When one tradesman resorts to the use of any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of representing his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival tradesman, thereby deceiving the people by causing them to trade with him, when they intended to and would have otherwise traded with his rival, a fraud is committed—a fraud which a court of equity will not allow to thrive." This statement was approvingly quoted in the Dodge Case. The only appropriate and adequate remedy in such a case as this is the remedy of injunction, and this is so, regardless of the question of the insolvency of the person committing the fraud. If an injunction could not be granted as against a financially responsible person guilty of such fraud, the fraud upon the rival business and the public could be continued indefinitely, and the only right of the owner of the rival business would be in a multiplicity of actions for damages; whereas it might be in many cases practically impossible to ascertain the amount of damage done. The allegations in this complaint as to the nature of business here involved show beyond doubt that such would be the situation in this case. It is urged that, in so far as the injunction herein granted was mandatory, it was erroneously granted; the contention being that a mandatory injunction should not be granted pending trial, or until the rights of the parties had been definitely ascertained by the chancellor. We are, however, of the opinion that the injunction granted in this case was prohibitory only, and in no respect mandatory. The injunction complained of restrains the defendant, his agents, and employés from representing himself as the representative of plaintiffs, and from wearing on his hat, while engaged in the business of soliciting the transfer of baggage and luggage, a badge with the word "Morton's" thereon, or any badge similar thereto. This injunction does not restrain the defendant from carrying on his business in a legitimate manner and without the artifice referred to, by which it is sought to unjustly obtain some of the business of the plaintiffs. We are satisfied that the injunction was entirely justified by the allegations of the complaint, and went no further than was necessary to restrain the continuance of an artificial contrivance resorted to by defendant for the sole purpose of deceiving the public into the idea that in patronizing him they were patronizing plaintiffs, and of thus acquiring patronage intended to be given to plaintiffs. It is well settled that, while a person undoubtedly has the right to engage in business in his own name, he will not be allowed to resort to any artifice or contrivance in the use of that name for the purpose of deceiving the public as to the identity of his business or products, and that to prevent this result a certain manner of use of one's own name may, in a proper case, be prohibited. See Dodge Stat. Co. v. Dodge, supra, and other cases cited.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CODY v. MARKET ST. RY. CO. (S. F. 3,489.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1905.)

1. Carriers — Injuries to Passengers — Street Railroads—Instructions.

An instruction, in an action for injuries to a passenger, that the carrier is required to exercise the highest degree of care in transportation of passengers, and that a showing that the injury was caused by the carrier's act in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business raises a presumption of negligence, which throws on the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without its negligence, was not erroneous, as requiring defendant to overcome plaintiff's showing by a preponderance of the evidence; the court having also charged that plaintiff was required to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence.

2. Same—Time to Alight—Premature Start—Negligence—Presumption.

Where a passenger alleged injuries by the premature starting of a street car as she was attempting to alight, the case was one in which the presumption of negligence arose from injuries resulting from the carrier's act in operating the instrumentalities used in its business.

3. Trial—Issues—Instructions.

Where the issues made by the pleadings were simple, were apparently not in dispute, and had probably been correctly stated to the jury by counsel, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 607, the refusal of a requested instruction stating the issues to the jury was not error.

4. Same.

The court may properly refuse a request to charge fully covered by other instructions given.

5. Carriers—Injuries to Passengers — Actions—Instructions.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger on a street car by an alleged premature start, the only negligence submitted to the jury related to the management of the car at the very moment of the accident, it was not error to refuse to charge that the carrier's failure to stop the car at the street where plaintiff intended to alight was not the proximate cause of her injury and did not entitle her to recover.

6. Appeal—Review—Harmless Error.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger, the court charged the proper measure of damages, and there was no evidence of any injuries other than those specifically alleged in the complaint, defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal of an instruction limiting plaintiff's recovery to such specified injuries.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Margaret Cody against the Market Street Railway Company. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Cross, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been received by plaintiff, through the negligence of defendant, while alighting from one of defendant's cars, upon which she was a passenger. She obtained judgment for $750, and defendant appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The only points made on this appeal relate to the action of the trial court in the matter of instructing the jury.

1. The case made by plaintiff was substantially as follows, viz.: Being a passenger on a northbound Devisadero street car, in the city and county of San Francisco, she desired to alight at Eddy street; but, owing to the fact that the conductor was engaged in another portion of the car, she was unable to inform him of her desire until after the car had passed Eddy street, and was between Eddy street and Ellis street, the next cross-street north of Eddy. She then informed him of her desire and explained why she had not told him earlier. The car was stopped shortly before it reached Ellis street. She immediately attempted to alight, and while doing so, one of her feet being on the ground and the other on the bottom step of the car, the car was started, and she was thereby thrown to the ground and injured. Her claim was that the car was negligently started by defendant while she was in the act of alighting, and that such negligence was the sole cause of her injury, and it is not contended that the evidence submitted on her behalf was in any way insufficient to support a verdict in her favor. The reply made to plaintiff's evidence by defendant was confined exclusively to evidence tending to show that the car did not stop at all between Eddy and Ellis streets, and stopped only after it had turned from Devisadero into Ellis, and that plaintiff, notwithstanding a statement made to her by the conductor to the effect that she could not get off until the car reached Ellis street, stepped off the car before it reached Ellis street, and while it was still moving. Under these circumstances, the trial court, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows, viz.: "The rule concerning the obligations of common carriers of passengers is thus stated by the Supreme Court of this State, in McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 561, 55 Pac. 325: 'The carrier of passengers is required to exercise the highest degree of care in their transportation, and is responsible for injuries received by them while in the course of transportation, which might have been avoided by the exercise of such care. Hence, when it is shown that the injury to the passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in his business, there is a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on his part.'" It is claimed that the court erred in giving this instruction.

It is suggested that the effect of this instruction was to make it incumbent on defendant to overcome the showing of plaintiff by a preponderance of evidence, whereas, under the universally recognized rule, no verdict could be rendered for plaintiff in the absence of a preponderance of evidence showing negligence on the part of defendant. That this contention is not well founded is shown by the opinion of this court in several cases where the question has been discussed. Such an instruction simply informs the jury that, when the facts stated therein are shown, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises, which is sufficient to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and require the defendant to meet the case thus made, or, in other words, to answer the prima facie case, or it will prevail. But it does not require a defendant to show want of negligence by a preponderance of evidence. It does no more than to require him to make such showing as to want of negligence as will leave the jury, with all the evidence before it, unsatisfied as to whether there was negligence on defendant's part, and, if on the whole case the scale does not preponderate in favor of the presumption of negligence and against the defendant's proof, plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict, for he has not established his case by a preponderance of evidence, as he was compelled to do under the well-settled rule. The term "burden" or "burden of proof" is frequently used to signify simply the burden of meeting a prima facie case, rather than the burden of producing a preponderance of evidence, and as used in the instruction in question imported nothing more. The distinction is clearly shown in the opinions of this court in Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 398, 400, 22 Pac. 871; Patterson v. S. F. & S. M. Ry. Co. (Cal.) 81 Pac. 531, 533; and Kahn v. Triest, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 340, 344, 73 Pac. 164. Upon the proposition that it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove her case by a preponderance of evidence, the trial court correctly instructed the jury that they should find a verdict for the defendant "unless the plaintiff has shown by a preponderance of the evidence that she was injured by the negligence of the defendant," and there could not reasonably have been any misunderstanding on the part of the jury as to the meaning of the instruction complained of. It is the settled law in this state that such an instruction may properly be given where the circumstances of the case justify it, and that it is not open to the objection under discussion. Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 280, 283, 79 Pac. 169, 92 Am.St.Rep. 171; Green v. Pacific Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 435, 440, 62 Pac. 747. The instruction correctly stated the law applicable to common carriers of passengers (McCurrie v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 561, 55 Pac. 324), and the rule stated therein is as applicable to street railway companies as it is to other carriers (Bosqui v. Sutro Railroad Co., 131 Cal. 390, 400, 63 Pac. 682).

It is, however, claimed that, conceding that the instruction may be given in a proper case, it was not applicable under the facts in this case. We are unable to perceive any merit in this contention. There can be no question that the relation of carrier and passenger continues to exist while the passenger is expeditiously engaged in the act of carefully and prudently alighting from the car, and that the carrier is bound to exercise the same high degree of care in affording a passenger a reasonable opportunity to alight in safety as in carrying him safely. Booth on Street Railway Law, §§ 326, 329, 337, 349. If a passenger, while alighting with due care from a car, is injured by some act of the carrier in operating the car, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier at once arises. Proof of such facts, as has often been said, causes the case to fall within the rule given by Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 59: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." McCurrie v. S. P. Co., supra; Osgood v. Los Angeles Traction Co., supra. The rule has been held applicable in cases of passengers entering upon and alighting from street cars. Birmingham, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hale, 90 Ala. 8, 12, 8 South. 142, 24 Am. St. Rep. 748; City, etc., Railway v. Findley, 76 Ga. 311; Dougherty v

Missouri R. R. Co., 81 Mo. 325, 51 Am. Rep. 239. Of course the mere fact unexplained that such a person was injured while entering or leaving a car would raise no such presumption, but, where the evidence shows that the injury was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in his business, and that the passenger was exercising due care, there can be no question as to the application of the rule enunciated in this instruction. Booth Street Railway Law, § 361. The evidence introduced by plaintiff tended to show such a condition of affairs, and, undoubtedly, made a prima facie case in her favor upon the question of negligence, and entitled the plaintiff to have the instruction given.

2. It is complained that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by defendant purporting to be a statement as to what plaintiff alleged in her complaint, and what defendant denied. It may be conceded that it is always entirely proper for the trial court to state to the jury the issues to be determined by them, and it may be that in some cases, by reason of peculiar circumstances existing, such a statement would be necessary in order that the jury might clearly understand the particular questions to be decided; but we see nothing in the record of this case to indicate that such a statement by the court was at all necessary. The issues made by the pleadings were exceedingly simple, there was apparently no dispute between the parties as to what they were and presumably, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the record, they had been correctly stated to the jury by counsel. Code Civ. Proc. § 607.

3. The instruction requested by defendant to the effect that, if plaintiff's injuries were caused solely by her negligently alighting from the car while it was in motion, she could not recover, was fully covered by other instructions given, and the refusal to give it was therefore not erroneous.

4. Each of two instructions requested by defendant and refused by the court embodied the proposition that the failure of the car to stop at Eddy street could not be considered the proximate cause of any injury sustained by plaintiff, or entitle her to recover. There was no intimation either in the complaint, evidence, or instructions of any claim of negligence on the part of defendant in the matter of the failure of the car to stop at Eddy street. The plain effect of certain instructions given was that the only negligence on the part of defendant to be considered at all was such as related to the management of the car at the very moment of the accident, or, as put in one of the instructions, "at the time she attempted to alight from the car," and there could have been no misunderstanding on the part of the jury in this regard.

5. Defendant's requested instruction No. 9 was fully covered by other instructions given.

6. Complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give a requested instruction in terms limiting the amount to be awarded plaintiff, in the event of her recovery, to such a sum as would reasonably compensate her for the damages sustained by reason "of being bruised in the region of the shoulders and left arm, and by nervous shock," which were the injuries specifically alleged in her complaint. We think this instruction embraced both the general and special damages alleged, and stated the law correctly. At the same time, a careful examination of the record satisfies us that the failure to give the instruction could not have substantially affected defendant's rights. The court had already instructed the jury as to the proper measure of damages, namely, such amount as would compensate plaintiff for the injuries proximately caused by defendant's negligence. There was practically no evidence relating to any injury other than those specifically alleged in the complaint, and it is not to be assumed that the jury may have included in their verdict any award for injuries concerning which there was no evidence.

This disposes of all the points made by appellant.

148 Cal. 102

In re ANGLE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 4,003.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1905.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—DISTRIBUTEES—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

A judgment creditor of a widow is entitled to enforce the judgment only against such portion of the residue of the estate of the widow's deceased husband as belonged to her or her successors in interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Descent and Distribution, § 526.]

2. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

Where a widow mortgaged her interest in her deceased husband's estate, which mortgage was assigned to her husband's administrator, who foreclosed the same in a proceeding to which objector, a subsequent mortgagee, was a party, the foreclosure decree was res judicata as to the validity and ownership of the mortgage foreclosed and the indebtedness of the widow thereon to the estate.

3. ADMINISTRATORS — SALE UNDER ORDER OF COURT—EFFECT ON MORTGAGE.

Where, after an administrator had obtained a decree foreclosing a mortgage given by his intestate's widow on her interest in the estate, such interest was sold under a probate order, and the sale was duly confirmed, such sale did not operate as a payment of the mortgage debt, but merely transferred the estate's security from her interest as heir in the "land" of the estate to her interest in the proceeds of the sale.

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—INTEREST OF SURVIVING WIFE.

Civ. Code, § 1402, provides that on the death of the husband one half of the community property goes to the surviving wife, and the other half, subject to testamentary disposition by the husband, to his descendants equally, if of the same degree of kindred. Held that, where a husband died leaving descendants, his widow took one-half of the community property, absolutely, and not the half and an additional one-third of the remaining half as heir.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26 Cent. Dig. Husband and Wife, § 1009.]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—CLAIMS AGAINST DISTRIBUTEES—SET-OFF.

The right of an administrator to set off a judgment against his intestate's widow, belonging to the estate, against her share thereof, as against her creditors, does not depend upon her insolvency.

6. APPEAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—RECORD.

Appellant was not entitled to a review of the exclusion of certain papers offered in evidence, where the record failed to indicate the contents of the papers or their materiality to the issues.

7. SAME—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a widow's interest in the estate of her deceased husband was more than exhausted by a judgment against her held by the estate, a junior judgment creditor of the widow was not prejudiced by the admission in evidence of an assignment made by the widow of her interest in the residue of the estate shortly prior to the distribution.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Rench Angle, deceased. From a final distribution decree, one Ambrose, a judgment creditor of the widow, appeals. Affirmed.

A. Morgenthal, for appellant. Weldon & Held, J. E. Pemberton, Arthur J. Thatcher, T. L. Carothers, and J. C. Ruddock, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution, by which a balance of money in the hands of the administrator, amounting to $5,388.42, constituting all of the ascertained residue of the estate, except a judgment against the surviving wife, amounting to $6,721.88, was distributed to four of the six children of deceased, in equal shares. The only appellant is one Ambrose, who designates himself in the notice of appeal as a judgment lien holder against the fund distributed. In his answer to the petition for distribution, he styles himself a judgment creditor of the surviving wife of the deceased, whom he alleged to be an heir and entitled to a portion of the residue of the estate, and asked that the same be distributed, subject to his judgment lien. The trial court found that such surviving wife was entitled to no portion of the residue, owing to the fact that the unpaid judgment of the estate against her was greater in amount than her portion of the estate, and for that reason refused to afford appellant any relief, and distributed the residue of money to four children, the other two having already received their portions.

Appellant's claim was one against the surviving wife only. The debt upon which it was based was created after the death of deceased. The surviving wife purchased sheep from appellant, gave him a note for the purchase price, and, to secure the payment of the same, executed to him a mortgage upon her interest in a tract of land owned by the estate. She had prior thereto executed a mortgage upon the same interest to one Cooper, and this mortgage, and the indebtedness thereby secured, were subsequently assigned to the administrator with the will annexed of said estate. Subsequently appellant commenced an action to foreclose his mortgage, making such administrator a party defendant. In that action it was determined that the mortgage held by the estate was a prior, valid and subsisting mortgage, and that there was due thereon to the estate $4,814.67, and, also, that there was due on appellant's mortgage $4,994.26. A decree was entered requiring the sale of the interest of the surviving wife in the mortgaged premises to satisfy, first, the claim of the estate, and, secondly, the claim of appellant, and directing the docketing of judgments against the surviving wife for any deficiency remaining after such sale. An appeal was taken by appellant here from that judgment, he contesting the validity of the claim of the estate, and the judgment was here affirmed. Ambrose v. Drew et al., 139 Cal. 665, 73 Pac. 543. No sale of the mortgaged premises was ever made under the foreclosure decree, as, pending the appeal, the administrator had, under order of the probate court, regularly sold the interest of the deceased in the real property affected by the mortgage, and such sale had been duly confirmed. All of the money in the hands of the administrator was a part of the proceeds of said probate sale. No part of appellant's judgment has ever been paid. The judgment in favor of the estate, embraced in said foreclosure decree, amounted, with the interest adjudged, at the date of the decree of distribution to the sum of $6,721.88, and is the judgment specified in such decree as a portion of the residue of the estate. All the property of the estate is community property. Without deciding the point, it may be assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that appellant, under the facts stated above, had such an interest as entitled him to be heard in the matter of the distribution. Est. of Crooks, 125 Cal. 459, 461, 58 Pac. 89. It is obvious, however, that he could have no right whatever, except as against such portion of the residue as belonged to his judgment debtor, the surviving wife, or her successors in interest. If the decision of the lower court, to the effect that by reason of the judgment of the estate against her she was entitled to nothing, be correct, appellant must necessarily fail.

The right to set off, as against the share of the surviving wife, such amounts as were due from her to the estate, is not disputed. It is urged, however, that there was nothing so due from her, and the finding that a portion of the residue consisted of this judgment against her is attacked. The contention in this respect involves questions as to the validity and ownership of the mortgage originally given to Cooper and afterwards assigned to the estate, and the subsequent judgment thereon in favor of the administrator, which were fully litigated and fully determined in the foreclosure action in which appellant, the estate through the administrator, and the surviving wife were parties (Ambrose v. Drew, supra), and are res judicata. Even if it be conceded, as contended by appellant, that the decision in that case was erroneous, it is beyond review. The judgment therein against the wife and in favor of the estate became an asset of the estate. With legal interest to the date of the decree, it amounted to the sum specified therein, and in such amount, no part thereof having been paid, constituted a portion of the residue. It is contended that, when the mortgaged property was sold at probate sale, the mortgage was thereby paid, but manifestly such sale of the decedent's interest in the land could in no way affect the indebtedness of the wife to the estate, except to alter the security held by the estate for the payment of such debt. Instead of holding her interest as heir in the land of the estate as security, it thereafter held her interest as heir in the proceeds of such land.

Upon the theory entertained by the court below, to the effect that the attempted disposition of the property by will was invalid, and that the law as to succession in cases of intestacy therefore applied, as to the correctness of which theory no point appears to be made by appellant, its conclusion that, all the property being community property, the wife was originally entitled to only one half of the property, and the six children of deceased were originally entitled to the other half, was undoubtedly correct. Section 1402, Civ. Code. Appellant's contention in this behalf appears to be that where the property is community property, and there are a surviving wife and children, the wife takes one half absolutely, and one-third of the remaining half as heir. This contention is answered by the express terms of the statute cited above, where it is provided as follows, viz.: "Upon the death of the husband, one half of the community property goes to the surviving wife, and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, and in the absence of such disposition, goes to his descendants, equally, if such descendants are in the same degree of kindred to the decedent. It is only in the absence of descendants that the rule contended for by appellant would be applicable. The residue of the estate, consisting only of $5,388.42 in money, and the judgment against the wife for $6,721.88, and she being entitled to only one-half of such residue, it necessarily follows that she was entitled to receive nothing on distribution.

It is contended that the finding that the surviving wife is insolvent, and that the judgment against her is without value, except as the same may be used as an offset against the money which would otherwise be due her, is not sustained by the evidence. This finding, however, is immaterial. The right to offset the judgment against her share was not dependent upon her insolvency.

Appellant complains of rulings of the lower court refusing to admit in evidence certain papers offered for the stated purpose of showing that the wife was not indebted to the estate at the time of distribution, but that said estate was indebted to her. There was nothing in the record to indicate what the offered papers in fact showed in this regard—nothing to indicate they were at all material to the questions stated, viz., the indebtedness of the wife. Where a party seeks to show error on the part of the court in excluding evidence, he must make his bill of exceptions show the materiality of the proposed evidence, for error will not be presumed. This is specially true of writings offered in evidence, where, unless the offered papers are set forth or some statement is made in the bill as to their contents, it is impossible to ascertain whether they in fact bore upon the questions in issue on the trial. What is said as to these offers in the record and in appellant's brief shows, furthermore, that the evidence sought to be introduced was of matters preceding in date the trial and decree in the foreclosure action of Ambrose v. Drew, supra, whereby the fact and amount of indebtedness were finally determined against the wife. There was no pretense that, if such decree were correct, any of the indebtedness thereby declared had been paid.

Appellant complains of a ruling of the court admitting in evidence a paper executed by the wife shortly prior to the distribution, purporting to assign to the four sons of deceased all her interest in the residue of said estate. This ruling could not have affected appellant prejudicially. If the purported assignment had not been received in evidence, it would still be true that appellant could not have obtained any relief. The conclusion that, by reason of the judgment against her, the wife was entitled to no portion of the residue, leaves him without any right as to any portion of such residue.

This disposes of all the points made by appellant against the correctness of the action of the lower court.

The decree of distribution appealed from is affirmed.

In re WASHBURN'S ESTATE.

(S. F. 4,320.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—DISTRIBUTION—SETTLEMENT.

The court, on petition of distributees and over the objection of creditors of an estate, will not arrest the course of administration, charge the assets with a lien for unpaid debts, legacies, and expenses, discharge the administrator, and direct distribution, where the money necessary to pay debts, legacies, and expenses of administration is not proffered in court, and the only offer to pay the same is "on the decree of distribution being granted," and not as a condition thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Application by Jeanie W. Higgins for final distribution of the estate of Albert Henry Washburn, deceased, to which E. P. and John S. Washburn filed objections. From an order denying the application, and denying petitioner's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied November 8, 1905.

A. Everett Ball and J. M. Corcoran, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson and Congdon & Congdon, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying the petition of Jeanie W. Higgins for distribution of the estate of Albert Henry Washburn, deceased, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial in the proceeding. The following is a statement of the material facts established by the record and the findings of the court: The deceased by his will bequeathed some small specific money legacies to certain persons named, and gave all the residue of his estate to Edward P. Washburn, John S. Washburn, and Jay B. Cook, in trust during the lives of his wife, Jean Bruce Washburn, and his daughter, Jeanie W. Higgins, to manage, control, invest, and reinvest the same, according to their own judgment, and to pay the net income thereof to his wife and daughter in equal shares during the lives of both, and thereafter to the survivor during her life, and upon the death of the survivor that the trust should cease and the property should thereupon vest in Henrietta and Charles Higgins, children of his daughter aforesaid, and in such other children as should be born to her, or such of them as were then living, share and share alike. The parties named as trustees were also made executors of the will. Cook renounced as executor, and the two Washburns were duly appointed and qualified. The estate was all community property, and his widow transferred and conveyed to the petitioner, Jeanie W. Higgins, the entire one-half thereof, being the one-half which, as community property, vested in said widow, and was not subject to testamentary disposition. Thereafter the widow died, and the petitioner, being thereupon entitled to the whole of the income of the residue, under the terms of the trust, relinquished and surrendered all of her rights under the trust to her said children, Henrietta and Charles. She claims that this surrender operated as a merger, and clothed the two children with the absolute present title to all of the estate that was disposed of by the will; that is to say, to the one-half thereof. A final account of the executors had been settled, the decree settling the same showed that there was but $819 cash on hand, and that the bulk of the estate consisted of shares of stock in two corporations, known as the Yosemite Stage & Turnpike Company and the Wawona Hotel Company, the value not appearing, and that there was $4,000 unpaid on the legacies, $12,839.02 unpaid on the claim of E. P. Washburn as a creditor, and $1,713.14 unpaid on the claim of John S. Washburn as a creditor, both of which claims were due and had been regularly allowed. There were also due to them as executors their costs of administration, including commissions. These costs were not mentioned in the final account, and had not been settled or allowed, but the findings state that they were due and unpaid. Henrietta and Charles Higgins were minors, and the petitioner was their duly appointed guardian. The two Washburns appeared as creditors, and, in that capacity, objected to any final distribution of the estate; their objections being based on the ground that their debts were unpaid. They also objected, as executors, on the ground that the debts and legacies were unpaid, that their commissions as executors and other expenses of administration were due, owing, and unpaid, and that there was not sufficient money on hand to pay the same. More than one year had elapsed since the first publication of notice to creditors, and the findings are that the estate was in a condition to be closed and distributed as soon as the legacies, debts, and costs of administration were settled and paid, but that, unless by a sale, which none of the interested parties desired, the only means of paying these sums was the income of the property, of which a sufficient amount for that purpose had not yet accumulated.

The petitioner claimed that she was entitled, absolutely, to one half of the property, and that her two children were entitled absolutely to the other half, both being subject to the payments of the debts, legacies, and costs of administration, and she asked distribution accordingly, and offered to pay the above charges upon a decree of distribution as prayed for being granted. Section 1663 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, after one year from the issuance of letters, an heir, a devisee, or legatee may have his portion of the estate distributed to him, if the estate is but little indebted, and it can be done without loss to the creditors, provided such party give a proper bond as security for his share of the debts, or, if the debts are secured by a sufficient mortgage on real estate, distribution may be ordered without bond. Provisions of like character, in which a bond is made indispensable, are found in sections 1658 to 1661, inclusive. The proceeding here involved does not come under either of these statutory provisions. It purports to be an application for a final distribution of all the property of the estate, without bond or security for the debts. The real proposal of the petitioner is that all the property be turned over to the distributees, subject to the debts, legacies, and expenses, that the executors be discharged, and that said distributees shall undertake to complete the process of administration of the estate by paying the said debts, legacies, and expenses.

Under the circumstances of this case the court properly refused to make the distribution prayed for. Where the creditors and other parties entitled to the payment of money in due course of administration consent that the administration be closed and that the property of the estate be distributed to the persons entitled, without the payment of such claims, but subject to a lien therefor, doubtless the court, in its discretion, and upon request of the persons entitled to distribution, may make an order accordingly. And under the sections above referred to, where the debts are secured by mortgage or by a bond approved by the court, a person entitled to distribution may have his portion distributed to him, although the creditors do not consent thereto. This may possibly be the case, even if such person be the sole heir and entitled to the entire estate, although this is a question we do not decide. In all such cases, however, the administration is not closed, but continues for the payment of the debts and expenses of administration. But we know of no authority for the proposition that the court, upon petition of the distributees, and over the objection of the creditors or without their consent, may arrest the course of administration, charge the assets with a lien for the unpaid debts, legacies, and expenses, discharge the administrator from further duties respecting the estate, and deliver the property of the estate to the heirs, residuary legatees, or devisees, burdened only with the charge for the sums due, to be paid at the will of the distributees, or when they are compelled to do so by a suit to enforce the lien. If it be contended that this extreme course was not proposed, and that the petitioner asked only a conditional decree that the executors deliver the property to the distributees upon condition that the distributees should concurrently pay to the executors the amounts due for legacies, debts, and costs of administration, and it be conceded that, in a proper case, such a decree might be made, still it could not be done here, for the costs of administration were unsettled and uncertain. The estate was not in a condition to have the administration closed. It may be admitted that, if the necessary money had been proffered in court, the court might, in its discretion, have then and there proceeded to settle the commissions and costs, and, having done so, directed the payment of the money on the one hand, and the distribution of the estate on the other hand, to the parties entitled. No such course was pursued or proposed. The offer was to pay the debts, etc., "on the decree of distribution being granted," which means after the granting of the decree and at some indefinite time in the future. This construction of the findings as to the offer is shown to be correct by the evidence, which was to the effect that the only payment offered was one to be made subsequently at a bank in San Francisco. One of the principal objects of administration is the payment of the debts of the deceased. For that purpose, the assets are subjected to the jurisdiction of the court, and to that extent it is a proceeding for the benefit of the creditors. Each creditor is entitled to have the proceeding kept on foot and the property kept in legal custody, until his debt is paid, or secured in some manner provided in the statute, and he cannot be required to yield this right and accept a lien or charge on the property to be enforced in some new and independent proceeding.

We do not consider it necessary to discuss or determine the question whether or not the transfer by the petitioner of her interest under the trust to the two children now born to her caused a merger of the whole estate in the property in the said children, so as to terminate the trust and authorize a distribution of the absolute title to those two, subject to be opened to let in as part owners children who may be hereafter born to petitioner, who may be living at her death.

The judgment denying distribution and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

STATE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY. (Sac. 1,409.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. WILLS—PARTIES ENTITLED TO CONTEST.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1307, providing that any person interested may appear in proceedings for the probate of a will and contest the will, a party to be entitled to appear must have some interest in the estate which may be affected by the probate of the proposed will.

2. SAME—STATEMENT OF CONTEST—INTEREST OF CONTESTANT—SUFFICIENCY OF SHOWING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1307, provides that any person interested may appear in probate proceedings and contest a will. Civ. Code, § 670, provides that all property of which there is no owner belongs to the state. Sections 672 and 1404 provide that a nonresident alien who takes by succession must appear and claim the property within five years from the time of succession or be barred. Held, that a statement of contest of a will presented by the state, and alleging by way of legal conclusion merely that the state is the only party entitled by law to the proceeds of the estate, does not show that the decedent died without heirs or that such heirs are nonresident aliens, so that the state would have an immediate present or future contingent interest in the property, such as to entitle it to contest the will.

3. Same.

Nor does a petition for the probate of a will filed by the public administrator, alleging that deceased has no heirs residing in the state of California, show any such interest in the estate.

4. Same—Statement of Contest.

A paper filed in probate proceedings, addressed to the public administrator and others claiming an interest, and purporting to give notice that the state claims the estate in the matter of which the paper is filed, on the ground that the decedent died without leaving any heirs at law or next of kin, has no proper place in the files of the case, is not a pleading recognized by law, and cannot be accepted in lieu of allegations that should have been contained in the statement of contest of decedent's will which the law requires contestant to file.

5. Same—Allegation of Statement.

A notice that the state claims property of a decedent's estate on the ground that the decedent left no surviving heirs is not equivalent to an allegation of the fact that he left no surviving heirs.

6. Same—Persons Entitled to Contest—Interest in Estate.

The possibility that all of the heirs of a decedent or some one of them may fail to appear and claim the property, so that thereupon the Attorney General may proceed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1269, to declare an escheat, and that no heir may then or within 20 years after judgment appear to claim the property or its proceeds, so that absolute ownership will vest in the state under sections 1271, 1272, does not give the state an interest in the estate of the decedent, within the meaning of section 1307, authorizing any person interested in an estate to appear in probate proceedings and contest the will.

In Bank. Mandamus proceedings by the state against the superior court of Sacramento county. Dismissed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and L. T. Hatfield, for the State. A. L. Shinn, R. L. Shinn, and Clinton L. White, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The state of California, by the Attorney General, by an original proceeding in this court, applies for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of Sacramento county to allow the state of California to appear in said court as contestant in a proceeding therein pending for the probate of a document alleged to be the last will of one Fritz Miller, deceased. Section 1307 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in such a proceeding any person interested may appear and contest the will. It is a necessary condition to the right of any party to appear that such party shall have some interest in the estate which may be affected by the probate of the proposed will. Waiving for the purposes of the decision all other objections to the granting of the writ, we think it must be denied, for the reason that the application made to the superior court does not show that the state of California possesses an interest in the estate of Fritz Miller sufficient to make it a proper party to the proceeding for the probate of his will. It was claimed on the argument that Fritz Miller died without heirs or next of kin, or that, if he left any kin, they were nonresident aliens, and that the state would have, in the former case, an immediate present interest in the property, as provided in section 670 of the Civil Code, or, in the latter case, a future contingent interest, to become vested in the event that such aliens fail to appear and claim the property within five years, as provided in sections 672 and 1404 of the Civil Code, and that either interest is sufficient to give the right to maintain a contest of the will. In support of this position counsel cites State ex rel. Donovan v. District Court, 25 Mont. 355, 65 Pac. 120, which appears to be precisely in point. The proposition may be conceded, but the facts upon which it rests are not shown to exist by any proper pleading or averment. The proposed statement of contest, which the state presented to the superior court and offered to file, contains no allegation on the subject. It merely states the legal conclusion that, under the will executed under date of February 13, 1905, the state of California is the only party entitled by law to the proceeds of the estate. The petition for the probate of the will, which was filed by the public administrator, states that "the deceased had no heirs residing in the state of California." It does not aver that there were no heirs residing elsewhere, nor that the heirs, or any of them, were aliens. The only document which the petitioner here offered to file in the superior court, containing any statement of fact on the subject, was a paper, entitled in the said superior court and in the estate of Fritz Miller, deceased, signed by the Attorney General and by L. T. Hatfield, attorney, addressed to the public administrator and others claiming an interest, purporting to be a notice that the state of California claims the entire estate upon certain stated grounds, among which was the statement that Fritz Miller "died without leaving surviving him any heirs at law or next of kin." This document had no proper place in the files of the case, is not a pleading recognized by law, and cannot be accepted in lieu of an allegation that should have been contained in the statement of contest, or "written grounds of opposition to the probate," which the law requires the contestant to file. Furthermore, a notice that the state claims the property, on the ground that the deceased left no surviving heirs, is not an allegation of the fact that he left no surviving heirs. It is a presumption of law that a person has next of kin who will succeed to his estate upon his death, leaving no will. People v. Roach, 76 Cal. 297, 18 Pac. 407. The contrary, if it is relied on to establish a right, must be shown affirmatively.

Upon this condition of the record the only ground upon which the state can claim that it has an interest sufficient to authorize it to maintain the contest is that, although the deceased did leave surviving heirs in whom, if the will is invalid, the title to his property has vested, and who are not aliens whose title will be forfeited by escheat if they do not claim the property within five years, yet that there is a possibility that all the heirs, or some one of them, may fail to appear and claim the property, that thereupon proceedings may be instituted, under section 1269, Code Civ. Proc., to declare an escheat, and that no heir entitled may then, or within 20 years after judgment therein, appear to claim the property or its proceeds, and thereupon the state may take as absolute owner. Code Civ. Proc., §§ 1271, 1272. We do not think this remote and contingent possibility, or series of successive possibilities, constitutes an interest which will authorize the party, having nothing more substantial, to maintain a contest of a will.

The petition is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

HARRISON v. COLGAN, State Controller.

(S. F. 4,375.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 9, 1905.)

1. JUDGES—SALARIES—CHANGE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 17, providing that the compensation of justices of the Supreme Court shall not be increased or diminished after their election, nor during the term for which they have been elected, the salary of existing judges of such court during their term could only be changed by constitutional amendment.

2. SAME — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — CONSTITUTIONALITY.

St. 1905, p. 224, c. 249, amending Pol. Code, § 736, raising the annual salary of each justice of the Supreme Court to $8,000, and of each justice of the District Courts of Appeal to $7,000, construed in connection with Const. art. 6, § 17, prohibiting the increase or diminishing of the salary of a justice of the Supreme Court during his term, operated only to increase the salary of such judges as were thereafter elected to a regular term, leaving section 736 before amendment, fixing such salary at $6,000, in force in the meantime.

3. SAME — JUDGES OF DISTRICT COURTS OF APPEAL—SALARIES.

Const. art. 6, as amended November 8, 1904 (St. 1905, p. xxxiv) established District Courts of Appeal, and provided that the salaries of the judges should be the same as those of justices of the Supreme Court. Pol. Code, § 736, fixed the salary of Supreme Court judges at $6,000, and Const. art. 6 § 17, prohibited the increase thereof during the term for which they shall have been elected, and St. 1905, p. 224, c. 249, amended Pol. Code, § 736, by raising the salary of the justice of the Supreme Court to $8,000. Held that, as no justice of the Supreme Court was entitled to more than $6,000 during his present term, the justices of the District Courts of Appeal were limited to that sum until the next succeeding election of a Supreme Court justice to a regular term.

4. SAME—TERM OF OFFICE.

Const. art. 6, as amended November 8, 1904 (St. 1905, p. xxxiv), created District Courts of Appeal with terms of office and salaries the same as justices of the Supreme Court, and provided that on ratification by the people of the amendment the Governor should appoint nine persons to serve as justices of such courts until January, 1907. Held, that the preliminary term of the office of justice of the District Court of Appeal began to run from the adoption of the constitutional amendment, regardless of the date of the appointment of the incumbents, and such amendment, having been adopted prior to the amendment of Pol. Code, § 736, by St. 1905, p. 224, c. 249, increasing the salary of justices of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal, was inapplicable to persons appointed to fill such preliminary term as justices of the District Courts of Appeal, under Const. art. 6, § 17, prohibiting the increase of the compensation of justices of the Supreme Court during their term.

5. STATUTES—ENACTMENT—EFFECT—TIME.

St. 1905, p. 224, c. 249, amending Pol. Code, § 736, by raising the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court and of the several District Courts of Appeal, having been passed without an emergency clause, was of no force until 60 days after its passage, as provided by Pol. Code, § 323, so that it did not apply to judges of the District Courts of Appeal appointed after such amendment had been passed and approved by the Governor, but before the expiration of such 60 days, under Const. art. 6, § 17, made applicable to the District Courts of Appeal, prohibiting the increase of the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court during their term.

6. SAME—ENACTMENT—FORCE.

Const. art. 4, § 16, declaring the procedure required for the enactment of a law, has no application to the time when a bill duly enacted shall become operative as a law.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Petition by Ralph C. Harrison for a writ of mandate against E. P. Colgan as Controller of the state of California. Writ denied.

See 81 Pac. 1010.

Charles W. Slack, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an original proceeding in this court to compel the State Controller to issue a warrant on the state treasury in favor of the plaintiff for his salary as justice of the District Court of Appeals of the Second District for the month of June, 1905. The plaintiff demanded compensation for that month at the rate of $8,000 a year, which the defendant refused. The proceeding is really begun on behalf of all the present justices of the District Courts of Appeal for the purpose of obtaining a determination of the question whether the annual salary of the incumbents of that office, after the taking effect of the act of March 18, 1905, and prior to the first Monday after the first day of January, 1907, is $8,000, or $6,000.

The amendments to article 6 of the Constitution, adopted at the general election on November 8, 1904 (St. 1905, p. xxxiv), established three new courts, styled District Courts of Appeal, and provided that there should be three justices of each of said courts. It further provided that "their terms of office and salaries shall be the same as those of justices of the Supreme Court," and that, "Upon the ratification by the people of this amendment, the Governor shall appoint nine persons to serve as justices of the District Courts of Appeal until the first Monday after the first day of January in the year 1907. * * * At the election in the year 1906 nine of such justices shall be elected"—and that the justices so elected for each district should classify themselves, so that one should go out of office in 4 years, one in 8, and one in 12 years from January, 1907. At the time this amendment was adopted the law provided that "the annual salary of each justice of the Supreme Court is six thousand dollars." Pol. Code, § 736, enacted March 12, 1872, and in force by virtue of section 11, art. 22, of the Constitution of 1879, continuing in force "All laws relating to the present judicial system of the state." The Constitution also then contained a provision in section 17 of article 6, which was continued and made also applicable to the justices of the District Courts of Appeal by the amendment that the compensation of the justices of the Supreme Court "shall not be increased or diminished after their election, nor during the term for which they shall have been elected." The Governor delayed making the appointments of justices of the District Courts of Appeal until April 10, 1905, at which time he appointed nine persons to those offices, including the plaintiff, and each of them immediately qualified and have ever since been acting as such justices. The act of March 18, 1905, under which, in connection with the provision of the Constitution first above quoted, the plaintiff claims the increased salary, is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Section seven hundred and thirty-six of the Political Code of the state of California is hereby amended so as to read as follows: 736. The annual salary of each justice of the Supreme Court is eight thousand dollars; and the annual salary of each justice of the several District Courts of Appeal is seven thousand dollars." St. 1905, p. 224, c. 249. The act contained no emergency clause, and hence, under section 323 of the Political Code, it did not take effect as law until May 17, 1905, 60 days after its passage. Of the terms of the seven justices of the Supreme Court in office at the time of the ratification of the constitutional amendment in question, two will expire in January, 1907, two in January, 1911, and three in January, 1915. The foregoing are the principal constitutional and statutory provisions affecting the question for consideration.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the latter clause of the amended section (Section 736 of the Political Code), fixing the salaries of the justices of the District Courts of Appeal at $7,000, is in conflict with the provision of the constitutional amendment of 1904, to the effect that the salaries of those justices shall be "the same" as those of the Supreme Court justices, and is therefore void, and the only effective part of the section is the provision fixing the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court at $8,000; that this increase of the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court, by virtue of the last-mentioned constitutional provision, also acts upon the salaries of the justices of the District Courts of Appeal, and gives a like increase to them; that the terms of the latter justices did not begin to run until the date of their appointment, April 10, 1905; that at that time the amended section 736, aforesaid, had been passed by both houses of the Legislature and approved by the Governor, and nothing remained to make it effective as law, except the lapse of the required 60 days from the time of its approval; that under these circumstances the salaries of the justices of the District Courts of Appeal must be deemed to have been increased before the term for which they were appointed had begun, and before their appointment, and not during such term or after such appointment; and that the law, so construed, does not transgress the constitutional restriction upon an increase of salaries, and it therefore became applicable to the newly appointed justices as soon as it took effect, although the latter event happened after the terms began.

1. Under the constitutional prohibition of any increase in the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court after their election or during the term, it is impossible for the Legislature to increase the salary of any justice of that court until January, 1907. Such salary could, of course, be changed at any time by means of a constitutional amendment. Such an amendment is to be submitted for adoption at the general election in 1906. But, even if adopted, it does not purport to affect salaries which become due in the meantime, and in any event it does not affect the present question. The salary of each justice is, and without such amendment will continue to be during his present term, $6,000 a year. The amendment, if adopted, will change it for the time elapsing after its adoption, but not before. What, then, are the salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court to which those of the District Court justices must, for the present, conform? Clearly not the salaries which may hereafter be payable under the amended statute when a new term of some of the justices of the Supreme Court shall have begun, but the present salaries now allowed and paid to them by law. The justices of the district courts can, upon their own theory, claim nothing under the provision expressly made for them by the amending statute, but only by virtue of the clause which acts directly upon the office of justice of the Supreme Court. The purpose of the constitutional provision that the salaries of the justices of the respective courts should be the same was, presumably, to preserve a similar standard of capacity in the two courts. It could not have been intended that a law raising the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court, but inoperative as to present justices, owing to the prohibition of an increase during their terms, should, nevertheless, be operative in the meantime upon the justices of the District Courts of Appeal, who are not referred to therein, and who can take only under the provision operative upon the justices of the Supreme Court who may be hereafter elected. The effect of the statute upon the justices of the Districe Courts of Appeal being secondary only, and dependent on its first having some actual application to some at least, of the justices of the Supreme Court, it must, for the time being, be held inoperative upon all alike. It must be taken in connection with the constitutional limitations upon such legislation, and the two must be harmonized, if possible. So far as, by its language, it would appear to apply to existing terms and present incumbents, it is unconstitutional and void. To make the two harmonious, and give the statute some effect, it must be read as if it declared that "the annual salary of each justice of the Supreme Court hereafter elected to a regular term shall be eight thousand dollars." The amended section, applying in terms to the Supreme Court justices, although an existing statute, is not in force, because there is no subject upon which it can constitutionally operate. It remains in abeyance, and must so remain until the beginning of the next ensuing regular term of the office of justice of the Supreme Court. In the meantime the only effective law fixing the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court is the original section 736 of the Political Code, fixing them at $6,000 a year, and to this the justices of the District Courts of Appeal must, in the meantime, conform, in order that their salaries shall be the same as those of the justices of the Supreme Court.

2. We are further of the opinion that the preliminary term of the office of justice of the District Court of Appeal began to run as soon as that office was created by the adoption of the amendment of 1904 to the Constitution. Immediately upon the taking effect of the amendment, and without any regard whatever to the appointment of any person as justice thereof, the District Courts of Appeal became existing courts to which appeals could be taken, and the offices of justices thereof became existing offices to which persons could be appointed. A preliminary term extending to January 7, 1907, immediately began to run, and vacancies in the offices were at once created. These vacancies might have been filled at any time thereafter by the appointment of persons to hold the respective offices for the unexpired part of the preliminary terms then running. There would have been no serious contention that this preliminary period did not constitute a term, if a time had been expressly mentioned for it to begin, or if it had been designated as a "term" in the amendment. The effect, however, is the same. The office began to exist at a time fixed, namely, upon the ratification of the amendment; the end of the time of service of the first appointees was fixed; and this constituted a "term" in fact as effectually as if it had been called by that name. If we should concede that the increase could apply to the justices of the District Courts before it became applicable to any justice of the Supreme Court, and should then hold, as here contended, that the term did not begin to run until there was an appointee, it would follow that the conditions would have been such that the Governor could have so arranged the time of making the several appointments, with respect to the passage of the act, that some of the justices would be entitled to the increased salary and others would not, or, by an early appointment, could have prevented any of them from receiving it, or, by deferring all appointments until after May 17th, could have secured it to all of them. And this possibility might have induced some concert of action between him and the members of the Legislature, and the attempt to exercise improper influences by expectant candidates for the offices. We are far from supposing that such things would or could have done or attempted by any of the persons concerned. But restrictions of this character are made with a view to preventing such conduct under any possible administration or circumstances, and must be construed accordingly. It is only with respect to the effect upon the proper construction of the provision that we mention these possibilities. They furnish as weighty reasons for the application of the restriction to the preliminary term, and for holding that that term began with the office rather than with the appointment of an incumbent thereto, as those assigned for the application thereof to the regular terms. In State v. Parker, 30 La. Ann. 1183, in considering a statute creating an office with a regular term to be filled by appointment, but not fixing the time of its commencement, the court says: "The 'office' commenced its existence on the 5th of March, 1870, and in the absence of provisions to the contrary, as an incident thereto, 'the term' commenced at the same time that the office did. There is no more reason for saying that the commencement of the term was suspended until there was an appointee than there is for saying that the existence or commencement of the office itself was suspended. Neither the existence of the office nor the running of the term depended upon the appointment of an occupant." The justices were appointed to serve for the unexpired part of the preliminary term for which they were appointed. It is a settled rule regarding such restrictions that they forbid any increase during a term, regardless of the fact that different persons may successively hold for successive parts of the term, so that one who is elected or appointed after a part of such term has expired cannot have an increase made after the term began, though prior to his election or appointment. Larew v. Newman, 81 Cal. 590, 23 Pac. 227; Storke v. Goux, 129 Cal. 526, 62 Pac. 68. The effect is that no justice of the District Court of Appeal serving any part of the preliminary term, is entitled to more than $6,000 a year, no matter when the first appointment for such term was made. In Brodie v. Campbell, 17 Cal. 18, a case where the law, creating the office of district judge, fixed a preliminary term to be filled by appointment, to be followed by a regular term of six years, but fixed no time for the beginning of the regular term, nor for the ending of the preliminary term, except by the rather indefinite provision that the first appointee should hold "till the next general election, when a judge shall be elected by the qualified voters of the district," it was held that the term of the first appointee ended, and that of the duly elected successor began, on the day when the successor qualified as such. The case was decided upon the peculiar language of the act, and we do not think it applicable to the point we are now considering.

3. If, however, it is conceded that the respective terms of the respective justices of the District Courts of Appeal ending in January, 1907, did not begin until they were respectively appointed, we are, nevertheless, of the opinion that the amended section 736 of the Political Code does not affect their salaries during that term. The decisions are uniform in this state, that, until the time arrives when it is to take effect and be in force, a statute which has been passed by both houses of the Legislature and approved by the Governor has no force whatever for any purpose, and all acts purporting to have been done under it prior to that time are void. People v. Johnston, 6 Cal. 674; Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 145, 8 Pac. 813; Santa Cruz W. Co. v. Kron, 74 Cal. 223, 15 Pac. 772. The amended section 736, increasing the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court, did not become law, or have any effect, until May 17, 1905. It is admitted that prior to that time the respective justices of the District Courts of Appeal received and were entitled to a salary at the rate of only $6,000 a year. To allow them a salary of $8,000 a year from and after that time would be to increase their salary during the term for which they were appointed, and by a statute which did not become law until after that term began. It is said in support of the plaintiff's theory on this point that the purpose of the constitutional inhibition was solely to prevent the possibility of an officer using the power and influence of his official position to obtain an increase of compensation after his term begins, and that, as this could not be done where the steps necessary to the passage of such a law are complete before the term has begun, the prohibition should not be applied to such a statute. It cannot be truly said that this was the sole purpose of the prohibitory clause. We have seen that it would be possible for such an increase to be made by arrangement with the appointing power and the Legislature, at the instance of candidates who have been assured of their appointments and for their benefit, and that this also furnishes a reason for the prohibition. It is true that, so far as this object is concerned, the restriction could easily have been evaded in the present instance, conceding that the term had not begun, by including in the statute a clause making it take effect immediately. The fact that this was not done, and that there was at least a reasonable expectation that the appointments would be made before the amendment to the Code would be in force, raises a strong presumption that the Legislature did not suppose that the act would affect the salaries of the appointees if there was no emergency clause, and did not desire that it should. But in any event the Constitution plainly forbids an increase during the term, and no exception is made in favor of a law passed before the term begins, but not in force until afterwards. We cannot hold it inapplicable to the present law merely for the reason that one of the grounds which may have induced its insertion in the Constitution is not applicable to the present case, particularly where the other grounds would or might be peculiarly applicable. The provisions of our Constitution are therein expressly declared to be mandatory and prohibitory. The case of Stuhr v. Hoboken, 47 N. J. Law, 147, which holds the contrary with respect to a similar prohibition contained in a city charter, is not a very well-considered case, is not consistent with the decisions of this court above cited that a statute not in force is absolutely ineffective, and does not meet with our approval. There is nothing in section 16 of article 4 of the Constitution to the effect that an act of the Legislature is of any force before the time when it is declared to be in force by the statute itself. That section merely declares what procedure is required for the enactment of a law, and does not attempt to specify the time when the bill thereby enacted shall pass to the state of an operative law.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; LORIGAN, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment. While I am entirely satisfied that under the existing law no justice of the Supreme Court now in office can receive the increase of salary provided for by the amendment to section 736 of the Political Code during the term for which he was elected, and that consequently, until January, 1907, there can be no justice of said court who will actually receive more than $6,000 per annum, I am not satisfied that this fact alone would bar the present justice of the District Courts of Appeal from receiving the increased salary, if the act increasing the salary had gone into effect prior to their appointment, and prior to the commencement of the term for which they were appointed. If the amendment to section 736 of the Political Code is a valid enactment at all, it undoubtedly fixes the legal salary of justices of this court at $8,000 per annum, and the mere fact that other provisions preclude any resent member of this court from receiving the increase during his term does not make it any the less true that $8,000 is the salary fixed by law for justices of the Supreme Court. The Constitution provides that the salaries of justices of the District Courts of Appeal "shall be the same as those of justices of the Supreme Court," and it may well be contended that by virtue of this provision any justice of the District Court of Appeal, elected or appointed after the taking effect of the amendment, and whose term of office commences after such taking effect, would be entitled to receive the legal salary fixed thereby—in other words, that such amendment acts equally and uniformly upon justices of the Supreme Court and justices of the District Courts of Appeal, and applies to all justices of either court who are elected or appointed for a new term after the amendatory act became a law. I am, however, fully satisfied that the term for which the present justices of the District Courts of Appeal were appointed commenced with the adoption of the constitutional amendment, and therefore before the act increasing the salaries was enacted by the Legislature. The Constitution prohibiting an increase of salary during the term for which they were appointed, legislation subsequent to the commencement of the term could not affect them.

I am also satisfied that, inasmuch as the law fixing the salary did not take effect until after the justices were actually appointed by the Governor, it could not operate to affect them. The salary fixed by law at the time of their appointment was only $6,000, and this could not be subsequently increased as to them, except by constitutional amendment.

I concur in all that is said in the opinion as to these two grounds, and therefore concur in the judgment denying the petition for a writ of mandate.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent, and think that petitioner is entitled to a salary of $8,000 per annum. My views on the subject are, briefly, these:

The Constitution provides that the salaries of justices of the District Courts of Appeal "shall be the same as those of justices of the Supreme Court," and by the act of March 18, 1905, it is enacted that "the annual salary of each justice of the Supreme Court is $8,000." There is no doubt, therefore, that the annual salary of justices of the Supreme Court as fixed by law is $8,000, leaving out of view, for the present, the proposition that certain individual justices may be precluded from receiving that amount on account of the provision that the salaries of justices "shall not be increased or diminished after their election nor during the term for which they shall have been elected." The whole law existing to day touching the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court commenced with the adoption of the Constitution of 1878. This Constitution deals with the whole subject of the salaries of justices and judges of the new courts which it creates, and necessarily covers that whole subject; and, of course, statutes about the salaries of justices of former courts are no longer of any significance. As to the salaries of the judges of the new superior courts, its provision is that, "until otherwise changed by the Legislature the superior court judges shall receive an annual salary of $3,000 each." But the provision as to salaries of justices of the Supreme Court is materially different. It is that "during the term of the first judges elected under this Constitution the annual salaries of the justices of the Supreme Court shall be $6,000 each." It does not provide that such salaries shall continue until otherwise provided by the Legislature. It does not provide at all for salaries of justices who shall be elected after the first term. It leaves that for the Legislature, whose duty it was to provide for the salaries of said future justices. The Legislature, however, neglected that duty until March 18, 1905. And when, at the last-named date, the Legislature did perform that duty by fixing the salary at $8,000, the salary was not thereby "increased." It simply for the first time fixed the salary, not by increasing an existing salary, for there was none, but by remedying the former neglect to fix any salary at all. The fact that, from the time when the provision of the Constitution as to the salaries of the first justices ceased, the state, without any law on the subject, paid the justices certain compensation, does not in any way affect the validity of the above views.

This subject would, of course, be a delicate one for the justices of this court to handle, if their salaries were involved; but the case at bar involves only the salaries of justices of the District Courts of Appeal. It may be noticed, however, that the opposite view would leave the salaries of the District Appellate justices in confusion for many years, unless the people next year adopt a pending constitutional amendment. According to the prevailing opinion, those justices are not to receive the salary fixed, generally, by law as the salary of the justices of the Supreme court, but only such salary as the latter justices are actually receiving under the provision against increasing salaries. Does that mean the salary which a majority of such justices are receiving, or the salary which any of them are receiving? In January, 1907, there will be two newly elected justices of the Supreme Court who will not be subject to the provision against increasing salaries, and they will undoubtedly be entitled to the $8,000 salary. But at that time the other five members of this court will, under the rule announced, be entitled to only $6,000; and at that time will the newly elected justices of the district courts of appeal be entitled to the $8,000 received by two of the Supreme Court justices, or will they be deprived of the $8,000 until 1911, when a majority of the Supreme Court justices will be entitled to receive the $8,000? In my opinion the Constitution clearly intends that after the expiration of the term of the first justices of the Supreme Court the entire matter of their salaries shall rest with the Legislature, subject only to the provision that after the Legislature had once fixed the salary any increase which it should afterwards make should not affect those already in office during their terms.

1. HOMESTEAD — SURVIVORSHIP—CONVEYANCE BY HUSBAND.

In the absence of the abandonment of a homestead by the concurrent act of both parties in the mode prescribed by Civ. Code, §§ 1242, 1243, the wife being entitled to the property absolutely in case she survived her husband, a deed to the property executed to her by the husband alone, in consideration of her promise to preserve the property for the husband's brother after her death, conveyed nothing.

2. TRUSTS—CREATION.

Where a husband's separate deed to his wife of property occupied by them as their homestead, in consideration of her promise to hold the same for another after her death, did not increase the wife's estate in the property on her surviving her husband, she did not hold the same under a constructive trust, under Civ. Code, § 2224, creating a constructive trust in property "acquired by fraud."

3. HOMESTEAD—INCUMBRANCE.

The title to homestead property vested jointly in husband and wife cannot, during the lives of both, be conveyed, incumbered or impaired in favor of a third party, except by a single written instrument executed and acknowledged personally by both husband and wife, as provided by Civ. Code, §§ 1242, 1243.

4. TRUSTS—CREATION.

A letter written by a widow to the brother of her deceased husband, that her home was a gift to her, with a promise that, when she was through with it, it should be given to the brother, was insufficient to create an express trust in the property for the brother's benefit, under Civ. Code, § 2222, providing that a voluntary trust is created by any words indicating with reasonable certainty an acceptance of the trust or an acknowledgment made on a sufficient consideration of its existence and the subject thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Hannah Ann Loomis against E. H. Loomis and others. From a judgment denying a portion of the relief demanded, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Reversed.

R. E. Ragland and E. A. Bridgford, for appellant. Joseph Hutchinson, Frank Otis, and W. B. Treadwell, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to quiet her title to a parcel of real property in San Francisco, found to be of the value of $5,000, and to have declared void, upon the ground that the execution of the same was procured by undue influence, a certain deed executed by her to defendant Mary Hawley, in trust to receive the rents and profits of the property, to pay therefrom the taxes, insurance, and repairs, and to pay the balance thereof to the use of plaintiff during her life, and upon her death "to convey the said property in fee simple absolute" to one E. H. Loomis. The trial court found against plaintiff upon her allegations of undue influence, but determined that the deed of trust was void under the decision of this court in Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70. The correctness of this determination is not disputed here. The trial court, however, found that, notwithstanding the invalidity of said deed of trust, plaintiff was not the owner of any interest in said land other than an estate for her life therein, and that, subject to said estate for life, defendant E. H. Loomis was the owner of "an estate in fee in remainder of said property, commencing at the death of said plaintiff." Judgment having been entered accordingly, the plaintiff appeals from the whole of the judgment, except that portion thereof relating to the invalidity of the deed of trust, and also from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The theory of counsel for defendant Loomis, adopted by the learned judge of the court below, appears to be that by reason of a certain transaction between plaintiff and her husband, Barney Loomis, on January 6, 1900, plaintiff received said property from her husband, solely in trust to receive the rents and profits of the same during her life, and that upon her death the said property should vest in fee in said E. H. Loomis, a brother of her husband. The transaction in question, viewed in the light of the evidence most favorable to defendant, was as follows, viz.: On January 6, 1900, the husband, Barney Loomis, executed and delivered to plaintiff what purported to be an absolute conveyance of said property, which purported to be made in consideration of love and affection. This deed was in fact executed by the husband only upon the promise of his wife that she would contract "to reserve this property for my brother." The wife agreed to this, and thereupon drew up and signed a writing wherein she stated, according to the evidence of a witness who was present, the writing not being produced, "that she would reserve and hold this property for the brother of her husband." On February 2, 1900, the said husband died. On February 5, 1900, she wrote a letter to said brother, in which, after speaking of the death and burial of her husband, she said: "This home is a gift to myself with the promise that, when I am through with it, it shall be given to his brother, Edwin, who proved himself the best friend to him he ever found." On February 16, 1900, she executed the void deed of trust, hereinbefore referred to, indicating her understanding of the terms and conditions upon which she had received the deed from her husband. It is claimed by defendants that the foregoing evidence sufficiently shows a constructive trust, in accord with the doctrine of Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186, Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. 259, 32 Pac. 171, and similar cases, relating to transactions between husband and wife. It is said by counsel for defendants that it is the settled law of this state, under the decisions, that, where a husband conveys property to his wife, upon a prior or contemporaneous promise by her to hold the property, in whole or in part, for the benefit of another, the law fastens upon her a constructive trust for the disposition of the property in accordance with the promise. It may be conceded here that the rule is correctly stated by counsel, and that the evidence set forth above is sufficient to bring the transaction of January 6, 1900, within the operation of that rule. As to this, it is unnecessary to express an opinion, in view of other facts presented by the record, which make the rule contended for inapplicable here.

The record shows that on that day the premises in question constituted the duly selected and recorded homestead of the plaintiff and her husband. It does not appear whether the property was community property, or the separate property of either spouse, but owing to the fact, alleged by the pleadings, established by the evidence, and found by the trial court, that the wife had on February 18, 1881, regularly selected the premises as a homestead, and that the husband on March 14, 1899, did the same, and there being no intimation that the homestead so selected had ever been abandoned, it is unquestioned that on January 6, 1900, the property constituted the homestead of the parties, selected either from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same. Under these circumstances it cannot be doubted that it was then of such a character that it would, unless subsequently abandoned by the concurrent act of both parties, vest absolutely on the death of either husband or wife in the survivor. In the absence of such abandonment, which could only be effected by the mutual concurrent act of the parties, in the mode prescribed by law (sections 1242, 1243, Civ. Code), the law gave the homestead property absolutely to the wife in the event that she survived her husband. Her husband could not affect her right in this regard by any instrument which he, acting alone, could execute. It is true that it has been held that a husband may, by deed executed by himself alone, convey his title to the homestead property to his wife, subject to the homestead (Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. 715, 3 L. R. A. 781, 12 Am. St. Rep. 58; In re Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 405, 30 Pac. 568); but such a conveyance cannot affect the homestead character of the estate, nor can it prejudicially affect the wife's right of survivorship thereunder. A wife cannot be held to acquire, under such a deed, any right or interest in the property described therein that she already has under the law, and her absolute right to succeed to such property in the event of her husband's death is such a right. When, therefore, the husband died before her, the property vested absolutely in her under the homestead laws, and the husband's deed added nothing to her title. Whatever interest had been conveyed by that deed, the homestead subject to which the conveyance had been made had taken all of the property, and left nothing to be affected by such deed. From the moment of her husband's death, she held nothing under such deed. Under these circumstances, it follows that there was, subsequent to the death of the husband, no property to which the rule as to constructive trusts contended for by defendants could apply, for clearly such rule is applicable only to such property as is acquired by reason of the transaction relied on. As stated in Hayne v. Hermann, supra, "Whenever one person acquires from another the title to real estate by a fraud, actual or constructive, practiced upon that other, a constructive trust is created, which a court of equity will fasten upon the title in his hands." It is the property acquired by the fraud as to which the trust is created, and that alone, or, in the language of section 2224 of the Civil Code, "the thing gained." The only property acquired by the wife under the deed was the interest of the husband subject to the homestead. Such interest, it may be assumed, was held by the wife from the date of the deed to her husband's death in trust, by reason of her promise made when the deed was executed, but by his death that interest was absolutely terminated, and thenceforth the deed was ineffectual as a muniment of title.

There is no question, in this connection, as to whether there was such an interest in the husband at the date of the deed as to constitute that deed a sufficient consideration for the promise of the wife, but the question is whether there is property in her hands acquired by the wife from her husband under a deed made under such circumstances as to create a constructive trust. When it appears that there is no property in her hands acquired by reason of such deed, all questions as to a constructive trust are removed from the case. Defendant must then prevail, if at all, only upon the theory that an express trust in favor of defendant Loomis is shown. As to this, it is manifest that no such trust was created while both husband and wife were living. Under the clear and explicit provisions of our homestead law, as uniformly construed by this court, the interest in the homestead property, vested jointly in the husband and wife, cannot, while both live, be thus conveyed, incumbered, destroyed, or impaired, in favor of a third party, except by a single written instrument, executed and acknowledged personally by both husband and wife (sections 1242, 1243, Civ. Code. See Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 476, 58 Pac. 910, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, and cases there cited; Freiermuth v. Steigleman, 130 Cal. 392, 62 Pac. 615, 80 Am. St. Rep. 138); and any attempted action in this behalf not in full conformity with the requirements of the law is absolutely void and inoperative for any purpose, and acquires no validity, even if the premises subsequently lose their character as a homestead from abandonment or other cause (Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 217, 22 Pac. 551, 15 Am. St. Rep. 47; Powell v. Patison, 100 Cal. 236, 34 Pac. 677). In Graves v. Baker, 68 Cal. 133, 8 Pac. 691, an action to declare a trust, it was squarely held, in accord with what has been said, that a deed of homestead property from a husband to a wife, in trust to receive the rents and profits for herself and children during her life, and providing that after her death the property should vest absolutely in the children, was, as against a valid declaration of homestead, void, because executed and acknowledged by the husband alone. In this case there was no pretense that the husband and wife joined in a single instrument, or that the writing signed by her at the time of the execution of the deed, was acknowledged by her.

Defendant, however, relies upon a letter written by plaintiff to defendant Loomis, after the death of her husband, as creating such a trust. The statement relied on in that letter has already been set forth. There was nothing herein to indicate any intention on the part of the writer to create any trust, and all that the letter constituted at most was a voluntary acknowledgment on the part of plaintiff, made without any consideration whatever, that the property had been given to her by her husband, upon her promise that when she was through with it she would give it to defendant Loomis. It afforded very satisfactory evidence that she had made the alleged promise to her husband at the time of the execution of the deed, evidence in support of the claim of constructive trust, but it had no further effect, and could not, under the circumstances already detailed, operate to create a voluntary trust under the provisions of section 2222, Civ. Code, as claimed by defendant. From what has been said, it follows that the finding of the trial court as to the ownership of this property is not supported by the evidence. It is contended by plaintiff that, upon the findings of the court, judgment should be ordered entered for plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of her complaint, but we are of the opinion that the other findings are not such as to enable us to do this in the face of the findings as to ownership.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

GOSS v. STEIGER TERRA COTTA & POTTERY WORKS. (S. F. 3,481.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1905.)

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON FACTS.

A request to charge that evidence of oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, was properly refused as a violation of the constitutional provision that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 439-448.]

Alexander D. Keyes, for appellant. C. H. Wilson, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The action is for damages for personal injuries, on account of being burned from an explosion of an oil tank, alleged to have been suffered through the negligence of defendant while the plaintiff was in the defendant's employ. The action was tried by a jury and judgment entered on the verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

At the trial one Steiger testified that he called on the plaintiff at the hospital about 12 hours after the explosion occurred, and he asked the plaintiff the following question: "Did you not know that it was dangerous to use a lantern in an oil tank of that kind?" To this question the plaintiff replied: "Yes;

I knew it was dangerous, and it was all carelessness on my part, and if I ever get over this I will know better next time." When the cause was submitted, the plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that evidence of oral admissions of a party ought to be viewed with caution." The court refused so to instruct the jury, to which ruling plaintiff excepted.

The only point made upon the appeal is that the court erred in refusing the instruction referred to. This instruction is in the language of the last paragraph, subdivision 4, § 2061, Code Civ. Proc. In Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124, it was held by this court in bank, after an elaborate discussion of the question, that such an instruction was in violation of the provision of the state Constitution that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." This question was again before this court in People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744, where it was said: "Such an instruction seems under the weight of authority in violation of the Constitution against charging as to matters of fact." It was added, however, in that case, that the refusal of the instruction, if error, was not such as to justify reversal, as it states mere commonplace matter within the general knowledge of the jury. See, also, later cases of People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 77 Pac. 777; People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 77 Pac. 907. The court below, therefore, did not err in refusing to give the instruction requested.

Judgment affirmed.

I concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.

SHAW, J. I concur upon the ground that the instruction is a correct statement of the duty of the jury, or of a court in considering such evidence, and that the action of a court in either giving or refusing such an instruction is not sufficient ground for reversal. The constitutional mandate justifies its refusal, and the giving of it can do no harm, for it only expresses the plain duty of the jury. People v. Farrington, 140 Cal. 659, 74 Pac. 288.

DUNSMUIR v. COFFEY, Judge.

(L. A. 1,760.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

On prohibition to prevent the execution of an order appointing a special administrator, the validity of an order previously made annulling an order admitting the will to probate, and the validity of the latter order, on which the order appointing the special administrator depends for its validity, may be considered by the court.

2. MOTIONS — ORDERS—VACATION—POWER OF COURT.

In the absence of an application for relief on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, etc., made under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, which in all cases must be made within a year, an order which is not void on its face cannot be set aside by the court which rendered it, except in a separate action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Motions, §§ 78, 83.]

3. WILLS—PROBATE—VALIDITY OF ORDERS.

An order admitting a will to probate, even if erroneous, is not rendered void by reason of an incorrect determination by the court of the domicile of deceased.

In Bank. Petition by James Dunsmuir for writ of prohibition against J. V. Coffey, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ issued.

Rehearing denied November 9, 1905.

LORIGAN, J. Alexander Dunsmuir died on or about the 31st day of January, 1900, in the city of New York. On the 24th day of February following his will was presented for probate to the Supreme Court of British Columbia at Victoria and was there duly admitted to probate. On the 26th day of April of that year an authenticated copy of the will, together with an authenticated copy of the decree admitting it to probate in British Columbia, was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, with a petition for the probate of the will and for letters testamentary thereon. After due notice the will was admitted to probate. The administration proceedings were regular, and culminated in a decree of final distribution and the discharge of the executor. Under the will and by the decree the estate was distributed to James Dunsmuir, a brother of the deceased and petitioner herein. In the regular proceedings upon administration it is declared that Alexander Dunsmuir at the time of his death was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. The decree of distribution upon the question of domicile declares "that the said testator, Alexander Dunsmuir, died on the 31st day of January, 1900, at the city and county and state of New York, and at the time of his death he was a British subject and a resident of, and domiciled at, Victoria, British Columbia, but temporarily residing in the city and county of San Francisco, as appears from the evidence both oral and documentary introduced upon the hearing of the petition for distribution." The decree in the matter of the estate was entered upon June 4, 1901. Shortly thereafter James Dunsmuir, executor under the will, was finally discharged, and the administration was thus closed. Nearly five years after the will had been admitted to probate, and four years after final distribution and discharge of the executor, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in which the will had been admitted to probate, upon motion of Edna Wallace Hopper, made its order vacating and annulling the order admitting the will to probate. While this order was made by the same court, that is to say, the superior court in probate, it was actually given by another judge than the one who had five years previously allowed probate of the will. Application in certiorari was made to this court to review this order vacating and annulling the order admitting the will to probate, but the application was refused upon the ground that an appeal from this order would afford adequate relief. Subsequent to this order vacating and annulling the order admitting the will to probate the superior court appointed a special administrator and directed that administrator to take from James Dunsmuir, distributee under the decree of distribution, the property so to him distributed. Petitioner now comes to this court seeking to prohibit the execution of this last order of the court.

A preliminary objection by way of demurrer to the petition is presented by the respondent, under which he contends that the inquiry of this court must be confined to a consideration of the validity or invalidity of the order appointing a special administrator, and directing him to take charge of the assets of the estate, and that the inquiry cannot go back of this order to a consideration of the question whether the order annulling the order admitting the will to probate was valid or invalid. We do not consider that any such limitation can be placed upon the inquiry. The order appointing the special administrator and directing him to take charge of the estate depends for its validity entirely upon the validity of the order previously made, annulling the order admitting the will of Alexander Dunsmuir to probate. And this latter order, annulling the order admitting the will to probate, is itself an order void upon its face, unless, in turn, the order originally admitting the will to probate was itself void on its face. Hence it must follow that, if the order annulling the order admitting the will to probate is itself void, then the order appointing the special administrator, which is based upon such a void order, is itself necessarily void. The contention of respondent is fully and completely answered adversely to his position by People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651, where the court says: "It is well settled that a court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion a judgment not void upon its face, unless the motion is made within a reasonable time, and it is definitely determined that such time will not extend beyond the limit fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which in no case exceeds one year. It is also settled law that a judgment is not void upon its face unless its invalidity is apparent from an inspection of the judgment roll. * * * Under such circumstances (in the absence of application made within the time specified in section 473 of the Code of Civil Precedure) the judgment, which is not invalid on its face, is entirely beyond the reach of the court that rendered it, except in a separate action, and any order of the court purporting to vacate it is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void. Such an order occupies no better position than a judgment that is void upon its face, and, like such a judgment, is assailable wherever and whenever it may be produced, and whether the attack upon it be direct or collateral. * * * If the judgment was not void upon its face, the order setting it aside was upon its face an absolute nullity, and it was not necessary for the plaintiff to appeal therefrom. Neither failure on the part of plaintiff to appeal nor lapse of time could make it valid or impair the power of the court to formally vacate it on its own motion and without notice."

The claim of petitioner insisted on here is that the order annulling the order admitting the will to probate is void, and, that being so void, the subsequent order appointing a special administrator and directing him to take from petitioner the property distributed to him by the decree, being an attempted interference with his right under such decree, the consideration of the validity or invalidity of the order annulling the order admitting the will to probate, upon which the decree is based, is not only proper, but essentially necessary. In our opinion there can be no doubt of the correctness of petitioner's position, and that it devolves upon this court to determine whether or not the order annulling the order admitting the will of Alexander Dunsmuir to probate was or was not void. To determine this necessarily involves a consideration of the order admitting the will to probate, because it must be conceded that, if the order admitting the will to probate was not of itself void on its face, the court had no power, after the lapse of time shown, to make an order setting it aside, for, as above quoted from People v. Davis, after the lapse of time limited by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "the judgment which is not invalid on its face is entirely beyond the reach of the court that rendered it, except in a separate action, and any order of the court purporting to vacate it is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void."

This brings us to the controlling inquiry in the case, which is whether the order admitting the will of Alexander Dunsmuir to probate by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco was void on its face. Regardless of the distinction which may exist between the probate of domestic and foreign wills, and regardless also of the correct determination of the matter of the domicile of the deceased, we are satisfied that this inquiry must be answered in the negative. The order admitting the will to probate was in no sense void. Even if it were erroneous (a question not necessary to be decided), it was still valid until reversed upon direct proceedings upon appeal. This proposition is definitely settled in Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, where it is said: "An error of the court in deciding that certain documentary evidence, not properly authenticated, proved a valid foreign probate of a will, is not different in character or in principle from an error in deciding, as in the case of Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500, that certain evidence proved that the deceased had her last place of residence in Sacramento county. The error in the former case may have proceeded from a misconception of what constituted a valid foreign probate of a will or from an error as to what was competent or sufficient evidence to prove it. In the latter case the error may have arisen from a mistaken view of what constituted a residence or from an error as to what was sufficient or competent evidence to prove it. Such errors may be corrected by appeal, but do not render the judgment void." This case was one of a collateral attack upon the probate of a will under circumstances similar to those involved in the case at bar, though less favorable to the contention of this respondent. It was there held that such a probate, even if erroneous, was not void, and the ruling in that case entirely disposes of the controlling question involved here. The order annulling the admission of the will of Alexander Dunsmuir to probate made at the time and under the circumstances disclosed is, in its nature, an attempt to declare void a decree in no sense void, and the result is, as said in People v. Davis, that the attempt to do so is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and is itself void. It follows, then, that, as the order vacating the order admitting the will to probate is void, the order appointing the special administrator and directing him to take charge of the estate, which is based on this previous void order, is equally void, and that the writ of prohibition should issue as prayed for, and it is so ordered.

GREENBERG v. WESTERN TURF ASS'N.
(S. F. 3,376.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 12, 1905.)

1. Master and Servant—Independent Contractor—Respondeat Superior—Question for Jury.

Where, in an action to recover a penalty for plaintiff's ejection from a race course after having presented a ticket for his admission, in violation of a statute, the evidence was conflicting as to whether the persons who ejected plaintiff were employes of defendant, the owner of the course, or of a detective agency, an independent contractor, whether they were defendant's servants was for the jury.

2. Theaters and Shows—Constitutional Law—Place of Public Amusement—Regulation—Police Power.

A state, in the exercise of its police power, can regulate public race tracks and places of public amusement.

3. Civil Rights—Constitutional Law.

A statute making it unlawful to refuse admission to any opera house, theater, race course, or other place of public amusement to any person over 21 years of age who presents a ticket of admission, and providing a penalty therefor, was a valid exercise of the state's police power, and was not unconstitutional, as a deprivation of civil rights conferred by Const. U. S. Amend. 14, or by Const. Cal. § 1.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Hyman Greenberg against Western Turf Association. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow, Goodfellow & Eells, Charles F. Gardiner, and D. E. Alexander, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and E. C. Harrison, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This case is between the same parties and similar to that of Greenberg v. Western Turf Association, 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050. Plaintiff recovered judgment before a jury, and from that judgment and from an order refusing its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Defendant first complains of the court's refusal to instruct the jury to render a verdict in its favor; the contention herein being that upon the undisputed facts Green and Newman, who ejected the plaintiff, were not employés of the defendant, but of Mr. Morse, proprietor of the Morse Detective Agency, and that, as Morse was an independent contractor, the doctrine of respondeat superior should have been applied to him, and not to the defendant. The evidence, however, upon the question was conflicting, and the court properly submitted the matter for determination to the jury.

It is next contended that the act under which plaintiff sought his recovery is unconstitutional, and in this regard it is insisted that the construction put upon the act in 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050, is erroneous. Herein appellant contends that the statute is in contravention of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and section 1 of the Declaration of Rights of the state Constitution, and this court is asked to reconsider the construction which heretofore it has put upon the act. The argument of appellant in this respect seems to be that as at common law the purchaser of a ticket to a place of amusement held only a revocable license, and the proprietor of such a place of amusement could either refuse the holder of the ticket admission, or eject him after admission, not being responsible in tort, but merely in contract for the price of the ticket, and the necessary expenses incurred by the purchaser, no subsequent legislation by the state can modify this common-law rule, except in one particular, and that is, that the exclusion cannot be by way of race discrimination, and because of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and that, as the act in question is not designed to meet this condition or to effectuate this end, it is an unwarranted invasion of the rights which the defendant enjoyed before the passage of the act under the rule as it existed at common law. If the right of state Legislatures to pass an act such as this rested upon the proposition enunciated, the acts themselves would be of no value, for, as pointed out in the note to McCrea v. Marsh, 71 Am. Dec. 745: "The states might pass such laws, but, if a ticket to a theater is but a revocable license, they would be of little effect, as, if the theater proprietor desired to exclude colored persons, he might do so merely by revoking the license, and it would be impossible to determine whether it was revoked by reason of 'race, color, or previous condition of servitude.'" The truth of the matter is that the right of the state rests upon no such flimsy foundation. It is based upon its fundamental right, when not acting in contravention to its Constitution or to the Constitution of the United States, to modify the common law. As is said in Charge to Grand Jury, 1 Hughes, 541, Fed. Cas. No. 18,258: "A state has the constitutional and legislative power to change or modify the common law, and by statute establish and regulate the rights of its citizens to the enjoyment and benefit of inns, public conveyances, etc." As pointed out in 1 Dillon, Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 357: "Charters not infrequently confer upon the corporation the power to 'license and regulate' or to 'license, regulate, and tax' certain vocations and employments, and to 'tax and restrain' or 'prohibit' exhibitions, shows, places of amusement, and the like, and, unless there is some specified limitation on the authority of the Legislature in this respect, such provisions are constitutional." The state, in the exercise of its police power, has the unquestioned right to regulate these places of public amusement, and it is in the exercise of this power, and not at all as having to do with civil rights, that the act in question was upheld in 140 Cal. and 73 Pac., and its constitutionality is here again affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1905.)

CONTRACTS — CONSIDERATION — AGREEMENT TO OBTAIN DISCHARGE OF MORTGAGE.

The fact that an agent, holding a power of attorney from plaintiff, executed a mortgage on her property and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, and that she was about to institute suit to recover the money, which she forebore to do, constituted a sufficient consideration for a contract, executed by the agent and his wife, by which they agreed to secure the discharge of the mortgage without cost to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

E. A. Holman and Judson M. Davis, for appellants. R. B. McKee, W. J. Donovan, and D. Mitchell, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Appeal from judgment on a bill of exceptions. The amended complaint alleges in substance: That on the 21st day of December, 1895, the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land described in the complaint of the value of $600, upon which she desired to secure a loan of $500 for the purpose of enabling her to appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment rendered against her in the superior court of Alameda county. That she consulted defendant Frank Silva, who was acting as a loan agent, in regard to obtaining a loan upon the said real estate, and at Silva's request and by his advice she executed an instrument, making him her attorney in fact for the purpose of executing a mortgage upon the property and securing the loan, and at the same time plaintiff delivered to Silva her title papers. That it was the agreement that the money should not be borrowed, nor the mortgage executed, except for the purpose of obtaining money by which plaintiff could carry on the contemplated appeal, and, if plaintiff should subsequently decide to abandon the appeal, the defendant Silva was not to proceed further with the loan. That subsequently, on the 24th day of January, 1896, the plaintiff decided to abandon the contemplated appeal, and so notified Silva, and demanded of him that the power of attorney be canceled and her title papers surrendered, but Silva stated to plaintiff that he could not find the power of attorney, nor the title papers. That prior to January 24, 1896, said Silva had, under the said power of attorney, and without plaintiff's knowledge, executed a note and mortgage upon said land to one Rauer for $500, which sum defendant Silva received and appropriated to his own use, no part of which was received by plaintiff. That the mortgage and power of attorney were not placed of record until about six months after the mortgage was executed, and plaintiff then for the first time discovered the fact, and thereupon immediately went to defendant Frank Silva for an explanation, and he denied that he ever executed the note and mortgage, or that he ever received the $500, or that he knew anything about the placing of the power of attorney or mortgage upon record. That afterwards, when threatened with legal proceedings by plaintiff, in order to satisfy her and to get her to forbear such contemplated proceedings, defendants, who are husband and wife, executed an agreement in writing of which the following is a copy, to wit: "Whereas, I, Frank Silva, some time ago was appointed under power of attorney to act for M. L. Parsons in respect of certain property situate in Tulare county, being a ranch there claimed by her; and whereas, said power of attorney authorized F. Silva to borrow certain money to carry on an appeal by said M. L. Parsons to the Supreme Court; and whereas, Mrs. Parsons notified said Silva not to proceed further in respect of said appeal, and also notified one Burris therein acting as counsel and adviser; and whereas, it now appears on record against said property a mortgage for $500.00, it is hereby declared by said Silva that no such sum was ever raised or paid to him either personally or as acting under said power of attorney or otherwise, and that, if said mortgage exists or is recorded as aforesaid, same is in fraud, and void for want of consideration and authority. Be it therefore witnessed, that we, the undersigned, do jointly and severally guaranty to said M. L. Parsons (in consideration that she is in no way responsible for same) to investigate and clear from the records said mortgage in order that she may be in the same position in respect of said property as when she granted said power of attorney to said Silva; and we will pay Mr. Mitchell all his charges for attorney fees and costs of clearance. Witness our hands and seal this 16 day of September, 1896. Frank Silva. Louisa Silva." That plaintiff relied upon defendants to carry out said contract and clear the records of said mortgage, all of which they failed to do, and by reason of said failure the said mortgage was foreclosed, and the said property sold, and lost to plaintiff, without any fault on her part. That defendants have never redeemed said property, nor restored it to plaintiff, nor paid her its value or any sum or at all. That by reason of the said failure of defendants to keep the said contract and clear the records of said mortgage, as they agreed to do, plaintiff has lost her property, and been damaged in the sum of $600.

The demurrer was properly overruled. The consideration for the agreement was that plaintiff would forbear to institute legal proceedings in regard to an iniquitous transaction by Frank Silva, the husband of defendant Louisa Silva, and not only this, but the money which Frank Silva had received and appropriated to his own use was a consideration for the agreement. The findings are supported by the evidence. It may be that Burris, who was associated with defendant Frank Silva in business and who prepared the papers, appropriated the money, and that Frank Silva did not receive any part of it; but as to this the evidence is squarely in conflict. Burris testified that he received the check, and "the money was immediately turned over to Mr. Silva." Taking the testimony of Burris, in connection with the fact that defendants, by signing the written agreement, practically acknowledged the liability of defendant Frank Silva, the finding of the court is amply supported. The question as to whether or not plaintiff was responsible for the mortgage is immaterial. She had made herself responsible to the mortgagee by executing the power of attorney. As between herself and defendant Frank Silva she was not responsible for it; that is, she was not in equity bound for it, but Silva was, and acknowledged himself to be so bound by executing the agreement.

The judgment is affirmed.

RILEY v. LOMA VISTA RANCH CO. et al.

1. CORPORATIONS—OFFICERS—AUTHORITY.

Where the secretary and manager of an incorporated partnership, who before incorporation was the manager and one of the principal partners, had been in the habit of storing hay in the warehouse of the corporation and issuing receipts to himself therefor, which were regularly entered on the books and known to at least some of the directors, he had authority to issue such receipts.

2. SAME—RATIFICATION.

Where the secretary and manager of a corporation issued a warehouse receipt to himself, which was regularly entered on the books of the company, and thereafter the secretary's report, in which the receipt was referred to, was approved, and at a later meeting all the official acts of the board of directors during the year were ratified and confirmed, after which, on negotiation of the receipt, the prospective purchaser made inquiry of the officers of the corporation as to the amount of storage chargeable against the property, and was told that a certain rate had been agreed upon with the secretary, the corporation ratified the issuance of the receipt.

3. WAREHOUSEMEN—RECEIPTS—ESTOPPEL.

Under Act April 1, 1878, § 1 (Civ. Code, p. 779), forbidding warehousemen to issue receipts for goods which have not been received into store or which are not in store at the time of issuing the receipt; section 10, making a violation of this provision a felony; and section 6, declaring that a warehouseman shall not be allowed to make any offset, claim, or demand other than is expressed on the face of the receipt, etc.—a warehouseman is estopped to deny the actual receipt and possession of the goods represented by a receipt.

Action by William Riley against the Loma Vista Ranch Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James H. Blanchard and Will D. Gould, for appellant. William E. Cox, R. H. F. Variel, Curtis D. Wilbur, and G. P. Adams, for respondents.

SMITH, J. Appeal from a judgment for the defendants and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The defendant corporation is successor of the firm of Bixby & Howard, composed of Jotham Bixby, the defendant Howard, and five others, who, excepting one, subscribed for and continued to be the holders of all the stock of the corporation. Howard was manager of the business of the firm before the incorporation, and continued to be such until about the 23d day of January, 1897. This suit was brought to recover the value of the balance of the hay undelivered, represented by a warehouse receipt, which is as follows:

"Loma Vista Warehouse. No. 172.

"Howard's Summit, Los Angeles Co., Cal., 7—14, 1896. Received in Warehouse at Howard's Summit, on storage, the following merchandise for account of W. W. Howard, at the following rates, one dollar per ton for the season; i. e., July 1, '97.

"Not responsible for shrinkage or loss by fire.

Gangway Numbers	Lots.	Marks.	No. of Bales.	Weight.	Description.
2-4-11	D	1	2159	474,691	Oat & Barley Hay.
12-13	J

"This receipt must be surrendered and storage paid before delivery of goods will be made. Transfers not complete unless entered in the warehouse books. Storage commences July 1, 1896. Loma Vista Ranch Co., Proprietors, per W. W. Howard, Sec. & Manager."

This receipt, it is found, was for the balance of the hay undelivered, represented by a receipt in similar form issued in the year 1895, which had been pledged to the Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles as collateral security for the sum of $2,000, and for which the new certificate was substituted. The latter was assigned for value to the defendant W. L. Riley, December 27, 1897, and by him to the plaintiff. Portions of the hay represented by the receipt, aggregating 1,399 bales, were delivered to the defendant W. L. Riley and indorsed on the receipt; and after this delivery the defendant corporation refused to deliver any more hay upon the ground that all the hay of Howard in their possession had been delivered. The assignment of the plaintiff was after this refusal of the defendant corporation, of which the assignee had notice. It was found by the court that "through omissions, mistakes, and oversight the last-named receipt called for a larger amount of hay than was then actually on storage in said warehouse and barns of the said defendant Loma Vista Ranch Company," and, in effect, that the hay actually delivered to W. L. Riley was all the hay at that time in the hands of the company; and it is further found, in effect, that the defendant corporation never made, issued, or delivered either of said warehouse receipts to W. W. Howard, or subsequently ratified the same, or either of them, and that its officers and directors, other than Howard, did not have any notice or knowledge of the issuance of such receipts until after the resignation of Howard, and that at the time of the assignment of the receipt to W. L. Riley the latter knew that the said Howard had been in fact the secretary and manager of the corporation defendant, and in charge of its business and warehouse at the time the receipt was issued, and purchased the receipt and hay represented thereby, "with notice that the said Howard had issued said receipt in the name of said corporation by himself, as secretary and manager thereof, to himself in his individual capacity, without authority so to do, and with constructive notice that said receipt, as against said corporation, defendant called for more hay than said corporation defendant had received or had then in its possession or warehouse."

But these findings are attacked by the specifications of the appellant, and from the evidence in the case the following facts appear without contradiction: Previously to the issue of the receipt sued upon, Howard had been in the habit of storing hay in the warehouse of the defendant corporation and issuing receipts to himself therefor, which were regularly entered in the books of the company and known to its directors, or some of them; and from the minutes of the corporation it appears that in the report of Howard as secretary, made on the 23d day of January, 1897, this particular receipt is referred to, and that at the next subsequent meeting the minutes of the preceding meeting, showing the financial statement and annual account of Howard, were read and the minutes of the meeting approved, the minutes showing no objection made to the receipt in question. And, again, at the stockholders' meeting of June 27, 1898, all the official acts of the board of directors of the corporation during the year were approved, ratified, and confirmed. It also appears from the evidence of William Riley that before completing his purchase of the certificate and the hay represented thereby he went to the company's office and inquired of the officers there present how much the charge of storage against the hay was, and was informed that they had made arrangements with Mr. Howard and that it would be $1.50 a ton, if the hay was taken away within three months, and that none of the officers said anything "about any suspicion of the warehouse receipt in any way." This evidence is confirmed by the witness Rawson, who succeeded Howard as manager, and was one of the officers applied to. Upon this evidence, which was uncontradicted, we think it clear that Howard had authority to issue receipts to himself, and that this particular receipt was ratified by the company upon its receipt of Howard's report and its failure to make any objection to the receipt upon the occasion of Riley's inquiry as to the rate of storage. Phillips v. Sanger L. Co., 130 Cal. 432, 62 Pac. 749. And this view of the case is confirmed by the character of the incorporation, which was that of an incorporated partnership, of which Howard had been the manager and one of the principal partners. Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 450. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the findings objected to were not justified by the evidence.

It remains to consider whether it was competent for the defendant corporation to contradict their receipt as to the amount of hay represented by it, and on this point we are of the opinion that it could not. By the first section of the act of April 1, 1878 (Civ. Code, p. 779), a warehouseman is forbidden to issue a receipt for goods that have not been bona fide received into store by such warehouseman, or which are not in store and under his control at the time of issuing the receipt; and by section 10 a violation of this or other provision of the act is made a felony; and by section 6 it is provided, with reference to negotiable receipts, of which this is one, that a warehouseman shall not "be allowed to make any offset, claim, or demand other than is expressed on the face of the receipt or receipts issued for the same, when called upon to deliver said goods," etc. By the provisions of the act, therefore, a warehouseman is estopped to deny the actual receipt and possession of the goods "represented by said receipt," which seems to be in accordance with the general law. Hanover Nat'l Bank v. American Dock & Trust Co. (Court of Appeals of New York) 43 N. E. 72, and cases cited. The case cited is very similar to the case before us on both of the points involved.

We are of the opinion that the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: GRAY, P. J.; ALLEN, J.

1 Cal. App. 483

RAINE v. LAWLOR, Judge of Superior Court.

1. ADMINISTRATORS — SPECIAL ADMINISTRATRIX—APPOINTMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1411, 1412, providing for the appointment of a special administrator at any time and without notice, such an appointment was valid, whether the order was made by the court or by a judge in chambers.

2. PROHIBITION—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, providing that the writ of prohibition is the counterpart of the writ of mandate, and arrests the proceedings of any tribunal when they are without or in excess of jurisdiction, a writ of prohibition will not issue to an inferior tribunal, unless it is proceeding or is about to proceed in excess of its jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Prohibition, §§ 37–56.]

3. ADMINISTRATRIX—VACATION OF APPOINTMENT.

Where a judge of a superior court appointed a special administratrix, he had jurisdiction of a motion to set aside such appointment as inadvertently granted.

Petition for writ of prohibition by Edith M. S. Raine against William P. Lawlor, as judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ denied.

Henry C. McPike, for petitioner. Riordan & Lande, and M. J. Kuhl, for respondent.

COOPER, J. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition against Hon. William P. Lawlor, as judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, to prohibit him from revoking an order appointing petitioner special administratrix of the estate of Inez Sexton Hutton, deceased. On the 2d day of May, 1905, an order was made and signed by said judge, appointing petitioner special administratrix of the estate of deceased and directing that special letters of administration issue to her upon filing a bond and taking the proper oath. Petitioner thereupon qualified and gave the proper bond. It is not necessary to decide the question as to whether the order appointing petitioner was made by the court or by the judge at chambers. In either case the appointment was valid. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1411, 1412.

On the 10th day of May, 1905, H. W. Hutton, the surviving husband of deceased, served and filed a notice of motion to vacate and set aside the order appointing the petitioner such special administratrix, upon the ground, among others, that the order was irregularly and inadvertently made and without notice. The motion came on regularly to be heard on the 11th day of May, 1905, the petitioner being represented by her attorney, whereupon the court, after due consideration of the matter, concluded that the order appointing the petitioner such special administratrix was irregularly and inadvertently made, without notice as prescribed by the rules of the court, and announced that it would, and it is about to, make an order setting aside and revoking the order appointing petitioner such special administratrix. The writ of prohibition will not issue to an inferior tribunal, unless it is proceeding, or is about to proceed, in excess of its jurisdiction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102. The petitioner here accordingly sets forth "that said order and proceeding is in excess of the jurisdiction of the said William P. Lawlor as such superior judge, and he is without any jurisdiction to make said order upon any of the grounds stated." Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversy. If the law confers the power to render a judgment or decree, then the court has jurisdiction. "The question is whether, on the case before a court, its action is judicial or extrajudicial, with or without the authority of law, to render a judgment or decree upon the rights of the litigant parties. If the law confers the power to render a judgment or decree, then the court has jurisdiction. What shall be adjudged and decreed between the parties, and with which is the right of the case, is judicial action, by hearing and determining it." Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. 657, 9 L. Ed. 1233.

The court or the judge thereof had the power to set aside the order if it was inadvertently made. Hall v. Polack, 42 Cal. 219; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Kaufman v. Shain, 111 Cal. 17, 43 Pac. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 139. Counsel for petitioner concedes that courts have the inherent power to set aside orders inadvertently made, but claims that, "when the uncontroverted facts show as matter of law that there was no inadvertence, the court below has no power to vacate its order on the ground that it was inadvertently made." This is but an argument that the court had the power to decide the matter, provided it decided right, but did not have the power to decide wrong. If it had the power to deny the motion to set aside its order, alleged to have been made by inadvertence (and this is conceded), it had the power to grant it. It had the power to determine whether or not the order was inadvertently made. It had the power to decide the matter, even if its decision was wrong. It is not necessary to express any opinion as to whether or not the record shows that the order was inadvertently made. If the court arrived at a wrong conclusion, it was only error, which cannot be reached in this proceeding. The court was the tribunal, and the judge who heard the matter was the person provided by the laws of the state for passing upon the very question presented. The court below was the sole judge of the evidence and of the question as to whether or not the order had been inadvertently made, and its decision is conclusive as to this collateral proceeding. Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 486, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; People v. Curtis, 113 Cal. 71, 45 Pac. 180.

The case of Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646, is directly in point, and supports the views herein expressed. There the court made a decree of final discharge of the administrator. It afterwards, upon application of some of the heirs, made an order setting aside and vacating the decree of final discharge upon the ground that such discharge was "made inadvertently and ex parte." A writ of prohibition was sought upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to set aside the decree of final discharge. The court said: "We are of opinion that the court had jurisdiction to set aside its order or decree discharging petitioner from his office of administrator, upon the ground that such decree had been inadvertently made and entered, and that, having power so to do, if error was committed, it cannot be corrected by means of a writ of prohibition, which only issues to arrest 'the proceedings of any tribunal, corporation, board or person * * * when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction.'" In Wreden v. Superior Court of Stanislaus Co., 55 Cal. 504, it is said: "Any error committed in the decision of a motion can be saved by a bill of exceptions, and be disposed of by appeal, or any other method of review known to the law; but judicial acts, which are the subject of review by these ordinary and adequate remedies, are not the subject of prohibition. The mere fact, if such were the fact, that a court is about to act erroneously or irregularly in a matter of which it has jurisdiction will not warrant the issuance of a writ of prohibition." In Woodward v. Superior Court, 95 Cal. 276, 30 Pac. 535, it was sought by prohibition to arrest proceedings in regard to the appointment of a receiver, on the ground that no sufficient showing had been made to justify the appointment. It is said: "The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. It had the power, therefore, to hear and determine a motion for the appointment of a receiver, and its action thereon cannot be regarded as in excess of its jurisdiction."

It is not necessary to decide in this case whether any appeal lies from the order complained of. If no appeal lies, the petitioner cannot be greatly injured. She has no statutory right to be appointed special administratrix. She can again apply upon notice, and be heard the same as any one else, if the court should deem it necessary to appoint a special administrator.

The writ is denied.

WATER SUPPLY CO. v. SARNOW et al.

1. EXECUTION—ISSUE—LIMITATION.

Act 1895 (St. 1895, p. 38, c. 33), authorizing an order for execution without notice after the lapse of five years from the rendition of judgment and before the same is barred, is constitutional as to judgments rendered after the passage of such act.

2. SAME—ORDER—EFFECT.

An execution being the only method by which a money judgment may be enforced, an order for an execution on such a judgment amounts to an order for its enforcement, and is authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 685.

3. INTERPLEADER—JURISDICTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 5, providing for an attachment of personal property belonging to defendant, in the hands of another, or of debts or credits owing him, and sections 717, 721 providing that the creditor can bring no action against the person having such property in his possession, or owing debts to the defendant, until supplementary proceedings have been instituted and an order obtained authorizing such suit, do not prevent such third person from bringing a bill of interpleader, where the judgment debtor appears and consents to the jurisdiction of the court to determine to whom the debt so attached should be paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Bill of interpleader by the Water Supply Company against L. G. Sarnow and Josie Sullivan. From a judgment awarding a fund to defendant Sarnow, defendant Sullivan appeals. Reversed.

T. F. Allen, for appellant. Reardan & Whitaker, for respondent Sarnow. Fred E. Boynton, for respondent Water Supply Company.

ALLEN, J. The complaint avers that in January, 1902, defendant Sarnow obtained a judgment against plaintiff for $844; that in May and October following Josie Sullivan caused to be served upon the secretary of plaintiff an execution issued out of a judgment theretofore rendered in her favor and against Sarnow, whereby she sought to levy upon and hold all property or credits in plaintiff's hands due Sarnow; that plaintiff is ignorant of the rights of the parties to the proceeds of said judgment, and would be put to hazard if compelled to judge between the respective claims, and avers that it is willing to pay the full amount of said judgment to whomsoever the court may direct, pending the hearing, with the usual prayer requiring the interpleader to be discharged, etc. To this complaint the general demurrer of each of the defendants was overruled, and the defendant Sullivan thereupon filed, as was required, a pleading which she denominated a cross-complaint, in which it is averred that judgment in her favor against Sarnow was rendered in February, 1897, the amount of which, including interest, was, at the date of filing said claim, $742.03; that on May 11, 1902, Sullivan filed in the court in which the judgment was rendered her affidavit, setting out the rendition and nonpayment of the judgment; that more than five years had elapsed since the entry; and that Sarnow now has property out of which it could be made; that the court, upon presentation of such affidavit, made its order that an execution issue, and the same was issued; that on May 20, 1902, the sheriff duly levied on all moneys, debts, and credits of Sarnow in the hands of plaintiff, and that in order to make such levy the sheriff served upon the plaintiff's secretary, and left with him, notice that the same were attached by virtue of said writ; that subsequently the sheriff returned said execution unsatisfied; that, when the execution was levied, there was $950.35 in the plaintiff's hands belonging to Sarnow; that afterwards, in October, 1902, another execution was issued out of said judgment so rendered, in favor of Sullivan and against Sarnow, which was duly levied; and the same allegations are set out as were made in reference to the first levy. To this cross-complaint Sarnow demurred generally, and the same was sustained by the court, and, Sullivan not desiring to amend, the court found that Sullivan acquired no rights to the money in the hands of plaintiff by virtue of such levies, that Sarnow was entitled to the money, and by its judgment ordered that plaintiff pay to the clerk the amount of said judgment in favor of Sarnow, and that upon such payment the judgment should be satisfied by the clerk and the money paid to Sarnow. From this judgment against her and in favor of Sarnow, the defendant Sullivan appeals.

The act of 1895 (St. 1895, p. 38, c. 33), authorizing the order for execution without notice after the lapse of five years from the rendition of judgment and before the same is barred by statute, as to all judgments rendered after the passage of such act, is by our Supreme Court, in Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 530, 78 Pac. 1038, held to be constitutional. Inasmuch as the only way by which a money judgment may be enforced is by execution, such an order for an execution amounts to an order for its enforcement, and is authorized by section 685, Code Civ. Proc. It is averred in the plaintiff's complaint that a copy of such execution was served, which being admitted, a right and claim as to the money was initiated, which would entitle the plaintiff to maintain an action under section 386, Code of Civil Procedure. The cross-complaint alleges that the execution was levied, and, no special demurrer being filed, the same was sufficient. The essential facts may be improperly or defectively stated, but such defects can only be reached by a special demurrer. Grant v. Sheerin, 84 Cal. 200, 23 Pac. 1094.

The same observations are appropriate as to the general demurrer to the original complaint. The only theory, therefore, upon which the court could have proceeded in its judgment in favor of Sarnow and against Sullivan was that the sections of the act providing for proceedings supplementary to the execution were applicable to this case, and their nonobservance destroyed any rights which Sullivan may have acquired to the money or credits in plaintiff's hands. It is true that before any action can be maintained by a judgment creditor on account of a levy made under subdivision 5, § 542, Code of Civil Procedure, he shall first proceed as provided by sections 717–721, Code of Civil Procedure, and procure an order authorizing such suit. This, however, is because of the want of privity between the judgment creditor and his debtor's debtor, and the policy of the law is that the party garnished shall have due notice and examination in relation to the subject of the claim against him, and be afforded an opportunity to pay without suit. But in this case the plaintiff voluntarily comes into court as the actor, and sues Sullivan and Sarnow. The plaintiff thereby waives all proceedings under said sections and invokes the jurisdiction of the court, and when Sarnow appears in such proceedings he consents to the jurisdiction of the court to hear and determine their conflicting claims to the property; and it would be an idle performance to stay all proceedings in the interpleader suit until Sullivan had taken those steps contemplated by section 717 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, in order that he might establish his right to claim the money. For it certainly could not be contended that a party garnished may absolutely destroy the rights acquired under the original levy by instituting a suit under section 383. The levy of the execution gave to Sullivan rights which she might enforce under proceedings supplementary to the execution, and the effect of which would be to defer any claim of Sarnow to such money until those rights had been determined. All parties then appearing, the determination of their respective rights could be had in this proceeding as effectually as in an original proceeding brought by Sullivan against plaintiff. The cross-complaint, therefore, as against the general demurrer, was sufficient, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

Judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the cross-complaint.

PEOPLE v. RICHARDS.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 15, 1905.)

1. Criminal Law—Appeal—Harmless Error.

A judgment will not be reversed because of questions allowed to be asked a witness on cross-examination, where he testified to substantially the same things on his direct examination.

2. Same—Impeachment of Verdict.

A verdict finding a defendant charged with murder guilty of manslaughter cannot be impeached by affidavits of the jurors that it was agreed to as a compromise between jurors who were in favor of a higher degree and those who were for acquittal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2392, 2393.]

3. Same—Instructions.

It is not error to instruct the jury in a criminal case that "it is the duty of every juror to reason with his fellow jurors to the end that he may join in a lawful verdict"; that being the purpose of the statute in requiring the jury to "retire for deliberation."

4. Homicide — Reading Law to Jury — Instructions.

It is not error, on a trial for murder in which the homicide is admitted, to read to the jury section 1105 of the Penal Code, providing that "upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable," where the jury are also instructed that defendant is entitled to an acquittal if the evidence is such as to create a reasonable doubt of his guilt.

5. Statutes — Jury — Selection—Constitutional Law—Local Law.

That portion of Code Civ. Proc. § 204, providing for the selection of the panel of jurors by a majority of the judges of the superior courts in counties and cities and counties having a population of 100,000 inhabitants or over, instead of by the board of supervisors, as provided for in other counties, is not in contravention of article 4, § 25, of the state Constitution, which prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws "regulating the practice of courts of justice"; virtually the same provision having been enacted long prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, and kept in force by article 22, § 11, thereof, which provides that "all laws relating to the present judicial system of the state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this Constitution until changed by legislation."

6. Same—Decision as to Constitutionality.

The courts will not hold a legislative act unconstitutional where there is a reasonable doubt as to its invalidity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, § 46.]

7. Jury—Challenge to Panel.

The fact that some of the persons selected as jurors do not possess the requisite qualifications is not ground for a challenge to the panel.

8. Same—Selection.

The provisions of the Code as to selecting jurors are directory and should be liberally construed, and a substantial compliance with the methods laid down is all that is required.

9. Same.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 204, which provides that after the superior court in January of each year has made an order designating the number of trial jurors required for the ensuing year, and after the list of such jurors has been made and returned, they shall serve for the "ensuing year or until a new list of jurors shall be provided," it was not error to select a trial jury from the list returned for the preceding year, where it does not appear from the record that at the time of the trial the list for the current year had been certified and filed with the clerk as required by sections 208, 209, until which time the new list has not been "provided" within the meaning of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Prosecution of Edward Richards for murder. From a judgment of conviction for manslaughter, and an order overruling a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Court of Appeal October 12, 1905; by Supreme Court November 14, 1905.

COOPER, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and convicted of manslaughter. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying said motion.

1. It is contended that it was error for the court to permit the prosecution to ask the witness Selvaggo several questions in cross-examination, tending to show that he spent most of his time in lounging and loafing in and around saloons and dance halls. The witness had testified on direct examination that he was in the habit of sitting around the saloon where the homicide occurred a great deal of the time; that he had been arrested upon a charge of vagrancy, as being an idle and dissolute person roaming around the streets. The cross-examination did not bring out any facts that would more strongly tend to discredit the witness than the facts he had already testified to on direct examination. It is always the safer and more dignified course for the prosecution to refrain from asking questions in cross-examination that are insulting or that tend merely to degrade the witness. But a case will not be reversed because of error in allowing such questions where it is apparent that no injury was done. In this case the witness had, in direct examination, testified to substantially the same matters that were brought out in the cross-examination, and, therefore, he suffered no injury by the cross-examination.

2. The court did not err in striking out the affidavits of certain jurors made for the purpose of impeaching the verdict to which they had assented. The affidavits tended to show that, after the jurors had been deliberating for more than four hours—some voting for murder in the first degree, some for murder in the second degree, some for manslaughter, and some for acquittal—as the hour was getting late, and to prevent being kept out all night, it was agreed as a compromise that the jurors who had been voting for murder would vote for manslaughter, in consideration that those who had been voting for not guilty would also vote for manslaughter. The affidavit of one juror states, "that in order that another trial of said cause be not had, and to save the defendant from being convicted of murder, and purely as a compromise verdict upon said charge, the 12 jurors being unable to agree upon a verdict, affiant, and others upon said jury who believed in the innocence of the defendant upon the charge of murder, agreed to vote and did vote, to convict the defendant of the crime of manslaughter." The verdict was evidently a compromise, as many verdicts are. The jurors held different views, but finally, by mutual concessions, reached a mean between two extremes. The jurors who had voted "not guilty," in order to save another trial and to prevent defendant from being convicted of murder, agreed to the verdict of manslaughter. The jurors who believed the defendant guilty of murder, in the language of one of the affidavits, "seeing after several ballots were taken that it was hopeless to further vote for the conviction of defendant of murder in the second degree in said cause, voted for the conviction of defendant upon the charge of manslaughter." If a verdict could be set aside because arrived at after discussion and by way of compromise, few verdicts would stand. A juror who would not deliberate and listen to the views of his fellow jurors would be a dangerous man to have upon a jury. While every juror should act conscientiously, and not sign or agree to a verdict that he does not approve of, yet discussion and listening to the views of others may convince him that his first impressions were wrong, and that the views of his fellow jurors are correct. It has been universally held in this state that affidavits of jurors cannot be used to impeach their own verdict, except where the verdict is reached by a resort to the determination of chance. The case of Dixon v. Pluns, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180, does not support appellant's contention. There, in an action for damages, the jurors agreed that each juror should write on a piece of paper the amount at which he would fix the verdict, and the aggregate of the sums thus written should be divided by 12, and that this should be the verdict of the jury. Such verdict was clearly the result of chance. The result was uncertain and unknown, and depended to a certain degree upon the estimate of each juror, which could only be known to himself. In the case at bar each juror knew the verdict to which he agreed. No matter what influences caused him to agree to it, it was assented to by him, and was not determined by chance. If the verdict had been determined in pursuance of an agreement to abide by the result of a game of cards, a guess, or tossing up a coin, then affidavits of the jurors finding it would have been admissible.

3. In cross-examination of the witness Selvaggo the district attorney read to him what purported to be his answer to a question from his testimony given at the coroner's inquest, for the purpose of asking the witness if he so stated. The attorney for defendant objected to reading a part of the answer so given, and asked that the whole of the statement be read. The court informed the district attorney that he could read the portion to which he desired to call the attention of the witness. The defendant's attorney excepted to the ruling, and now urges the ruling as erroneous. Notwithstanding the ruling of the court the district attorney said: "I will give everything; I will read from the beginning." He then appears to have continued reading the balance of the answer, covering some two folios of the transcript, and questioned the witness about it. The objection was not renewed, and evidently the whole of the answer given at the coroner's inquest was read; at least it is not shown otherwise. It therefore not only appears that there was no error committed, but that the contention is entirely without merit. It is due to the business of this court and the orderly dispatch thereof, that counsel should not insist upon error in regard to matters of such trifling import.

4. It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that "it is the duty of every juror to reason with his fellow jurors, to the end that he may join in a lawful verdict." The instruction only stated to the jury that which each juror is presumed to have known. The court, in the same instruction of which the above is an extract, told the jury: "The action of the other jurors in their deliberation should not influence your action as to what your verdict should be without your judgment individually as a juror in the case is changed by argument of your associates upon the evidence introduced and the law as given you by the court. You are just as much entitled to your opinion as to what the evidence and the law warrants you in doing in this case as is any other juror in the case, or all the others combined." If the contention of defendant is correct, the jurors would not be required to reason with each other in their deliberations. The law requires that the jury retire for deliberation. Pen. Code, §§ 1135–1138. Deliberation means careful consideration and examination of the reasons for and against a choice or measure. We often speak of the deliberations of a legislative body, of a board or council, as well as of a jury. It was the duty of every juror to deliberate, to reflect upon, and reason, for the purpose of joining in a lawful verdict.

5. It is claimed that the court erred in reading section 1105 of the Penal Code to the jury as part of its instructions. The section reads: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable." It is said that the killing was admitted by defendant, and he justified by attempting to show that it was done in self-defense, hence that it was error to tell the jury that in such case the burden of proof shifts to the defendant. The section clearly contemplates that in case the homicide is proved or admitted, the burden is upon the defendant to prove circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that defendant was justifiable or excusable. And this is what the court told the jury, and was correct. People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 653, 33 Pac. 791; People v. Adams, 137 Cal. 582, 70 Pac. 662; People v. Matthai, 135 Cal. 445, 67 Pac. 694. The court elsewhere in its charge told the jury that the law does not require the defendant to establish his defense beyond a reasonable doubt, or even by a preponderance of evidence; but that, if the evidence was such as to create in the minds of the jurors a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, they should acquit him. Other instructions and rulings are complained of; but after examination we find no prejudicial error, and it would serve no useful purpose to further discuss them.

6. Defendant's counsel have devoted over 40 pages of their printed brief to a discussion and criticism of the manner of drawing the jury, and an additional brief amicus curiæ has been filed with the names of some 50 members of the bar attached to it. We do not deem it necessary to discuss any of the points made in the brief, except the single one raised by the record in regard to the challenge to the panel. The challenge interposed to the panel was on "the ground that no jury had been drawn, nor had any panel of jurors ever been summoned or drawn for that purpose; defendant claiming that said section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as it purports to confer power on said judges to draw or cause to be drawn a jury to try the defendant, is in conflict with the Constitution of this state." The section referred to provides a general rule to the effect that, after the superior court in January of each year has made an order designating the number of trial jurors that will be required for the transaction of the business of the court and the trial of causes for the ensuing year, the board of supervisors shall select in the manner prescribed in sections 205 and 206 a list of persons, equal in number to that designated by the court in its order, to serve as trial jurors during the ensuing year, or until a new list of jurors shall be provided. Then follows the provision claimed to be unconstitutional, to wit: "In counties and cities and counties having a population of one hundred thousand inhabitants or over, such selection shall be made by a majority of the judges of the superior courts." If we were considering alone the merits of the methods of selecting trial jurors, we would have no hesitation in saying that the superior judges are certainly as competent to select the list of trial jurors as the boards of supervisors. In either case the list must be made from persons who are assessed on the last preceding assessment roll, from those who are not exempt from serving, in possession of their mental faculties, not infirm or decrepit, of fair character and approved integrity, and of sound judgment. Then, if any juror shall be selected or listed who is not competent, or does not possess the necessary qualifications, he may be challenged for cause. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 601, 602; Pen. Code, §§ 1071, 1072. A challenge to the panel can be founded only on a material departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing and return of the jury in civil actions, or the intentional omission of the sheriff to summon one or more of the jurors drawn, and must plainly and distinctly state the facts constituting the grounds of challenge. Pen. Code, §§ 1059, 1060. The challenge, being placed upon the ground that the portion of the section quoted (Code Civ. Proc. § 204), in so far as it purports to confer power upon the superior judges to draw a jury is unconstitutional, we can consider no other. The questions as to the work delegated to the secretary by the judges, and as to the qualifications of the jurors on the list, may therefore be eliminated. In fact such matters are not the ground of a challenge to the panel. The fact that some of the jurors selected do not possess the requisite qualifications is not a ground of challenge to the panel, even if such ground had been stated in the challenge. People v. Young, 108 Cal. 12, 41 Pac. 281; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 194, 48 Pac. 75. It is claimed that the said portion of section 204, Code Civ. Proc., making it the duty of the superior judges, in counties having a population of 100,000 or over, to select trial jurors, contravenes article 4, § 25, of the Constitution, which prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws: "* * * Third. Regulating the practice of courts of justice; * * * Thirty-third. In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable."

In determining the question, as to the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature, we must remember that the Legislature is an independent part of our government. It is presumed to have had the Constitution in mind when passing the act. It is the exponent of the popular will, and its acts must be treated with respect, reconciled and sustained if possible. A court is never justified in setting at naught the will of the Legislature, unless it is clearly repugnant to the Constitution. In all cases of reasonable doubt the courts will not hold an act to be void because of its being unconstitutional. S. & V. R. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 160; University of Cal. v. Bernard, 57 Cal. 612. Section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended in May, 1876, so as to authorize the district judges of the several districts in the city and county of San Francisco, probate judge, and judge of the municipal criminal court, or a majority of such judges, to select the list of trial jurors. The section was a part of the judicial system before the adoption of the present Constitution, which provides (article 22, § 11): "All laws relating to the present judicial system of the state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this Constitution until changed by legislation." It has been held that the provision of the section has virtually remained unchanged by legislation, and has been kept in force by the express provisions of the present Constitution. People v. Gallagher, 55 Cal. 462; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 194, 48 Pac. 75. As this construction has been placed upon the section by the highest court in the state, and as the procedure of selecting the list of jurors by the judges in cities and counties having a population of 100,000 or over has been followed in this state for over a quarter of a century, we would hesitate long before holding the section unconstitutional at this late day. Practice and acquiescence in the machinery provided for by the section as to selecting jurors for a period of so many years, sanctioned by the courts, furnishes an almost irresistible reason for not now overturning it. Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch, 299, 2 L. Ed. 115; Railroad Commissioners v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 677, 64 Pac. 1065. It has been held that the justices of the peace of the city and county of San Francisco, provided for by the act of 1866, were continued in force by virtue of the quoted section of the Constitution (Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 316, 46 Pac. 87, 33 L. R. A. 620); and the law regulating appeals from justices' courts to the county courts was held to apply to the superior court. California Fruit, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 305.

The contention is made that the jury was not drawn from the jurors selected and listed for the year 1904. The statute provides that an order shall be made in January of each year designating the number of trial jurors that will, in the opinion of the court, be required for the transaction of business during the ensuing year, and such jurors shall "serve as trial jurors during the ensuing year, or until a new list of jurors shall be provided." It is undoubtedly the proper construction of the section that, in any year after the list of jurors for such year has been ordered selected and returned, all jurors thereafter impaneled shall be selected from such list. It is shown by the bill of exceptions that "no name on the present panel of this department of the court has been drawn from the trial jury box of the year 1904. They were drawn from the jurors selected and listed by the judges and put in the trial jury box for the year 1903." The Code provides that, after a list of jurors has been made and returned, they shall serve for the "ensuing year, or until a new list shall be provided." It does not appear that the list for 1904 had been certified and filed with the clerk and the names placed in the trial jury box, as it is provided shall be done (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 208, 209), at the time the panel was returned from which the jury was drawn. A new list of jurors was not provided for the year 1904 within the meaning of the law, until the certified list was placed in the possession of, and filed with, the clerk. It is incumbent upon the party claiming error to show it, as all presumptions here are in favor of the lower court. We must hold the provisions of the Code as to selecting jurors directory, and give them a liberal construction. A substantial compliance with the methods laid down by the statute is all that is required.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PELEGRINELLI et al. v. McCLOUD RIVER LUMBER CO.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 15, 1905.)

1. APPEAL — REVIEW — ORDER SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT.

An order granting or denying a motion to set aside the default of a defendant will not be reversed on appeal, unless an abuse of discretion is clearly shown, and especially where the motion is granted.

2. SAME—EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

A motion by a corporation to set aside a judgment for a personal injury entered against it by default was supported by affidavits showing that defendant had prepared to defend an action for the injury some two years before, but the action was not then brought; that, on learning casually that the action had been brought, defendant's president notified the agent of an insurance company which was bound by its contract to defend the same, placed the evidence in his hands, and understood that such company would enter an appearance without further notice, although service of summons had not then been made; and that defendant rested upon that understanding until after the judgment was entered before learning of the default. A showing of merits was also made. Held, that such showing made a case of excusable neglect, within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and that the granting of the motion on reasonable terms was not an abuse of discretion.

3. AFFIDAVITS—INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

An affidavit, to be used as evidence, must be positive and direct, and statements made therein on information and belief cannot be considered as evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Maria Pelegrinelli and others against the McCloud River Lumber Company. Plaintiffs appeal from an order setting aside a judgment entered against defendant on default for want of an answer. Affirmed.

HARRISON, P. J. Judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was rendered herein upon the default of the defendant for failure to answer the complaint. Upon the motion of the defendant the court made an order setting aside the default and judgment upon the payment by the defendant to the plaintiffs of $150 within 10 days from the date of the order. From this order the plaintiffs have appealed.

The defendant is a corporation engaged in operating a lumber mill in Siskiyou county, and the present action is to recover damages sustained by the plaintiffs as the personal representatives of one Amateo Pelegrinelli by reason of his death in May, 1900, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant. The action was commenced February 6, 1902, and the default of the defendant for want of appearance was entered February 25th, and judgment thereon was rendered March 17, 1902. The motion to set aside the default was noticed March 25th, and on March 28th the court made the above order. In Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 666, 63 Pac. 63, it was said: "The granting or denying a motion to set aside the default of the defendant is so largely a matter of discretion with the trial court that, unless it is clearly made to appear that there has been an abuse of this discretion, this court declines to set aside its order. Especially are we indisposed to review its action when it has set aside the default and it does not appear that the plaintiff has sustained any prejudice thereby. The discretion of the court is best exercised when it tends to bring about a judgment upon the merits of the controversy between the parties." See, also, Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 Pac. 932; O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105; Savings Bank v. Schell, 142 Cal. 505, 76 Pac. 250. Error is never presumed and the burden of showing an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court is always upon the appellant. As in the case of a finding of fact by that court, if there was any evidence before it which, by reasonable construction, will support its order, its action will be upheld. If the facts presented to it are such that reasonable minds might reach different conclusions thereon, the appellate court will not disturb the conclusion reached by the trial court. The rule is the same whether the motion is granted or denied by the trial court. An examination of the cases cited by the appellants will show that in all of them the action of the trial court has been affirmed, with the exception of two or three cases, in which the default of the party was clearly attributable to pure neglect on his part, and without any showing of an excuse.

The death of Pelegrinelli occurred in May, 1900, and in June of that year the defendant was informed by certain attorneys of their purpose to institute an action against it in behalf of the present plaintiffs; and thereupon the defendant made preparation for the defense of such action by obtaining statements of those having knowledge of the facts connected with the death, and procuring photographs of the locality. No action was brought at that time, but on February 6, 1902, other attorneys commenced the present action. At the hearing of the motion to set aside the default it was shown, by affidavits presented on behalf of the defendant, that at the time the action was commenced and for some time prior thereto the defendant held a policy of insurance with an insurance company, by the terms of which that company agreed to defend it against all actions of the character of the present one. The summons and complaint in this action were not served until February 10th, but on the morning of February 7th the president of the defendant saw a notice in a San Francisco newspaper that the action had been commenced, and he immediately sent for the agent of the insurance company and informed him thereof, and, with him, went over the case and the matters and facts connected with it, and with the defense thereto, and the said agent then and there agreed with the president that the insurance company would appear in said action through its regular attorneys on behalf of the defendant and defend the same, and take entire charge of said defense. At the same time the president delivered to the said agent all of the aforesaid photographs and statements of witnesses. Nothing was said between them with reference to the summons or complaint in the action, or with reference to the service of the same, or when the insurance company would appear therein on behalf of the defendant; but the president states in his affidavit that he understood and believed, from the statement of the agent, that the insurance company would forthwith or within a few days thereafter enter an appearance in the action, or arrange with the attorneys for the plaintiffs with reference thereto, and would take all steps necessary or proper for its defense in said action, and that from that time until after he had learned that judgment had been rendered herein he believed that said company had appeared in the action or arranged for an appearance, and had done or were doing everything necessary or proper for the defense of the company. The summons and complaint were served upon the secretary of the defendant, and were by him immediately delivered to the president, who placed them in a drawer in his office where they remained until after he learned of the entry of the judgment. He also states that he had no notice or knowledge that the defendant's default had been taken, or any trial of the action had, until after the judgment had been entered. The agent of the insurance company, in his affidavit, corroborates the affidavit of the president, except that he states that in the interview of February 7th he meant by his promise and agreement, and thought that the president understood and believed that he meant, that no appearance would be entered in the action or steps taken by the insurance company on behalf of the defendant until after the service of the summons and complaint and notice thereof was given to the insurance company, but he also stated that nothing was said between them with reference thereto.

An affidavit of merits was made on behalf of the defendant, and also an offer to file a verified answer forthwith and proceed at once to the trial of the action, and to comply with any order as to terms that the court might deem reasonable as a condition for setting aside the default and judgment. It sufficiently appeared from these affidavits that the defendant had been advised and believed that it had a good and substantial defense to the plaintiff's action upon the merits, and that it had made preparations for such defense, and intended to defend the action, and for that purpose had secured the aid of the insurance company. We cannot say that it would have been an unreasonable inference by the trial court, from the affidavits, that, upon the interview between the president of the defendant and the agent of the insurance company, he honestly and in good faith understood and believed that that company would, without any further notice or request on his part, take all necessary steps for the defense of the action; and in support of the order appealed from it will be assumed here that that court did make such inference. It may be conceded that it would have been an act of prudence on his part, when he received the copy of the summons and complaint, to have delivered them to the insurance company; but, if he had the right to believe and did believe that the insurance company would enter its appearance and defend the action irrespective of any service of the summons, his failure to give the copies to it cannot be held to have been attributable to any carelessness or inattention. Whatever omission there was must be regarded as an excusable neglect. "Section 473, Code Civ. Proc., is a remedial provision, and is to be liberally construed so as to dispose of all cases upon their substantial merits and to give to the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense to the action an opportunity to present it." Nicoll v. Weldon, supra.

The policy of insurance held by the defendant, which was introduced on behalf of the plaintiffs, in which there is a provision requiring the holder of the policy, whenever an action should be brought against it, to forward immediately to the office of the company the summons or other process as soon as the same should be served upon it, cannot be considered in determining whether there was negligence on the part of the defendant, inasmuch as this policy was not issued until after the default had been entered in this action. The affidavit of one of the plaintiffs, to the effect that at the time of the accident the defendant held another policy from the same company containing a similar provision, was not entitled to be considered by the court, for the reason that it purported to be only an affidavit that the affiant had been informed and believed that such was the case. The Code authorizes allegations of a pleader to be made upon information and belief; but an affidavit which is to be used as evidence must be positive and direct. The action of the court is to be based upon facts which may be presented to it, and not upon the belief of the affiant. See Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 Pac. 540; Thompson v. Higginbotham, 18 Kan. 42. The plaintiffs made no claim that they would suffer any loss or injury by reason of setting aside the default, nor did it appear that, upon an acceptance of the defendant's offer to have the case set down for trial at an early day, they would not be able to fully present their cause of action, or that they would be deprived of any right. The terms imposed by the court must be deemed an ample compensation for the inconvenience and delay incident upon being required to try the case again.

The order is affirmed.

MARCH v. BARNET et al.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 15, 1905.)

JUDGMENT — SATISFACTION — SEPARATE JUDGMENTS FOR SAME CAUSE OF ACTION.

Plaintiff, in an action against a number of defendants for damages for the wrongful seizure and sale of his property on an execution, is entitled to recover no more than the value of such property as determined by the court, and where, as the result of separate appeals, he recovered a judgment against one defendant for a part of the amount, which was paid, and against the others jointly and severally for the entire amount, the latter are entitled to have the amount paid by their codefendant credited on the judgment against them.

Action by Alvaretta L. March, as administratrix, against S. Barnet and others. Plaintiff appeals from an order recalling and quashing an execution and satisfying the judgment previously rendered in her favor. Affirmed.

See 51 Pac. 20.

Rehearing denied November 14, 1905.

W. D. Storey, for appellant. Dinkelspiel & Jacobs and Lindsay & Netherton, for respondents.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order of the trial court quashing and recalling an execution, and ordering the entry of satisfaction of the judgment that had been rendered in favor of plaintiff. This action was brought by William F. March, and on his death Alvaretta L. March, as administratrix of his estate, was substituted as plaintiff. In the complaint it is alleged in substance that theretofore an action had been brought by one Button against said Jacob Steen, as maker of a certain promissory note, and said Wm. F. March, as indorser thereof; that an attachment had been issued and property of Steen levied upon; that to secure the release of said property said S. Barnet and one Bowman entered into an undertaking whereby they undertook to pay any judgment that might be rendered against Steen, and thereupon the attachment was released. Subsequently in said action judgment was recovered against Steen, as maker, and March, as indorser, for the sum of $625.97. Thereupon Barnet paid said judgment and took an assignment thereof from Button. Subsequently Barnet assigned said judgment to Isaac Blum, who, shortly after assigned it to Joseph Blum, having first taken out execution and placed the same in the hands of the sheriff with instructions to seize and sell the interest of March in the schooner Ingalls, which, under the further directions of Joseph Blum, the sheriff did, selling the said interest of March to Joseph Blum for $770. Said interest was alleged to be of the value of $1,400, but was found by the court to be of the value of $1,000. Before making the sale the sheriff demanded an indemnifying bond, which was given by the Blums and I. H. Jacobs. Joseph Blum, on the day of the sale, transferred his purchase to I. H. Jacobs, who at the beginning of the suit still held the same. Of the amount realized on the sale $596 was credited on the execution, the balance being applied to costs of sale, etc. Each of the defendants at said sale and at the time of said assignment of said judgment had notice of the relation that Barnet bore to said judgment, and knew that he was a surety on said undertaking for the release of the attachment on Steen's property; that said transfers from Barnet to Isaac Blum, from Isaac Blum to Joseph Blum, and from Joseph Blum to I. H. Jacobs, were made with the purpose on the part of each of the parties thereto to have the said property of plaintiff seized under said execution and sold to reimburse Barnet for the amount he had paid on the judgment against Steen; that Steen instigated and aided and abetted the other defendants in said matters; and that all the other defendants actively participated therein. Judgment was demanded for $1,400, interest, and costs. The court found the facts as above set forth, save that it did not find that Steen instigated, aided, or abetted the proceeding, and rendered judgment for plaintiff against Steen for $770, and interest from the date of said sale and costs, but gave judgment for the other defendants. The defendant Steen took an appeal from the judgment against him, and the plaintiff appealed from that portion of the judgment in favor of the other defendants.

Upon the hearing of the appeal taken by Steen the judgment was modified by reducing the amount to the sum of $596, the amount actually credited on the judgment (March v. Steen, 114 Cal. 375, 46 Pac. 152); he being held liable upon the ground that by the sale under execution of property of plaintiff and the application of the proceeds to the payment of a judgment for which, as between plaintiff and Steen, Steen was primarily liable, plaintiff was entitled to recover of Steen the amount which he (plaintiff) had in effect paid on the judgment against Steen. Steen promptly paid this judgment to one Devoe, the assignee thereof. Subsequently the appeal of plaintiff as against Barnet, the Blums, and Jacobs was decided, and judgment ordered upon the findings against said last-named defendants for $1,000, the value of the property of plaintiff which it was determined had been wrongly seized and sold by these defendants, and interest from the date of the sale and costs. March v. Barnet, 121 Cal. 419, 53 Pac. 933, 66 Am. St. Rep. 44. Upon the entry of judgment in the trial court plaintiff caused execution to issue for the full amount thereof, giving no credit for the amount that had previously been paid by Steen, and levied on property of this respondent, I. H. Jacobs. Jacobs moved the court to recall said execution, and before the hearing of the motion paid to the sheriff the balance due on such judgment, after deducting from the amount of the judgment entered against Barnet, the Blums, and Jacobs the amount theretofore paid by Steen. The court granted the motion, and ordered the entry of full satisfaction of the judgment. The appellant claims the right to collect the full amount of the judgment entered against the codefendants of Steen without giving any credit for the amount paid by Steen, while the respondent claims that he is entitled to a credit for the amount paid by his codefendant Steen.

This latter contention we think to be correct. The action was brought to recover damages resulting to plaintiff from the wrongful taking of his property. It was found that the property taken was of the value of $1,000. As a result of the litigation between these parties it has finally been adjudicated and determined that plaintiff's property was wrongfully taken and converted, to his damage in the sum of $1,000, the value of the property at the time of the conversion, and interest from said time. It has also been determined that Barnet, the two Blums, and Jacobs are jointly and severally liable to plaintiff for the entire amount of such damage, while Steen is liable only to the extent to which the proceeds of the property wrongfully converted were applied to his use. Notwithstanding the form in which the judgment was finally entered, $596 against Steen, and $1,000 against Barnet, Blum, and Jacobs, it is plain from the entire record that it is but one judgment for $1,000 damages, for which Barnet, the Blums, and Jacobs are liable for the entire amount, and Steen for $596 only. Plaintiff has now been paid the $1,000, which the court determined to be the full value of his property wrongfully converted, together with interest from the date of conversion, and costs of suit. By collecting from Steen the $596 realized from the execution sale, he has availed himself to that extent of the benefit of that sale.

The orders are affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1905.)

BILLS AND NOTES—CONSTRUCTION—PAYMENT—TIME—LIMITATIONS.

Where a note dated October 27, 1893, was payable "on or before three years after date," but also provided that payments should be made as follows, to wit, $80 on the 1st day of November, 1893, and the balance in monthly installments of not less than $12.50, including interest and principal on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter until both principal and interest were fully paid, plaintiff was entitled to sue for the first installment if not paid on November 1, 1893, and for each installment unpaid as it became due thereafter, so that limitations began to run against each installment from the time of its maturity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Wm. C. Bissell against Sheridan Forbes and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. C. Bissell, in pro. per. Wright & Wright, for respondents.

COOPER, J. Action to recover on a promissory note and to obtain a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage given as security therefor. The court below held that the promissory note, except the last installment, was barred by the statute of limitations, and gave judgment for the last installment only, with a decree of foreclosure. From this judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question here is as to the construction to be placed upon the promissory note, which reads as follows: "$482.40. San Francisco, Cal. Oct. 27th, 1893. On or before three years after date, for value received, we promise to pay to Wm. C. Bissell, or order, the sum of four hundred eighty-two and $^{40}/_{100}$ ($482.40) dollars, in United States gold coin, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable monthly. Payments shall be made as follows: Eighty ($80) dollars on the first day of November, 1893, and the balance in monthly installments of not less than twelve and $^{50}/_{100}$ ($12.50) dollars including interest and principal, on the first day of each and every month thereafter until both principal and interest are fully paid. This note is secured by a mortgage bearing even date herewith. Sheridan Forbes. Louise Mills Forbes." The action was commenced October 16, 1900, and in time if the whole of the note became due October 27, 1896, and not before, but not otherwise. The note was made in contemplation of all the payments being made within three years after its date; but it contains the express agreement that $80 was to be paid November 1, 1893, and $12.50 on the 1st of each and every month thereafter. There is no ambiguity as to this. The parties agreed to it, and it is not for the courts to make contracts for them. It is elementary that the statute of limitations commences to run from the time an action might be brought. If the first installment, $80, was not paid November 1, 1893, the plaintiff could immediately have commenced an action to recover said amount, and to foreclose his mortgage to that extent, and so of the $12.50 due December 1, 1893, and of each subsequent installment. It is precisely as though a promissory note had been given for the $80 and for each payment of $12.50. The defendants agreed to pay the whole sum on or before three years from date, but they agreed to pay the separate installments at the times provided for in the note. The meaning of the language is plain. Defendants understood what they had agreed to do, and plaintiff must be presumed to have known the time when the installments of the note matured. Ewer v. Myrick, 55 Mass. 16; Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16. The result is unfortunate for plaintiff, but we cannot relieve him on that ground. If the defendants desire to shield themselves by the statute of limitations, they have the right to do so.

The judgment is affirmed.

DODGE v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1905.)

MANDAMUS—REINSTATEMENT OF POLICEMAN—LIMITATIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 1, providing that an action on a liability created by statute must be commenced within three years, and section 343, declaring that an action for relief, not otherwise provided for, must be commenced within four years after the accrual of the cause of action, a mandamus proceeding to require plaintiff's reinstatement as a policeman, brought nine years after his removal, is barred by limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Application by Edward E. Dodge against the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco and others for a writ of mandate to compel respondents to admit the applicant to the position of patrolman on the police force of the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment awarding the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., for appellants. T. C. West and H. M. Owens, for respondent.

COOPER, J. Application for writ of mandate. The petition alleges that the defendants, acting as the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, did on or about the 12th day of June, 1893, dismiss the plaintiff from his position of patrolman of the police force of the city and county of San Francisco. The petition for the writ was filed March 6, 1902. In the case of Jones v. Board of Police Commissioners, 141 Cal. 96, 74 Pac. 696, an action similar to the present, it was held that the cause of action was barred by subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also by section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That case was followed and approved by this court in Farrell v. Board of Police Commissioners of City and County of San Francisco (filed May 24, 1905) 81 Pac. 674.

Under the authority of these cases the judgment and order in this case is reversed.

CRAIG et al. v. GRAY et al.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 16, 1905.)

1. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—COMPLAINT—NOTICE TO QUIT.

Where a complaint in unlawful detainer alleged a holding over, without permission of the landlord or his successor in estate, after the expiration of the term fixed in the lease, the complaint was not defective for failure to allege the giving of a notice to quit.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 1238.]

2. SAME—LEASES—TERMINATION.

Where a lease by its express terms expired on a specified date, it was not necessary that either a 3 or 30 days' notice to quit should be given to terminate the lease, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 1, defining unlawful detainer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 32, Cent. Dig. Landlord and Tenant, § 317.]

3. SAME—HOLDING OVER WITHOUT PERMISSION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for unlawful detainer, evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that defendants remained in possession after the termination of the lease without plaintiffs' permission.

4. SAME—ISSUES—FAILURE TO FIND—PREJUDICE.

Where, in unlawful detainer, the complaint alleged the making of a lease by C. and F., as lessors, to defendants, and that thereafter F. by deed of gift conveyed all his interest in the premises to his daughter, which allegation defendants denied, but no evidence was introduced thereon by either party, whereupon the court found that the daughter had no interest in the premises and rendered judgment in favor of C. and F., the court's failure to find on the issue raised with reference to the conveyance was not prejudicial to defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by Mary Lynde Craig and others against G. F. Gray and another. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, and from so much thereof as awarded damages apart from possession of the premises sued for, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

HALL, J. The plaintiffs Mary Lynde Craig and Samuel Lynde Foster recovered judgment against defendants for the possession of certain premises, together with the sum of $1,500 damages, with interest and costs, in an action of unlawful detainer. The defendants have appealed from an order denying their motion for a new trial, and from so much of the judgment as awards damages, but not from that portion which awards possession of the premises to plaintiffs.

Appellants urge that "the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action," and contend that the complaint should contain an allegation of the giving of a notice to quit. But the complaint in this case alleges a holding over without the permission of the landlord or his successor in estate after the expiration of the term fixed in the lease. As alleged in the complaint, by express provisions of said lease, the term thereof expired on the 1st day of December, 1901. In such a case neither a 3 days' notice to quit nor a 30 days' notice of the termination of the lease is required. Section 1161, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc. See Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong & Co., 91 Cal. 593, 28 Pac. 45; Canning v. Fibush, 77 Cal. 196, 19 Pac. 376; Stoppelkamp v. Mangeot, 42 Cal. 322; McKissick v. Ashby, 98 Cal. 424, 33 Pac. 729; Perine v. Teague, 66 Cal. 446, 6 Pac. 84.

The court found that the defendants, after the expiration of the terms fixed in the lease, continued in possession of the premises without permission of the plaintiffs, or either of them; and the appellants urge that the evidence shows that appellants retained possession of the premises with the consent of plaintiffs. In this connection it may be noted that defendants in their answer deny that they remained in possession of the premises at all after the termination of the lease. But, passing this point, the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in finding that defendants remained in possession after the termination of their lease without the permission of the plaintiffs. The premises were leased to defendants by Mary L. Craig and Samuel L. Foster for the purpose of being used by defendants to take rock therefrom. During the last five years of the term the rental was $250 per month, payable in advance, and the term expired December 1, 1901. Mary L. Craig testified that she called at the office of the Grays on November 9th preceding the expiration of the lease to see if they wished to renew the lease, but they did not come to any terms. The Grays offered $100 per month and 10 cents per yard for all over 1,000 yards. She told them she wanted $250. She again visited Mr. Gray's office December 2d to order them to take up their tracks. She said: "You were at work to-day and yesterday drilling and taking stone away." And he said: "Why, I thought the lease did not expire until the 12th of December." She said: "It expired on the 1st. Either I want the rent or the tracks removed." She next called December 13th to see why they continued work without paying, and they offered her $150 and a certain royalty, which she did not accept. She returned on the 16th of December "to find out, if possible, why they are at work without paying, and I got no satisfaction." She further said: "I have not given them permission or consented to their working on any part of that block, nor approved of it, nor given the least intimation of a permission." The evidence clearly shows that the defendants never consented to pay $250 per month which she demanded, and she never consented that they continue in possession and take rock from the premises, unless they would consent to her terms.

Appellants contend that "the court erred in finding that the plaintiff Samuel Lynde Foster was entitled to any judgment whatever against the defendants; it having been alleged that before the termination of said written lease he had transferred all his interest in the said premises to Marion B. Foster," and also that the court erred in finding that Marion B. Foster had no interest in the said premises. These two points may be considered together. The complaint alleges the making of the lease by Mary Lynde Craig and Samuel Lynde Foster, as lessors, to the defendants, and after proper allegations of the entry under the lease and the holding over it is alleged that Samuel Lynde Foster by gift deed conveyed all his interest in the premises, before December 1, 1901, to Marion B. Foster. This latter allegation was by the defendants denied, and the record shows no evidence was introduced on the issue. The court did not expressly find as to whether or not Samuel Lynde Foster did convey to Marion B. Foster, but did find that Marion B. Foster had no interest in said premises. This may be conceded to be a conclusion of law only. The findings that were made support the judgment, which is in favor of Mary Lynde Craig and Samuel Lynde Foster. Inasmuch as the defendants denied the allegation of the conveyance from Samuel to Marion, and there was no evidence introduced on the issue thus presented, the court would have been obliged to find, if it had made a finding on the issue at all, that no such conveyance had been made. This would not have changed the judgment at all. The failure to expressly find on this issue did not, therefore, prejudice defendants. In S. P. R. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 109 Cal. 268, 41 Pac. 1083, it was said: "But, conceding that there should have been a special finding as to the assessment and payment of taxes, still it clearly appears from the evidence that, if such a finding had been made, it must have been in favor of defendants. And, this being so, the plaintiff was in no way prejudiced by the failure, and the judgment cannot be reversed on this ground"—citing Hutchings v. Castle, 48 Cal. 152; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504. In this case, if the court had found that a conveyance had been made from Samuel Lynde Foster to Marion B. Foster, the judgment against the defendants would have been the same, but would have been in favor of Mary Lynde Craig and Marion B. Foster, while, if the court had found that no such conveyance had been made, which as before stated is the only finding that on the record before us could have been properly made, the judgment would still be against the defendants but in favor of Mary Lynde Craig and Samuel Lynde Foster, which is the judgment rendered. Marion B. Foster is not complaining, but, as one of the respondents, is asking this court to affirm the judgment.

We find no error prejudical to defendants, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re HEYWOOD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 4,331.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1905.)

1. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—PURPOSE OF TESTATOR.

A liberal construction should be given to testamentary dispositions of property, and all reasonable intendments should be indulged in, with a view to sustaining testator's disclosed purpose.

2. WILLS—CREATION—FORM OF EXPRESSION.

No particular form of expression need be used in a will to constitute a valid trust; but it is sufficient if, from the language used, the intention of testator is apparent and the disposition which he endeavors to make is consistent with the rules of law.

3. TRUSTS—PURPOSE OF TRUST—MANAGEMENT OF PROPERTY.

Under Civ. Code, § 857, subd. 3, authorizing the creation of a trust to receive the rents and profits of real property and pay or apply them to the use of any person, and section 863, providing that, when a trust is created, the whole estate is vested in the trustee subject to the trust, a trust may be created to "manage" property, and to collect the income, issues, and profits thereof, and pay them to specified persons.

4. WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—CONSIDERATION OF WHOLE INSTRUMENT.

In ascertaining the intention of testator as to the source from which payments under a trust created by will shall be made, resort must be had to all the provisions of the will which tend to disclose testator's intention, and the inquiry should not be restricted solely to the particular clause providing for such payment.

5. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF INSTRUMENTS.

A will bequeathed and devised testator's property, in trust to manage the same and to collect the income thereof and to pay testator's daughter and wife specified monthly sums. A subsequent clause provided that "any excess of income" after the monthly payments were made should be devoted to the improvement of the property or invested in some "income-paying property." Another clause authorized the trustees to sell the property and reinvest the proceeds in "income-paying real estate, or other safe income-paying securities," in order to carry out the provisions of the will. Held, that the will contemplated that the monthly payments should be made out of the income only of the trust property, and an objection that it authorized such payments to be made out of the corpus of the property, in violation of Civ. Code, § 857, subd. 3, authorizing the creation of a trust to receive the "rents and profits" of real estate and apply them to the use of any person, was untenable.

6. SAME—CONSTRUCTION—INVALID TRUST.

It is only when the language actually used by testator will admit of no other reasonable construction than that it creates an invalid trust that a court will declare such to be its effect.

7. SAME.

A will creating a trust in favor of testator's daughter, and providing that in case of the death of the daughter without issue the property should be "divided" among certain of testator's relatives, did not create a trust as to the relatives specified, but constituted a direct devise to them in the event of the testator's death.

8. TRUSTS—INVALID PROVISIONS—EFFECT ON PRINCIPAL TRUST.

A provision of a trust clause in a will directing the trustee to use the excess of income after payment of specified annuities in the improvement of unimproved property of the trust estate, or to invest it in some income-bearing property, if invalid, is separable from, and does not invalidate, the primary trust created by the will for the management of the trust estate and the payment of annuities to the beneficiaries.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Franklin Heywood, deceased. From an order and decree denying a petition for partial distribution, Agnes Maud Heywood, a daughter of deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied December 8, 1905.

Timothy J. Lyons, for appellant. Powell & Dow, J. B. Reinstein, W. P. Johnson, Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Cary Howard, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order and decree denying a petition for partial distribution.

The will of Franklin Heywood, deceased, which was duly admitted to probate in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, contained, among others, the following provisions: "Third. I give, bequeath and devise to my executors hereinafter named as trustees eighteen hundred and seventy-five (1875) shares of the capital stock of the Gualala Mill Company, a corporation, and all of the residue of my real and personal property, in trust for the following uses and purposes, to wit: (1) To manage said capital stock and property and to collect the income, issues and profits thereof and to pay to my said daughter during the natural life of my wife, Agnes B. Heywood, the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150) per month for my said daughter's maintenance and support. (2) To pay to my wife, Agnes B. Heywood, during her natural life the amount specified in the articles of separation made between us on the 10th day of July, 1890, viz., one hundred and fifty dollars ($150) per month. (3) Upon the death of my wife one-half (½) of the residue of my estate shall vest absolutely in my said daughter and the remaining one-half (½) shall vest absolutely as follows, to wit: One seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof in my brother William B. Heywood or in case of his death in his son William H. Heywood, and the remaining six-sevenths ($^6/_7$) of said one-half (½) in my brothers and sister and nephew and niece, namely, Charles one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, Samuel one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, Walter one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, Harry one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, Hattie G. Hunt, one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, and in Charles Walter Philips and Irene Moet Philips, children of Georgiana Philips, the remaining one-seventh ($^1/_7$) thereof, or, in case of death, their respective children by right of representation. (4) In case my said daughter should die before my said wife without any child or children, then the whole of said residue shall be divided among my said brothers and sister and niece and nephew in the proportions named in the last preceding subdivision. (5) Any excess of income after such monthly payments are made to my said wife and daughter, shall be used in the improvement of any of my unimproved real property or invested in some income-paying property. Fourth. In case it may be necessary or in case it may be deemed advisable by my trustees hereinafter named, they are hereby authorized to sell at any time the said capital stock of the said Gualala Mill Company or any other property belonging to my estate and to reinvest the proceeds in income-paying real estate or other safe income-paying securities to the end that my wishes herein expressed may be carried out for the maintenance and protection of my said wife and my adopted daughter."

The appellant, Agnes M. Heywood, is the daughter of said deceased mentioned in the provisions of said will, and petitioned the said superior court, under section 1663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which allows the distribution of an estate before final settlement after the lapse of one year from the issuance of letters testamentary, for distribution to her of the "residue" of the estate of testator mentioned in clause "third" of said will, which we have quoted, upon the theory that the trust attempted to be created thereby was void, that by reason of such invalidity the testator died intestate as to said "residue," and that petitioner was entitled to have it distributed to her as his heir-at-law. General demurrers to the petition were interposed and sustained, and from a decree entered thereupon denying her petition for distribution, the petitioner appeals.

The sole question presented for consideration in the lower court, and now upon this appeal, is whether or not a valid trust was created by the third clause of said will. The position of appellant with reference to said trust clause is that none of the purposes for which the residue of the estate is thereby devised in trust are authorized by section 857 of the Civil Code, or, to be more precise, it is contended by counsel for appellant that there is no authority in the section for the creation of a trust to "manage" the trust fund or "to pay" the annuities, as provided for in the first and second subdivisions of the trust clause in question, or to "divide" the residue of the trust fund at a certain time and upon a specified contingency, as in the fourth subdivision, or to use the "excess of income" in improving real property, or in making new investments, as subdivision 5 provides that the trustees shall do. We are satisfied, from a fair and careful consideration of the trust clause in question, that there is no merit in any of these objections urged by appellant, as far as we deem it necessary on this appeal to consider them. They amount, in our judgment, more to criticisms upon the language employed by the testator in framing the trust than to sound objections against the validity of the trust provisions themselves. In construing testamentary dispositions of property, it is a cardinal rule that a liberal construction should be given to them, and all reasonable intendments indulged in, with a view of sustaining the purpose which it is disclosed the testator had in view. No particular form of expression is necessary to constitute a valid trust. It is sufficient that, from the language used, the intention of the testator is apparent, and that the disposition in trust which he endeavors to make of his estate is consistent with the rules of law. The intent of the testator is the matter for primary consideration, and it is immaterial what method of expression is employed, as long as that intention can be ascertained. As said in Hill on Trustees, p. 101, "it is one of the fixed rules of equitable construction that there is no magic in particular words"; and this court has said that: "Of course, it is a fundamental principle that a construction of a will favorable to testacy will always obtain when the language used reasonably admits of such construction, and that it will not be held to contain a void trust, unless the invalidity of the trust is beyond question * * * and cannot be reasonably construed otherwise." Estate of Dunphy (Cal. Sup.) 81 Pac. 315.

Examining, now, in the light of these general principles, the several points made by appellant against the validity of the trust clause, it is first insisted that section 857 of the Civil Code, providing what trusts may be created, does not authorize a trust to "manage" a trust fund. It is true that the word "manage" is not mentioned in the section, but there is no reason why it should be. The section was designed to provide the purposes for which valid trusts might be created, not to prescribe the form of expression which was to be used in doing so. The word "manage" means to direct, control, govern, administer, or oversee. 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 706. When a trust is created, the whole estate is vested in the trustee subject to the trust. Civ. Code, § 863. And it is the duty of the trustee to hold the property and administer it. Subdivision 3 of section 857 provides that a trust may be created "to receive the rents and profits of real property and pay them to or apply them to the use of any person. * * *" The trust in the first and second subdivisions of clause third of the will was created for this purpose, and the trustees were directed to manage the trust property to fulfill it. It cannot well be perceived how the "income, issues and profits" referred to in those subdivisions could be derived from the trust estate, unless the trustees managed it so as to produce them. If the trust provision had said nothing about managing the property, the duty would, nevertheless, have been cast by law upon the trustees to do so for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this trust provision. The right to manage the trust property would spring from the devise itself to the trustees as necessary to carry out the purposes of the trust declared, whether the will expressly conferred such power on the trustees or not. And, as the power to manage would be implied, if not expressly granted, no provision of section 857 was violated in expressly conferring it.

Nor do we deem the second objection tenable. This is that the direction to pay to the wife and daughter of testator $150 per month is invalid because such payments are not limited by the terms of the trust to the "rents and profits" as the source alone from which payments shall be made, as provided in subdivision 3 of section 857, but, from the general language used, the capital or corpus of the trust property may be resorted to for such payments. Considered alone, the subdivisions of the trust clause directly providing for such payments may be open to this objection, but in ascertaining the intention of the testator as to the source from which said payments shall be made we must not restrict ourselves solely to an examination of these particular subdivisions of the will. Resort must be had to all the provisions of the will which tend to disclose his intention in that regard. When we do so, there is no room for construction left as to what his intention in that respect was. By his will he directs, first, that the trustees shall manage the property devised, and collect the "income, issues, and profits" and pay the annuitants their monthly allowance, and then provides that "any excess of income after such monthly payments are made to my wife and daughter shall be used in the improvement of any of my unimproved real property or invested in some income-paying property." By the fourth clause he further provides that "in case it may be necessary, or in case it may be deemed advisable by my trustees, * * * they are hereby authorized to sell at any time the said * * * property * * * and to reinvest the proceeds in income-paying real estate or other safe income-paying securities to the end that my wishes herein expressed may be carried out for the maintenance and protection of my said wife and my adopted daughter." These provisions clearly indicate that it was the intention of the testator that the payment of the annuities to his wife and daughter should be made from the income only of the trust property—the rents and profits. In the face of these provisions, so explicitly indicating this purpose, it would be doing violence to the intention of the testator to reach any other conclusion.

It is next insisted that subdivision 4 of the trust clause, which provides that the "whole of the residue of the trust estate shall be divided" among his brothers, sister, niece, and nephew in the event that his daughter dies before his wife, is void, and that a trust "to divide," which counsel for appellant contends is a trust to partition, or convey upon partition, the property of the estate, is not within the purposes for which a valid trust may be created under section 857 of the Civil Code, and relies upon the decision in the Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 535, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70, as particularly supporting his contention. We do not think the principle of the decision in the Fair Case has any application. Under the trust provisions there involved the testator devised his property to trustees with specific directions that they should "transfer and convey" to the beneficiaries. This was the only method prescribed by him for vesting title, and his intention that the beneficiaries should take title by conveyance only from the trustees was repeatedly reiterated in his will. His intention in this regard, in the opinion of the majority of the court, was so clearly and repeatedly expressed that there was no possible room for construing the language of the trust provisions as making a direct devise to the beneficiaries, or as evidencing an intention to do so. The provision of the will at bar under consideration is radically different from the provisions construed in the Fair Case. It does not provide that trustees shall transfer or convey the trust property to the relatives designated as the only method whereby title to the trust property shall pass to them should the specified contingency happen. In fact, no active duty is cast upon the trustees at all under this section. They are not mentioned in it. No express direction that the trustees shall "divide" the trust property is contained in the subdivision, nor is there any direction in any other provision of the will that they shall make any transfer, conveyance, or division of the trust estate among the beneficiaries, or that they shall do anything at all so as to vest title to it in them.

In order to give countenance to the contention of appellant, it would be necessary to interpolate language into the subdivision directing the trustees to do what confessedly the subdivision does not directly prescribe they shall do, and, having made the interpolation, then declare the trust invalid as a trust "to divide." This a court will never do. It is only when the language actually used by the testator will admit of no other reasonable construction than that it creates an invalid trust that a court will declare this to be its effect. This, however, is far from being the character of the language used in the subdivision in question. Taking that language and construing it in connection with the other provisions of the will, notably subdivision 3 immediately preceding it, we think it was undoubtedly the intention of the testator in using the expression that "the whole of said residue shall be divided among" his relatives therein designated to directly devise the share of the estate otherwise going to his daughter to those relatives in the event of her death. By his will the testator provided for the existence of a trust solely during the lifetime of his wife, the income of the trust property to be devoted to the payment of annuities to herself and his daughter during his wife's lifetime, the only active trust duties devolving upon the trustees being to manage the estate so as to secure and expend the income derived from it. By section 3 of the trust clause, upon the death of his wife, he provided that one-half the remainder of his estate "should vest absolutely in his daughter," and that the remaining one-half should "vest absolutely" in his relations therein named. Under this subdivision the whole residue of his estate was vested in the beneficiaries, respectively, named therein by the terms of the trust itself. No provision was made for any division by the trustees, or any other action upon their part relative to the estate so absolutely devised. Subdivision 4, immediately following (the one in question here), was undoubtedly designed to meet the contingency of his daughter dying before his wife without issue, in which event he intended that the half of his estate previously devised to her should go to the devisees to whom the other half was devised, and that there should be thus vested in them the whole residue of his estate. It was not contemplated that the absolute devise of one-half which he had previously made to the beneficiaries, other than his daughter, should be disturbed in the event of her death, but only that, in such event, the prior disposition in their favor should be increased by vesting in them, in the same proportions as they took their own half, the share to which she would be entitled if she survived the testator's wife. This would necessarily vest in these beneficiaries the whole of the residue, and this was undoubtedly the intention the testator had in view when he provided in section 4 that it should "be divided" among them "in the proportions named in the last preceding subdivision"—subdivision 3. The language used was simply declaratory of his intention that, should the contingency provided for occur, the estate directly devised to his daughter should vest directly in the beneficiaries previously named. It is true that the testator might have used more apt words to disclose his intention to directly devise his estate to the other beneficiaries should his daughter die, but a declaration that it "shall be divided" among them is not by any means indicative of a different intention. If these words were used in a will free from trust provisions, they would undoubtedly be treated as words of devise. And we think they must be taken here as indicating a similar purpose, particularly when we consider that no express direction is given to the trustees to divide the trust estate so as to invest the beneficiaries with title to it, and when we further consider that the previous devise to the daughter, which would be affected by the happening of the contingency, was direct and absolute, and that there is nothing in the subdivision in question or in any other portion of the will to indicate that the testator intended, should the contingency happen, that the substituted beneficiaries should take in any other manner than by a direct devise similar to that by which, in the preceding subdivision, he had disposed of his whole estate.

In the case of In re Dunphy's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 81 Pac. 315, a trust clause in the will there under consideration provided that, upon the death of one of the beneficiaries, one-fifth of the principal of the estate "shall be transferred and distributed" as such beneficiary might by will direct. There was no express direction to the trustees to transfer or distribute. It was insisted that the language used meant that the title to such fifth could only pass by the trustees' conveyance, and that it was a trust to convey and void under the decision in the Fair Case. This court held otherwise, and declared the provision valid, holding that the use of these words evidenced no intention that the trustees should execute a conveyance, and that the provision contained no direction at all to the trustees to transfer, distribute, or convey, nor did it interfere with the apparent intention of the testator that the disposition of the trust estate, authorized by the beneficiary to be made, should operate as a direct devise. As the direction in the Dunphy Case that a portion of the trust estate "shall be transferred and distributed" did not amount to a trust to convey, but operated as a direct devise, certainly the provision in the present trust that the "whole of said residue shall be divided" did not create a trust directing the trustees to divide or transfer title by conveyance on partition, but operated as a direct devise in favor of the beneficiaries. We are satisfied that it was the intention of the testator, in using the language in subdivision 4 that the "whole of said residue shall be divided," to indicate the persons and proportions in which, in the event of his daughter's death, the share otherwise absolutely devised to her should vest, and that no trust of any kind was imposed upon the trustees under said provision.

The foregoing are the only points made by appellants which, in our judgment, call for disposition upon this appeal. The point that subdivision 5 of the trust clause, directing the trustees to use the excess of income, after payment of the annuities, in the improvement of unimproved property of the estate, or to invest it in some income-paying property, is invalid, as not within any of the trusts provided for in section 857 of the Civil Code, we do not think we are at this time called on to determine. It is no part of the primary trust, the validity of which is alone involved on this appeal. It is a provision entirely separable from it. If it were invalid, it would not affect the primary trust which we have determined to be valid. It is quite obvious that the primary trust would be unaffected and the primary purpose of the testator accomplished, even if the direction in the subdivision should be held void. It is clearly not so inextricably interwoven, or so essentially a part of the trust scheme, that all the other trust provisions would fall if it could not be sustained. Whether there will, in fact, be any excess of income is purely a matter of conjecture, a mere contingency which may never arise, and the uncertainty of which could not affect the primary trust. For these reasons, and having in view the character of proceeding here involved and the question presented on this appeal, we do not deem it necessary to determine its validity. This proceeding in the lower court was inaugurated to obtain a partial distribution of the estate, on the theory that the primary trust created by the testator was void. We have determined that this is not so. Having disposed of that question, it appears to us that we have disposed of the only vital point involved in the case. If we were to decide that subdivision 5 attempted to create an invalid trust as to the excess of income, it would be of no advantage to appellant. As the primary trust is valid, the decree denying her application would still have to be affirmed. Aside from this, the validity of this subdivision seems to be a moot question at this time and under this proceeding, whereby appellant seeks a distribution of property. There is nothing in the record to show what income the estate receives, or that there is now any excess of income, or that there is any probability that there will be any such excess. In the nature of things, this could only appear when the matter of final distribution of the estate comes up in the superior court, and it is possible that then the trust may be practically terminated. At that time and properly before that tribunal, if it shall be necessary to do so, the validity of this subdivision of the will can be passed on. For the reasons indicated, we do not think its validity need now be considered, and we do not do so.

The order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

In re CLARK'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,336.)

(Supreme Court of California, Oct. 12, 1905. On Rehearing, Nov. 13, 1905.)

1. WILLS—PROBATE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, providing that wills must be proved in the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death regardless of where he died, fixes the place of jurisdiction for all grants of original probate, and section 1322, providing that all wills duly proved in any other of the United States or in any foreign country or state may be allowed and recorded in the superior court of any county in which the testator shall have left any estate, fixes the place of jurisdiction of the grant of ancillary probate of authenticated copies of wills probated in foreign jurisdictions.

2. SAME—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, requiring wills to be proved in the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, regardless of where he died, the words "all wills," used in section 1322, declaring that all wills duly proved in any other state or country may be allowed and recorded in any county where testator shall have left any estate, should be construed to mean "all foreign wills," and to include all wills, other than domestic wills, "duly approved and allowed in any of the United States or in any foreign country or state."

3. SAME—ADJUDICATION OF SISTER STATE—FAITH AND CREDIT.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, requiring each state to give full faith and credit to the adjudications of sister states, does not limit the sovereign rights of a state nor deprive it of primary jurisdiction of the rights of its citizens to have the will of a resident originally proved in the county of his residence.

4. SAME—PROBATE—EXTRATERRITORIAL FORCE.

A judgment admitting a will to probate is valid in other states only as to property within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 944.]

5. WILLS—FOREIGN WILLS—PROBATE—PROCEEDINGS—SCOPE.

On application for the probate of a foreign will, the sufficiency of the proofs of foreign probate and the question of the residence of the testator are open to contest.

6. SAME—DOMESTIC WILL—FOREIGN PROBATE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, providing that wills must be proved in the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, wherever he may have died, the will of a resident of California, having been originally proved in another state, could not thereafter be proved in California as a foreign will, under section 1322, authorizing the allowance and record of foreign wills in any county in which the testator shall have left any estate.

On Rehearing.

7. SAME.

On an application for the ancillary probate of a foreign will, it is the property within the state and subject to its jurisdiction which constitutes the res conferring jurisdiction on the court to act; proof of the will being a mere incident or means of determining the disposition of such res.

8. SAME—JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A decree granting ancillary probate of a foreign will is only conclusive in so far as it affects the property of the testator within the state, and is not binding as to the will itself in other jurisdictions, where testator may have left property, or on the courts of his domicile.

Van Dyke, McFarland, and Shaw, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Application for the probate of the will of Julius H. Clark, deceased, as a foreign will. From an order denying the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Anderson and George Clark, for appellant. Arthur C. Hutton, for respondent. Charles S. Wheeler, Campbell, Metson & Campbell, Garrett W. McEnerney, and S. D. Woods, amici curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Julius H. Clark died in the county of Yolo, in the state of California, on the 14th day of March, 1904, and was a resident of that county at the time of his death. He had resided in the county for more than 20 years continuously prior to his death. On the 13th of July, 1872, while visiting in Keene, N. H., he executed his last will and testament. This will was executed in conformity with the laws of the state of New Hampshire, and also in conformity with the laws of the state of California. It was filed by the executrix named therein in the office of the county clerk of Yolo county, with a petition praying for the probate thereof. In addition to having been a resident of Yolo county at the time of his death, the deceased left estate in that county. Subsequent to the filing of the will and petition the superior court of Yolo county in probate made an order permitting the original will to be withdrawn and forwarded to Keene, N. H. The will was then probated in New Hampshire, and thereafter appellant herein filed his petition in the superior court of the county of Yolo, asking for probate of the same will upon an exemplified copy from the probate court of the state of New Hampshire. The superior court of Yolo county took evidence and determined that at the time of his death Clark was a resident of Yolo county. This finding is not in dispute. As a legal consequence, following this finding, the court concluded that Clark's will should be admitted to probate originally in the superior court of the county of Yolo, and was not entitled to admission as a foreign will. It denied the petition, and this appeal is taken.

We are here for the first time upon a direct proceeding, by appeal from an order refusing probate to such a will, called upon to construe our Code provisions governing the question. We say that we are for the first time called upon in direct proceedings, because, as will hereafter be shown, the cases in which the question may be considered to have arisen were either cases of collateral attack or cases where the precise question here presented was not made an issue, and therefore, under well-settled principles, cannot be said to have been de cided. As all the provisions of the Code bearing upon a single subject-matter are to be construed together, and harmoniously, if possible, it may be well to set forth the sections touching the probate of wills. Section 1294 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "Wills must be proved and letters testamentary or of administration granted: (1) In the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, in whatever place he may have died." Article 3, c. 2, of the same title (11) containing section 1294, above quoted, is devoted to the probate of foreign wills. The article is itself entitled "Probate of Foreign Wills," and section 1322 provides: "All wills duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state, may be allowed and recorded in the superior court of any county in which the testator shall have left any estate." Section 1323, following, provides that notice of a petition for proving a will shall be given when a copy of the will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor, or by any other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters. Section 1324 provides that if on the hearing it appears upon the face of the record that the will has been proved, allowed, and admitted to probate in any other of the United States or in any foreign country, and that it was executed according to the law of the place in which the same was made, or in which the testator was at the time domiciled, or in conformity with the laws of this state, it must be admitted to probate and have the same force and effect as a will first admitted to probate in this state. Section 1299 declares: "Any executor, devisee or legatee named in any will, or any other person interested in the estate, may at any time after the death of the testator petition the court having jurisdiction to have the will proved, whether the same be in writing, in his possession or not, or is lost or destroyed, or beyond the jurisdiction of the state." We take it that no jurist, feeling himself unembarrassed by earlier decisions, and at liberty to treat the question as a new one, would hesitate to say: First, that section 1294 fixes the place of jurisdiction for all grants of original probate, while section 1322 does the same for grants of ancillary probate of authenticated copies of wills proved and probated in foreign jurisdictions. Second, that these laws mean that the will of a resident of the state of California must be proved originally as a domestic will in the county of his residence, and that, so far as the state of California is concerned, it cannot be primarily proved elsewhere and brought into this state for purposes of secondary and ancillary administration. In construing the language of section 1322, attention would be called to the fact that resort with propriety may be had to the title of an act, and often must be had, to determine its true scope and intent; that the title of section 1322, relating exclusively and in terms to foreign wills, will be read in, and of necessity must be read in, to the language of that section, so that "all wills" means and should be read to mean "all foreign wills"; and that "foreign wills," as the phrase is here employed, means all wills other than domestic wills, as plainly appears from the language of the section itself, which describes these wills as all those "duly proved and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state." In illustration, it might be pointed out that if the Legislature had passed an act under the title of "An act for the government of boys in penal and reformatory institutions," and the body of the act had begun with the declaration, "All boys shall," etc., it would unhesitatingly be said that the phrase "all boys" had reference exclusively to all boys in penal and reformatory institutions in this state. We think this same unhampered jurist would point out that the matter of recognizing the judgment of a foreign state rested originally wholly in comity, and that, saving as exacted by section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States, still rests wholly in comity. It would be pointed out that while the states themselves, as has this state, have by appropriate legislation, provided that full faith and credit should be given to the adjudications of sister states, this never has meant that the state itself has parted with any of its sovereign rights, with any of its rights of primary jurisdiction, nor with any of the rights of its subjects, to have the will of a fellow-resident originally proved in the county of his residence, where, presumptively, he is the best known, and where they may the better litigate all questions touching the validity of the solemn instrument offered for probate.

Recognition would be given to the indisputable principle that every state has plenary power with respect to the administration and disposition of the estates of deceased persons as to all property of such persons found within its jurisdiction. Thus the courts of a state may and do grant original probate upon wills of deceased nonresidents who leave property within that state. In California this is expressly provided for by section 1294 supra, and the rule as to other states is the same. 1 Woerner's Adm. *439; Shields v. Life Ins. Co., 119 N. C. 380, 25 S. E. 951; Gordon's Case, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 26 Atl. 268; Putnam v. Pitney, 45 Minn. 242, 47 N. W. 790, 11 L. R. A. 41; Walton v. Hall's Estate, 66 Vt. 455, 29 Atl. 803; Jacques v. Horton, 76 Atl. 238. But the limitations of the operation of this principle would also be recognized, namely, that this exercise of original jurisdiction over the estates of nonresidents affects, and can affect, only the property within the state. The judgment admitting the will to probate is valid in all other states only as to the property within the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the judgment. It has no extraterritorial force, establishes nothing beyond that, and does not dispense with nor abrogate the formalities and proofs which may be exacted by other jurisdictions in which the deceased also left property subject to their laws of administration. 1 Woerner's Adm. *491. And in this connection it would be further pointed out that, if the position contended for by appellant is sound, it involves upon the part of the state a formal surrender of so much of its sovereignty and right of primary jurisdiction, conferring that upon foreign states, and at the same time, to this extent, is subversive and destructive of the rights of its citizens. It would be said with exact truth that the full faith and credit which is accorded to the adjudications of sister states is a full faith and credit, consonant with complete jurisdiction and control of the sovereign state over all its inhabitants, and over all the property within its boundaries. No less would the practical hardships of such an interpretation be pointed out, because, if it were so that all wills, therein including domestic wills of residents of this state, could be primarily proved in a foreign jurisdiction, and by mere exemplification of that proof be entitled to ancillary probate under the laws of this state, it would result in numerous instances that wills of residents of this state would be probated in foreign jurisdictions without the knowledge of those in interest resident in this state, and without an opportunity to them afforded of raising any question of fraud, insanity, undue influence, or the like, affecting the validity of the instrument. Further, it would be pointed out with justice that, if the construction contended for be the true one, it is arrived at by obliterating all distinction between the probate of domestic and foreign wills, by refusing recognition to the language of the Code classifying these foreign wills, and by a surrender of the state's original jurisdiction in these matters, with the result that it places the state of California in an anomalous class by itself. For neither the laws of Great Britain nor of any sister state of the United States ever have permitted, and we venture to say never will permit, any such doctrine, and it may be safely added that no civilized country in the world has ever entertained it. Numerous cases would be cited showing that, while in matters of probate states by comity permit ancillary jurisdiction of foreign wills, they are jealous in the extreme of any invasion of, or attempt to invade, their original jurisdiction in such matters. Manuel v. Manuel, 13 Ohio St. 459; Sturdivant v. Neill, 27 Miss. 157; Stark v. Parker, 56 N. H. 481; Wallace v. Wallace, 3 N. J. Eq. 616; In re Law (Sup.) 80 N. Y. Supp. 410; Moultrie v. Hunt, 23 N. Y. 394; Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 573, 37 Am. Dec. 737; Story on Conflict of Laws, § 457; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 114; Schouler on Executors, §§ 15 and 57; 2 Redfield on Wills, p. 290; 1 Woerner's Adm. § 226.

In summing up, we think the unhampered jurist would reach the conclusion that our laws not only recognize, but sedulously preserve, the distinction between foreign and domestic wills and the probate thereof; that the law means what it says, namely, that all domestic wills must be proved in the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, for thus the state preserves its sovereignty and its jurisdiction over matters primarily belonging to it, and thus also, it preserves the rights of its other residents and citizens; furthermore, that all foreign wills may be proved and allowed as provided in section 1322 of the Code of Civil Procedure, et seq.; that in the case of a domestic will all questions touching the validity of the instrument are, and should be, primarily and exclusively cognizable by the courts of the state of the domicile; that in the case of a foreign will, that is to say, of one not a resident of this state, this state and its citizens have less concern with these questions of fraud, undue influence, and the like, and upon the offer of proof of such a will it shall be admitted upon the evidence prescribed by section 1324, without right of contest upon such matters. Code Civ. Proc. § 1913. But, nevertheless and always, when a foreign will is so offered for probate in this state, two questions are open as new and original questions for the determination of our own probate court: First, the sufficiency of the proofs of foreign probate; and, second, the question of the residence of the deceased. For if, upon the question of residence, it shall be determined that the deceased was in truth a resident of this state, it follows of necessity that the proper state court has exclusive, original primary jurisdiction to admit the will to probate, and will not admit it as a foreign will for ancillary proceedings. It does not, of course, follow that because the probate court under such circumstances will not admit it as a foreign will that it will refuse it probate altogether. It will grant it probate, the facts warranting, in proceedings under section 1294 for original probate. Nor can practical difficulty arise because such a will has been probated in a foreign jurisdiction, for the Code (section 1299, supra) meets this precise situation by providing that petition may be made to the court having jurisdiction to have the will proved, whether it be lost, or destroyed, or beyond the jurisdiction of the state.

We have discussed this question under what we have said we were convinced would be the view of a jurist treating the case as one of first impression. We are met, however, with the argument that our own adjudications express a contrary view, and are determinative of the question. Not that alone, but that this view has been adopted by the courts in probate throughout the state, and that the result of the construction of the law here set forth would be to declare void all letters admitting such wills to probate, and cloud the title to untold millions of property in the hands of innocent holders. If such consequences were to result, or if, in fact, there were any such adjudications, a court would pause long and ponder gravely before announcing a construction which would lead to such direful consequences. But the answer is that this court has made no such adjudications, and that no such consequences can follow; for, as has been said, this is the first time that the question upon direct appeal has been presented for determination. The cases to which appellant refers and upon which he relies are those of Rogers v. King, 22 Cal. 72, Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, and Estate of Richardson, 120 Cal. 344, 52 Pac. 832. In Rogers v. King the attack was collateral, not direct. The opinion is addressed to this state of facts, and the essential part of it is as follows: "The agreed case states that the executor named in the will filed in the probate court a petition for the probate of the will, and filed therein an authenticated copy of said will, and that the petition stated all the necessary facts. * * * If, as agreed, the petition stated all the necessary facts, then upon its presentation with a copy of the will and the publication of due and legal notice, the court acquired jurisdiction to probate the will, and the judgment of the probate thereafter entered is conclusive. If any irregularities occurred in the proceedings or error in the judgment after jurisdiction was acquired, they could only be corrected by a direct proceeding for that purpose, and cannot be inquired into in this collateral proceeding." This is all that the case of Rogers v. King contains, and it amounts to no more than a declaration that, the court in probate having acquired jurisdiction and having admitted a will to probate, errors in the exercise of its jurisdiction do not render its order admitting the will to probate void, and cannot be considered upon collateral attack. In Estate of Richardson, while it appears from the facts that the testator was a resident of California at the time of his death, and that his will had been originally probated in a sister state, and subsequently had been offered for probate in this state as a foreign will, the sole question at issue which this court was called upon to determine, and did determine, was the right of a nominee of a devisee to testamentary letters. The question now before the court, as to the right to probate the will under any circumstances as a foreign will, was never discussed nor decided. Goldtree v. McAlister was a case originally decided in department and reconsidered by the court in bank. That, too, involved the question, not of a direct, but of a collateral, attack upon the validity of an order admitting to probate as a foreign will the last testament of a resident of this state. The attack was principally directed to the sufficiency of the proof of authentication, and the court said: "An error of the court in deciding that certain documentary evidence not properly authenticated, proved a valid foreign probate of a will, is not different in character or principle from an error in deciding, as in the case of Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500, that certain evidence proved that the deceased had her last place of residence in Sacramento county. The error in the former case may have proceeded from a misconception of what constituted a valid foreign probate of a will, or from an error as to what was competent or sufficient evidence to prove it. In the latter case the error may have arisen from a mistaken view of what constituted a residence, or from an error as to what was sufficient or competent evidence to prove it. Such errors may be corrected by appeal, but do not render the judgment void." This case then must be taken to decide, and to decide only, that upon collateral attack an order admitting a will offered as a foreign will to probate is not void for error either in the proof of authentication or in proof of residence, as in Rogers v. King and Irwin v. Scriber. Question may be raised over the strict logic of that opinion, but no doubt can exist as to the strong necessity which called it forth. It must be taken, therefore, as settled in this state, upon the authority of the cases cited, that the probate of such wills is free from attack upon these questions in collateral proceedings, but that, upon the other hand, it is the duty of the court in probate to do as the court here did, refuse probate to a will offered as a foreign will, if the court shall be satisfied from the evidence that the testator was, in fact, a resident of this state at the time of his death.

For the foregoing reasons, the order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

VAN DYKE, J. (dissenting). I dissent. The deceased, Clark, it appears, executed his will in 1872, at Keene, Cheshire county, N. H., and left it in the custody of Cain & Benton, attorneys at law, in said county of Cheshire. After his death that will was sent out here and filed for probate in the county of Yolo, but before any action was taken thereon, upon the application of Mary M. Metcalf, a sister of the deceased and devisee and legatee of the estate under said will and the sole executrix named therein, for permission to withdraw said will and have the same proved in New Hampshire, the probate court of Yolo county entered the following order granting said application:

"In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Yolo. In the Matter of the Estate of Julius H. Clark, Deceased.

"Upon reading and filing the petition of Mary M. Metcalf, duly verified by her attorney, W. A. Anderson, and it appearing therefrom that it is to the best interests of the estate of said Julius H. Clark, deceased, and also for the best interests of the devisees of the will of the said deceased, and that it is impracticable and very expensive to probate the said will of Julius H. Clark in the state of California, and that the said will was executed in the state of New Hampshire, and that none of the witnesses to said will live in the state of California, but that they did live in the said state of New Hampshire, and that the said executrix, Mary M. Metcalf, is too feeble to come to the state of California, to apply for letters testamentary on said will, and it appearing from said petition that the said executrix desires to have said will probated in the county of Cheshire, state of New Hampshire, and that the said Julius H. Clark left estate in said county at the time of his death: Wherefore it is by the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the clerk of the said superior court of the county of Yolo be, and he is hereby, ordered and directed to send the will of the said Julius H. Clark, now on file in his said office, to Mrs. Paul Thomson, at West Hartford, Connecticut, by express, or to deliver to W. A. Anderson, the attorney for Mary M. Metcalf, the said will to be so sent. And the clerk is hereby ordered to preserve a certified copy of said will in his said office. E. E. Gaddis, Judge."

Indorsed: "Filed April 19, 1904. C. F. Hadsall, Clerk."

Thereafter, on May 18, 1904, the proponent Du Bois, to whom an interest in said estate had been conveyed by said Mary M. Metcalf, devisee and legatee of the said will, filed a petition in the superior court of Yolo county for admission to probate of said will upon a duly authenticated copy thereof and its probate in the state of New Hampshire. Upon notice of said application having been given pursuant to the statute, the contestant L. J. Clark, son of the testator, and a legatee under the will, filed objections to the admission of the same upon the exemplified copy, upon the grounds, among others, that said Julius H. Clark, at the time of his death and at the date said alleged will was executed, was a resident of the county of Yolo, state of California; that said alleged will was a domestic will, and that the same could not be admitted to probate by virtue of having been previously admitted to probate by the courts of New Hampshire; that the superior court of Yolo county, state of California, had original and exclusive jurisdiction to hear an original petition to admit said will to probate; and that the courts of the state of New Hampshire had no jurisdiction to admit said will to probate, except for the purpose of carrying on an administration ancillary to that had in the state of California. Upon the hearing of the case, the superior court of Yolo county sustained the objection of the contestant upon the grounds stated, and denied the admission of the authenticated copy to probate, and from this order the appeal is taken. From the record it appears that the copy of the will was duly authenticated in conformity with the laws of New Hampshire, and that such will was valid under the laws of said state admitting it to probate; that all the proceedings thereon were regular, and that there was nothing upon the face of the record to dispute the jurisdiction of the court of such state admitting the will to probate; and that said will was made and executed in conformity, not only with the laws of said state, but also in conformity with the laws of this state. The question, therefore, presented is whether, in the case of a testator, who, at his death, resided in this state, a will filed for probate in this state upon a duly authenticated copy thereof from the court of a sister state, first having been duly probated therein according to the laws of said state, may be admitted to probate, or must the original will be produced here for that purpose? Section 1322, Code Civ. Proc., copied in the prevailing opinion, is taken from the act of 1850 to regulate the settlement of estates of deceased persons, being section 27 of said act. St. 1850, p. 377, c. 129. The language of the Code sections bearing on the subject under consideration is plain and unambiguous, and cannot be controlled by any headlines of the chapter put there by the code commissioners. "The mere classifications can scarcely be deemed part of the law." Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, § 70.

In the case of Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, the plaintiff sued in the character of trustee of the estate of Jonathan Thompson, deceased, under his last will. The testator was a resident of the county of San Luis Obispo, and left estate therein. His last will had been duly proved and allowed in the Queen's Probate Court of London on the 28th day of October, 1875. His heirs and devisees were residing in this state and in England. Upon petition, filed for the probate of said will from an exemplified copy thereof from said English court, the probate court of San Luis Obispo county, this state, after notice and proceedings as required by the Code, admitted said will to probate in the following order: "It is ordered that the paper heretofore filed purporting to be a copy of the last will and testament of said deceased be admitted to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased; that the said John Thompson and John A. Patchett be and they are hereby appointed executors of said estate; and that letters testamentary issue to the said petitioners upon their taking the oath as required by law." Letters testamentary were accordingly issued to John Thompson and J. A. Patchett, who duly qualified. The will also appointed Thompson, Patchett, and Grierson trustees of the estate, and devised the property to them for the uses and purposes stated in the will. Thereafter, by an order of said superior court, Patchett was removed and plaintiff Goldtree was appointed in his place. On the trial of the case the defendant objected to the introduction in evidence of the record of the California probate proceedings of San Luis Obispo county, on the ground that the probate court of San Luis Obispo county never acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the probate of the will. Defendant's objections were overruled and judgment went for the plaintiffs, which judgment on appeal was affirmed by this court in department. Appellant filed a petition for a rehearing, and made the point that, as Thompson was a resident of California at his death, his will was domestic to the state of California, and that the California court had no jurisdiction to grant ancillary or secondary probate, as was done in that case. A rehearing was granted, and appellant filed additional points and authorities upon the rehearing in bank, in which it is said: "Admittedly Jonathan Thompson was a resident of California at his death. It follows that his will, if any he left, was not a 'foreign' but a domestic will—domestic to the state of California. * * * The English court had no jurisdiction to grant original probate of a will domestic to this state. The California court alone had such jurisdiction. The California court had no jurisdiction to grant auxiliary or secondary probate of the will in question." And appellant's counsel especially relied upon the point of want of jurisdiction in the probate court of this state in the premises, and this question seems to have been fully presented to this court on the rehearing. In the opinion upon the rehearing by the court in bank it is said: "The judgment appealed from in this case was affirmed January 31, 1890. A rehearing was granted, and the case has been argued in printed briefs. We have carefully considered the arguments of the learned counsel for appellant on the rehearing, but find nothing in them having the effect to change the former opinion." Pages 96 and 97, 86 Cal., page 801, 24 Pac. This case, which is the latest expression of this court on the question, seems to hold directly that a will of a resident of this state can be admitted to probate in this state on an exemplified copy of its probate in a court outside of the state.

As already shown, the will in question, upon petition, was ordered by the lower court to be withdrawn and transmitted to New Hampshire, where the deceased left property, to be there first admitted to probate. It can hardly be supposed that the court in doing this at the same time entertained the view that said will could only be admitted to probate in the first instance in Solano county. To suppose so would be to suppose that the court set a snare to entrap petitioners so as to deprive the legatees and devisees under the will of the principal benefit resulting from the same. Under the provisions of the Code, as well as upon the authority of Goldtree v. McAlister, supra, the court below clearly erred in refusing to admit the will in question to probate under the circumstances, as shown, and the order to that effect should be reversed.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent, and think that the order appealed from should be reversed. In my opinion the language of section 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, "all wills duly proven and allowed in any other of the United States, or in any foreign country or state may be allowed and recorded," etc., is entirely too clear and explicit to leave any room for the play of construction. The fact that the section is preceded by the subheading "Probate of Foreign Wills" is not sufficient to overcome the unmistakable meaning of the language of the section. Indeed, the word "foreign" does not necessarily mean in law a country other than a sister state of the American Union. In the majority of instances it includes such sister states, and this view of its meaning is so well established as to have gone into the text-books and law dictionaries as settled law. In "Words and Phrases Judicially Defined," vol. 3, p. 2881, it is said: "For all national purposes embraced by the federal Constitution, the states and the citizens thereof are one, united under the same sovereign authority, and governed by the same laws. In all other respects the states are necessarily foreign and independent of each other; their constitutions and forms of government being (though republican) altogether different, as are their laws and institutions." In Bouvier's Law Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 811, it is said: "The several states of the American Union are foreign to each other with respect to their municipal laws." In Abbott's Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 514, it is said: "In American usage the several states of the Union are foreign to each other with respect to matters governed by their municipal laws; while the relations of the general government and either state are domestic. This consideration qualifies the usage of several of the phrases mentioned under the present head. It is abundantly well settled that a bill of exchange drawn in one state, payable in another, is a foreign bill. The corporations created by one state are constantly called foreign corporations in any other. In each state the judgments rendered in, and laws enacted by, another state are foreign judgments and laws. A port of another state is a foreign port." Therefore the word "foreign," in the subheading, is not at all inconsistent with the language of the section in question. And, of course, the Legislature has full power over the whole subject of wills, descents, distribution of estates, and probate proceedings. There is not a word in the state Constitution limiting its legislative authority in such matters.

SHAW, J. (dissenting). I dissent. So far as the policy of the provisions of section 1322, of the Code of Civil Procedure is concerned, that is a question for the Legislature, and not for the courts. There are considerations both for and against the proposition that the will of a person who dies a resident of this state may be first probated in some other state. In cases of persons who have recently become residents of this state it is often very much more convenient and less expensive to pursue this course. A large part of the population of this state has always consisted of persons who have lived here but a short period of time. It may be that the Legislature, having these circumstances in view, believed it the best policy to provide that this might be done, and enacted this statute for the express purpose of allowing it to be done. But, in any event, in view of the plain language of the section, the matter of policy is immaterial. "A cardinal rule of interpretation is that a statute free from ambiguity and uncertainty needs no interpretation. This must be so, for all interpretation and construction is for the purpose of ascertaining the legislative will. When this is clear, interpretation is not allowable. In such case it cannot be argued that the result is unjust or against policy. The statute is itself conclusive upon these subjects." Davis v. Hart, 123 Cal. 387, 55 Pac. 1060. The section in question must have the same meaning now as it had when it was originally enacted. It first became a part of the statute law of this state in 1850, when it was enacted in section 27 of the probate act (St. 1850, 378, c. 129) in precisely the same language as that contained in section 1322, Code of Civil Procedure, except that the words "superior court" have been substituted for "probate court." In the Probate Act there was no chapter, heading, or subheading which could have any effect. It is inconceivable that the Legislature would have re-enacted the section in the same language, if it had intended to change the meaning, by limiting its application to wills of persons who, at the time of their death, resided out of this state. The phrase "all wills" in the section plainly includes wills of every description, domestic and foreign. Where the language of the statute is clear and unambiguous, as in this case, the title of the act, chapter, article, or subheading of the section cannot be resorted to for the purposes of giving it a different meaning from that which the words import. In re Boston M. & M. Co., 51 Cal. 624; Cohen v. Barrett, 5 Cal. 209; People ex rel. Flynn v. Abbott, 16 Cal. 366; Hagar v. Supervisors, 47 Cal. 232. Furthermore, it cannot be said that the decision will not tend to unsettle titles to real property. While it may be true that the determination of the court upon the question of fact that the residence of the deceased at the time of his death was in some other state or country is conclusive on collateral attack, and that this has been settled by the decisions of this court, yet it has never been decided that where, in case of the probate of a so-called foreign will, the petition on its face avers that the deceased died a resident of this state, but that the will had been first probated in some other state, the fact of lack of jurisdiction is not apparent on the face of the record, and may not be raised upon collateral attack. The records of this court show that there have been several cases where wills of this character have been proven as foreign wills, and it is a fair, if not necessary, inference that the actual cases of that character have been quite numerous. Whatever may be now said in the way of a discriminating review of the previous decisions of this court, it must be admitted that the general opinion has been that, under section 1322, the will of a resident of this state, having been first admitted to probate in some other state, may be probated in this state as a foreign will. I think the court below erred in refusing to entertain jurisdiction.

Response to Petition for Rehearing.

BEATTY, C. J. In their petition for a rehearing counsel for appellant reiterate the argument that our construction of the Code provisions relating to the proof of foreign wills (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1322–1324) can only be sustained by reading into the statute a qualification of the words "all wills," which will limit its application to wills "of a certain kind," contrary to the intention of the Legislature and the general understanding of the courts of the state and the legal profession. I take leave to doubt this general understanding of the courts and the profession, and again call the attention of counsel to the fact that it is wholly unnecessary to read anything into the statute in order to limit its application to wills of a certain kind. The qualifying words are plainly written in the statute, and the fault is with counsel in ignoring their existence and their force. The statute does not say "all wills," and stop there. Its language is (section 1322) "all wills duly proved and allowed" in any other state or foreign country. Wills that have been duly proved and allowed are wills "of a certain kind," and in order to determine whether a particular will is of that kind we have to give a construction to the words "duly proved and allowed." When, therefore, is a will duly proved and allowed? The proof of a will is a proceeding in rem. To the validity of any judgment in rem—a judgment, which as to the res, binds all the world—there must be adequate public notice of the proceeding, and such notice must emanate from a court which has jurisdiction of the res. When the will of a resident of this state is the res, is it possible that the courts of every civilized country on the globe have a concurrent jurisdiction upon published notice to determine its validity? If we look to our own statute for a test of jurisdiction in such cases, we find that we confine the judisdiction to the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, and this, it is safe to say, is the ordinary rule. Authority to take proof of wills is confined to courts whose territorial jurisdiction includes the domicile of the decedent. The fact that in this state, as in other states and countries, wills of nonresidents are admitted to probate on original proceedings for the purpose of administering upon their property within the state is no impeachment of this proposition. In such cases it is the property within this state and subject to its jurisdiction which constitutes the res, and proof of the will is allowed as a mere incident or means of determining the disposition of that property. And the decree which has only that purpose is conclusive only to that extent. It binds that property here and everywhere that the decrees of our courts are accorded full faith and credit, whether by comity or by force of the federal Constitution. But such a decree is not binding as to the will itself in other jurisdictions where the decedent may have left property, and still less is it binding upon the courts of his domicile. It is not conclusive in other jurisdictions, simply because, as a will and for all purposes, it has not been duly proved and allowed. It has been proved and allowed so far as it affects the disposition of the property within the particular jurisdiction, but no further.

The considerations thus briefly indicated, it seems to me, ought to have prevented the hasty contruction which we are told has been generally placed upon our statute by the profession and the courts in this state. As to the courts, it is true that in three instances, as shown by our records, the construction contended for by counsel has been accepted by the trial court, but in this court decrees admitting wills of residents of California to probate, on proof of foreign probate, have never been sustained, except as against collateral attack. My own opinion is clear that no will has been duly proved and allowed, within the meaning of sections 1322–1324, Code of Civ. Proc., unless the proof has been taken in a court whose territorial jurisdiction includes the domicile of the testator. When a will has been admitted to probate here on proof of its admission to probate in some other jurisdiction, not including the domicile of the decedent, the decree and proceedings regularly taken under it are, of course, secure against what in Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 93, 24 Pac. 801, is held to be collateral attack, and this, irrespective of the question whether that decision can be reconciled with a correct construction of the statute. Correct or not, the rule of that case has become a rule of property, and as such must be upheld upon the doctrine of stare decisis for the protection of vested rights..

LAMBERT v. BATES. (S. F. 3,495.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1905.)

1. APPEAL—FORMER DECISION—LAW OF THE CASE.

Where, on a prior appeal, the Supreme Court reversed a judgment in favor of defendant and directed the trial court to enter judgment on the findings in plaintiff's favor, such decision constituted the law of the case on the question of the sufficiency of the findings to support a judgment in plaintiff's favor.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — OBJECTIONS—REVIEW.

Where an appeal was taken by the owner of certain property assessed for street improvements to the city council as required by law, for the determination of objections to the manner in which the work was done, the council's adverse decision on such objections was conclusive, and barred the owner from renewing the same as a defense to a proceeding to foreclose the lien on his property for nonpayment of the assessment.

3. APPEAL—JUDGMENT APPEALABLE.

A judgment entered in the superior court by direction of the appellate court is appealable.

4. SAME—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

Where, on a prior appeal on the judgment roll, the judgment was reversed, and a judgment ordered entered on the findings in favor of the party appealing, the other party may by an appeal on a proper record present for consideration exceptions taken by him on the trial of the action.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by D. Lambert against George E. Bates. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Freeman & Bates and E. D. Magee, for appellant. Alex. G. Eells and H. K. Eells, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. A trial was had, resulting in a judgment for defendant. The plaintiff appealed to this court, and the judgment herein was as follows, viz.: "The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter judgment on the findings for the plaintiff, as prayed for in his complaint." Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 680, 70 Pac. 777, 778. Upon the going down of the remittitur, the superior court complied with the mandate of this court, and entered the judgment for plaintiff required thereby. This is an appeal on the judgment roll alone, taken by the defendant from the judgment so entered under the order of this court. There is no claim that the judgment as entered does not fully comply with the directions of this court on the former appeal; the only contention made by appellant being that the findings do not support the judgment.

The rule contended for by appellant that a judgment cannot stand on appeal, unless it be supported by the findings, cannot, of course, be disputed. The decision of this court upon the former appeal is, however, conclusive upon the point that the findings here do support the present judgment, and the contention of appellant is simply a request that this court reconsider its previous ruling. When this court directed this particular judgment to be entered upon these findings, it necessarily adjudicated that question against the contention of appellant, and we are not at liberty to consider the question anew upon this appeal. The decision upon that point has become the law of the case. An examination of the opinion given on the former appeal shows that the particular finding claimed by appellant to be inconsistent with the right of plaintiff to a judgment, viz.: that the plaintiff had failed to perform all the terms and conditions of his contract, and that the macadamizing and guttering had not been done to the official grade, was considered immaterial by this court, in view of the law requiring an appeal by the owner to the city council upon such matters, and the finding that such an appeal had been made and the objections of the owner on such appeal overruled. It was held that, upon the record before the court, the decision of the council upon those questions was conclusive upon the owner, and that the objections were therefore not available to him here. We see no reason to question the correctness of this decision, even if the matter were here open for review.

The right to appeal from a judgment entered in a superior court by direction of the appellate court undoubtedly exists. As has been said, great injustice might be done, if it should be held that such a judgment is not appealable. See Randall v. Duff, 107 Cal. 33–36, 40 Pac. 20. If the lower court enters a judgment that is not in accord with the directions of the appellate court, the error may be corrected on appeal. If, upon an appeal by one party, upon the judgment roll, the judgment is reversed and judgment ordered entered upon the findings in his favor, the other party may, by an appeal upon a proper record, present for consideration exceptions taken by him on the trial of the action. Klauber v. San Diego, 98 Cal. 105, 32 Pac. 876. Other instances of questions that could be considered on such an appeal might be enumerated, but they cannot include such matters as were definitely determined on the former appeal. As to such matters, the doctrine of the "law of the case" makes the former decision conclusive. Klauber v. San Diego, etc., supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANSEN v. UNION SAVINGS BANK.

(S. F. 3,512.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1905.)

1. HOMESTEAD—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Civ. Code, § 1262, provides that in order to select a homestead the husband or wife must execute and acknowledge a declaration of homestead, which section 1263 declares shall contain a statement that the person making it is the head of a family, or, when the declaration is made by the wife, that the husband had not made such declaration and that she therefore makes it for their joint benefit. Held, that a declaration made by a wife, which failed to allege either that she was the head of a family or that her husband had not made such declaration, was fatally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 25, Cent. Dig. Homestead, § 61.]

2. SAME—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Civ. Code, §§ 1266–1269, declaring that any person other than the head of a family in the selection of a homestead must execute and acknowledge a certain declaration, etc., relate solely to persons other than a husband, wife, or head of a family, whose homestead rights are declared by sections 1262, 1263.

3. SAME — TERMINATION — PROCEEDINGS—NOTICE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1723, authorizing the filing of a petition to terminate a life estate or homestead interest in certain property, providing that "thereupon, and after such notice by publication or otherwise as the court may order, the court must hear," etc., a notice of such an application posted for 10 days in three prominent places in the county, without notice to persons interested in the property, was insufficient to confer jurisdiction.

4. SAME—STATUTES—SCOPE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1723, provides that, if any person be dead who was the owner of a life estate in property or was one of the spouses owning land as a homestead, etc., any person interested in the property or title thereto may file a petition to terminate the homestead or community interest vested in the survivor of the community, etc. Held, that such proceeding was only to determine that a certain person was dead, on whose death the asserted right of another depended, and that no judgment conclusively establishing a homestead right could be rendered therein.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Corine Mathea Hansen against the Union Savings Bank. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Lewis and I. F. Chapman, for appellant. Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet title to a certain described lot of land. Judgment went for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

On August 26, 1895, the lot in question was owned by appellant's husband, Jens Hansen, since deceased, as community property, and on that day he mortgaged it to respondent to secure his note for $650. Afterwards respondent brought an action to foreclose the mortgage, making said Jens and appellant herein both parties defendant. They both made default, and judgment was rendered foreclosing the mortgage, and at a sale under the judgment respondent was purchaser, and in due time received a deed. On May 12, 1895, before the execution of the said mortgage, appellant made and caused to be recorded the following instrument: "Know all men by these presents, that I do hereby certify and declare that I am married, and that I do now, at the time of making this declaration, actually reside with my family on the land and premises hereinafter described. [Then follows the description of the lot of land involved in this present action.] That it is my intention to use and claim the said lot of land and premises above described, together with the dwelling house thereon, and its appurtenances, as a homestead, and I do hereby select and claim the same as a homestead. That the actual cash value of said property I estimate to be twenty-five hundred dollars." The foregoing is all of the instrument except the date, signature, and acknowledgment. At that time she was the wife of Jens Hansen, and resided on the premises with him; and there was not residing on said premises any one of the persons mentioned in section 1261 of the Civil Code, other than her husband. This instrument was clearly invalid as a declaration of homestead by a married woman living with her husband, because it omitted certain material statements required by the law. By section 1262 of the Civil Code it is provided that "in order to select a homestead the husband, or other head of a family, or in case the husband has not made such selection, the wife" must execute and acknowledge a declaration of homestead; and in section 1263 it is provided that "the declaration must contain a statement showing that the person making it is the head of a family; or, when the declaration is made by the wife, showing that her husband has not made such declaration, and that she therefore makes the declaration for their joint benefit." These statements last above quoted are not in the instrument relied on in the case at bar, and it therefore does not constitute a valid declaration of homestead.

Appellant contends that, although the instrument be invalid under the sections of the code above referred to, still it is good as a $1,000 homestead, under chapter 3 of title 5 of the Civil Code—sections 1266 to 1269—which provides for a "homestead of other persons." But that chapter evidently refers to persons other than a husband, wife, or head of a family, whose rights to a homestead are declared in preceding sections. Clearly a wife's homestead is governed by sections 1262 and 1263 above referred to. When the wife seeks to establish a homestead she must make the declaration provided by section 1263. The code does not contemplate that a husband may establish a valid $5,000 homestead, and that the wife, under the category of "other persons," may have an additional and separate $1,000 homestead.

Appellant makes the contention that the validity of her asserted homestead has been conclusively established as against respondent by a certain proceeding taken and judgment rendered under section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but this contention is not maintainable. It is provided by that section that, if any person has died who was the owner of a life estate in property, or was one of the spouses owning land as a homestead, or was a married woman and the owner of community property which passed upon her death to the surviving husband, any person interested in the property or the title thereto may file in the superior court his verified petition setting forth these facts, and, thereupon "and after such notice by publication or otherwise as the court may direct," the court shall hear the petition and evidence, and, "if upon such hearing it shall appear that said life estate of such deceased person absolutely terminated or such homestead or community property vested in the survivor of such marriage, the court shall make a decree to that effect," and a copy of the decree shall be recorded and shall have the same effect as a final decree of distribution. Under this section the appellant filed a petition setting up her alleged right of homestead, and praying that it be decreed that the said alleged homestead property vested in her by reason of the death of her said husband, Jens Hansen. The court made an order fixing a certain time and place for the hearing of the petition, and that "notice of said hearing be given by the posting of a copy of this order in three of the most prominent places in the county of Alameda, at least 10 days prior to said day." Afterwards a county clerk made an affidavit that he had posted the said order in three prominent places in said county, naming them, more than 10 days prior to the day fixed for the hearing. There was no notice directed to any person, or to any class of persons. This notice, under the decision in the Matter of Tracy, 136 Cal. 385, 69 Pac. 20, was radically defective, and did not give to the court any jurisdiction to hear the proceeding or render a decree. Moreover, this section 1723 is, in our opinion, only intended as a proceeding to have it determined that a certain person is dead upon whose death the asserted right of another person depends, and not to have the validity of the right conclusively adjudicated. The decree in the proceeding merely determines that, if the party petitioning has any asserted right or title accruing on the death of another person, such asserted right or title has accrued. This view was substantially declared in the Matter of Tracy, supra—although, perhaps, the declaration was obiter—where the court said: "It is proper to remark that the court is not given power under the section [1723] to declare in whom upon termination of a life estate title is vested absolutely. It is empowered to make a decree that the life estate of a deceased party has absolutely terminated." Of course, it is often convenient and important to those interested in or examining a title to have some record evidence of the death of a life tenant, a homestead claimant, or other person upon whose death some right or estate vests.

Under the foregoing views it is not necessary to consider whether the decree in the proceeding under section 1723, initiated by appellant, really undertakes to establish the absolute validity of her homestead claim, or to consider other points made by respondent in support of the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re WALKER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,975.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 25, 1905.)

1. Appeal — Findings — Conflicting Evidence—Review.

Where a finding was based on conflicting evidence, it will not be reversed on appeal, unless it has no fair or reasonable support.

2. Trial—Submission—Reopening Case.

It was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse to reopen the case after submission to permit a party to introduce additional cumulative evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 46, Cent. Dig. Trial, §§ 166, 889.]

3. New Trial—Newly Discovered Evidence.

Where objector's application to reopen the case after submission for the introduction of cumulative evidence was denied, it was not error to deny a motion for a new trial on the ground that the evidence was newly discovered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, § 205.]

4. Executors — Distribution — Right to Object.

Where, on petition for the distribution of an estate, the court found on sufficient evidence that objector had no interest in the estate, she had no standing to object that the findings did not authorize the distribution of the estate to the executors as trustees, etc.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Application for decree of final distribution in the estate of Jackson Walker, deceased. From an order denying the objections of Nancy Siller Blevins to the distribution of the estate to certain trustees, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.
